1. Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 318, providing that no action for the recovery of real property shall be maintained unless plaintiff had possession within five years before the commencement of the action, and section 319, providing that no cause of action arising out of title to real property shall be effectual unless plaintiff shall have been so possessed, do not apply to actions to quiet title, as they may be brought without reference to the question of possession under section 738, which provides that "an action may be brought by any person against another, who claims an estate or interest in real property adverse to him, for the purpose of determining such adverse claims," and section 380 regulating the procedure "in an action brought by a person, out of the possession of real property, to determine an adverse claim of an interest or estate therein."

2. Under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 559, requiring the officer serving a writ of attachment to return the same, "with a certificate of his proceedings indorsed thereon or attached thereto," when the return asserts that he attached certain property, but fails to set out the performance of all of the necessary acts, parol evidence is admissible to prove their performance.

3. In such case the evidence must be clear and satisfactory, and, when the witness will not testify positively to the performance of one of the necessary acts, the testimony is not sufficient.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Stanislaus county; John W. Armstrong, Judge.

Action to quiet title by James Brusie against Samuel Gates and S. M. McLean. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant Gates appeals.

W. E. Turner and E. W. McKinstry, for appellant. T. B. Bond, Stonesifer & Minor, and S. C. Denson, for respondent.

Works, J. This is an action to quiet title. The title of the respondent depends upon the validity of the levy of a writ of attachment on the property in the hands of the appellant's grantor and the subsequent sale of the same on execution. The attachment issued out of the justice's court, judgment was recovered and subsequently recorded in the recorder's office of the proper county, an execution was issued and placed in the hands of the sheriff, and the property sold to the respondent, who was the judgment creditor. The property was purchased by the appellant from the judgment debtor, for a valuable consideration, between the time of the levy of the writ of attachment and the recording of the judgment in the recorder's office. Therefore the respondent's right to recover depends, in the first instance, upon the validity of the levy of the writ of attachment, as the appellant became a purchaser for a valuable consideration before the judgment became a lien on the property.

The appellant contends that the complaint does not state a cause of action, and that the demurrer thereto was improperly overruled, for the reason that it fails to show that the plaintiff was, or had been within five years, seised or possessed of the property in controversy. Under the old practice act a party out of possession could not maintain an action to quiet title to real estate. Practice Act, § 254; San Francisco v. Beideman, 17 Cal. 461; Rico v. Spence, 21 Cal. 504. But the present Code gives the right to prosecute the action, generally, without reference to the question of possession. Code Civil Proc. §§ 380, 738; People v. Center, 66 Cal. 551, 5 Pac. Rep. 263, and 6 Pac. Rep. 481. Counsel for appellant concede this to be so, but claim that under sections 318 and 319 [1] of the Code of Civil Procedure the plaintiff must, at least, show that he has been in possession of the land within a period of five years. But in our judgment the sections referred to do not apply to actions of this kind, (Richardson v. Williamson, 24 Cal. 299;) and, if they did, they are statutes of limitation and do not affect the question of pleading raised here. It was not necessary for the respondent to show in his complaint that his cause of action was not barred by the statute of limitations. It not appearing on the face of the complaint that the action was barred, the question could only be presented by answer.

It is earnestly contended by the appellant that no valid levy of the attachment was shown by the evidence. The constable's return introduced in evidence was as follows: "I hereby certify that I received the annexed writ of attachment on the 2d day of October, 1878, and served the same on the same day by attaching the following described real estate, to-wit: Lots Nos. 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, in block No. 68, in the town of Modesto, Stanislaus county, state of California, and filing a notice thereof with the county recorder of said county, and delivering a copy of said attachment to B. B. Garner, an occupant of said real estate." It is claimed that this return is insufficient to show a valid levy for the reason that it does not show that the occupant of the land was served with notice that the property was attached, nor with a description of the premises sought to be attached, as provided by section 542 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The section referred to provides what shall be done to constitute an execution of the writ. If it be necessary for the return of the officer to set out, specifically, the acts done by him in executing the writ, the return before us is insufficient, as claimed. If, on the contrary, it is sufficient for the officer to make return in general terms that he served the writ by attaching the property, (describing it,) this return shows a valid levy. In order to show that the return was insufficient, counsel for appellant misstates the language of the return. He says: "His return is that he 'served the same by attaching the property [describing it] by filing a notice thereof with the county recorder of said county, and delivering a copy of said attachment to B. B. Garner, an occupant of said real estate.'" The return is not that he served the writ by filing the notice, etc., but that he served the same by attaching the property and filing the notice, etc.

If a general return that he served the writ by attaching the property (describing it) was sufficient, the additional statement therein that he also filed a notice, etc., may be regarded as surplusage, and we have a return showing a valid levy of the writ. The officer serving the writ is required to return the same, "with a certificate of his proceedings indorsed thereon or attached thereto." Code Civil Proc. § 559. If this were an open question, we should be inclined to hold that a general return of service was sufficient, and that it must be presumed, when the officer returned that he had served the writ by attaching the described property, that he had performed every act necessary to such service. Ritter v. Scannell, 11 Cal. 247. But this court has held to the contrary in the latter cases, and we feel that we should adhere to these decisions. Sharp v. Baird, 43 Cal. 579; Watt v. Wright, 66 Cal. 207, 5 Pac. Rep. 91, Gates v. McLean, 70 Cal. 47, 11 Pac. Rep. 489. Sharp v. Baird, supra, is directly in point. The court said in that case: "Section 14 of the Code requires the sheriff to return an attachment 'with a certificate of his proceedings indorsed thereon, or attached thereto.' It is his duty to state in his return what acts he performed in serving the writ, in order that the court may be enabled to decide upon its sufficiency to constitute a valid service. We must assume, therefore, that in these returns the sheriff stated all he did towards making the service; and, as these acts did not constitute a valid service, there was no lien created by the attachments." Watt v. Wright, supra, differs from the case at bar in that in the return passed upon there the officer made return that he had served the writ by doing certain acts, not including some of the acts named in the statute. Gates v. McLean, supra, decided that the very return we are now considering was not sufficient to show a valid levy. It is true, as contended by counsel for respondent, that the action before the court was not between the parties to this action, or their privies, and therefore not conclusively binding upon them; but it is a case directly in point, and should control our decision as to the sufficiency of this return. Kerns v. Dean, 77 Cal. 555, 19 Pac. Rep. 817.

[1] Sec. 318. No action for the recovery of real property, or for the recovery of the possession thereof, can be maintained, unless it appear that the plaintiff, his ancestor, predecessor, or grantor, was seised or possessed of the property in question within five years before the commencement of the action. Sec. 319. No cause of action or defense to an action arising out of the title to real property, or to rents or profits out of the same, can be effectual, unless it appear that the person prosecuting the action or making the defense, or under whose title the action is prosecuted or the defense is made, or the ancestor, predecessor, or grantor of such person, was seised or possessed of the premises in question within five years before the commencement of the act in respect to which such action is prosecuted or defense made. Sec. 738. An action may be brought by any person against another who claims an estate or interest in real property adverse to him, for the purpose of determining such adverse claim. Sec. 380. In an action brought by a person out of the possession of real property, to determine an adverse claim of an interest or estate therein, the person making such adverse claim and the persons in possession may be joined as defendants; and, if the judgment be for the plaintiff, he may have a writ for the possession of the premises, as against the defendant in the action, against whom the judgment has passed.

The respondent, recognizing the weakness of his case in this respect, attempted to piece out the constable's return by parol evidence that the acts required by the statute to constitute a valid levy of the writ, and omitted in the return, were actually done. The constable himself was called by the respondent, and it was proposed to prove by him that he had done the acts omitted in the return. This was objected to by the appellant on the ground that it was irrelevant and incompetent; that it was evidence tending to contradict the return of the officer; and that the appellant could not be bound by the acts done by the officer, but not set out in the return, and such acts would not be notice to him. As we read the constable's return this evidence did not tend in any way to contradict it. The offer was not to prove that the return was false in any respect, but to prove that something was done in addition to what was therein recited. Nor do we think the evidence could have been excluded on the ground that the appellant was not bound to take notice of acts done by the officer and not set out in his return. It is conceded that he had notice of the judgment and the issuance of the attachment. The return of the constable, and the recording of the notice of the attachment in the recorder's office, were notice sufficient to put him on inquiry, and, if the return might lawfully be aided by parol evidence, he was bound to take notice of the fact, and he took the land at his peril, and subject to the right of the respondent to make good his title by such evidence. The written return of an officer is not the only evidence of the fact that the writ was properly served; therefore, if the return simply omits to state any fact necessary to a valid service, such fact may be supplied by parol evidence, so long as the facts stated in the return are not varied or contradicted in such way as to affect vested rights. Ritter v. Scannell, 11 Cal. 249; Porter v. Pico, 55 Cal. 172; Davis v. Baker, 72 Cal. 495, 14 Pac. Rep. 102.

The lien of the attaching creditor does not depend upon the return of the officer, but upon the levy made by him, and if he has made the proper levy, and fails to make a proper or any return, the party in whose favor the writ is issued cannot be deprived of his rights under the same, but may, by other evidence, show that a valid levy was made. The same is true of a purchaser under an execution whose title depends upon the validity of the attachment levy. Wilson v. Madison, 55 Cal. 8; Blood v. Light, 38 Cal. 652. The cases cited by counsel for appellant are not in conflict with what we have said. They sustain the proposition that, where the officer states in his return that he did certain acts, as constituting the levy, which do not make the levy valid, subsequent purchasers have the right to rely upon such return as one stating, in effect, that the acts named were all the acts done by him. This doctrine is fully sustained by the authorities. But that is not this case. Here the officer states, in general terms, that he served the writ by attaching the property, and the fact that he proceeded to state, in addition, that he did certain acts, specifically naming them, is not sufficient to entitle a subsequent purchaser to reject the general statement in the return, and maintain that he did nothing but what is specifically set out. The authorities cited, to the effect that an officer cannot amend his return so as to affect rights which have vested on the faith of his return as originally made, have no bearing on the question. There was no offer here to change the return by parol evidence, which certainly could not be done so as to affect vested rights, but to prove something in addition to the facts recited in the return, and entirely consistent with it. It is in no sense an attempt to contradict, vary, or change the return.

It is further contended that the parol testimony was not sufficient to show a valid return. In this we fully agree with counsel for appellant. The only witness who testifies on the subject was the constable, who it was claimed made the levy. He testified that the levy was made 10 years before. It is perfectly apparent that he had no clear recollection of what had been done by him. After his attention had been called to the several papers about which he was expected to testify, his examination proceeded as follows: "Question. Under and by virtue of that writ of attachment what did you do? Answer. I levied on those lots; attached the lots. I put up notice of that kind, left a notice of that kind with B. B. Garner, the occupant of the property. I gave him a notice similar to this, a copy of the writ, and the notice that the property was attached. That is my recollection of it. Q. Then what did you do after giving the notice to Garner, the occupant? A. I filed this, or something similar to it, in the recorder's office here. Q. Did you do both of those things on the same day? A. I think so. I think I did. It was all right here in town, and I think I did it all the same day." And on cross-examination: "Question. This is ten years ago, isn't it? Answer. Yes, sir. Q. Have you any recollection now as to what you did on that occasion? A. Yes, sir. Q. You have a recollection? A. I have a recollection of doing just what I said I done. Q. You have a recollection of going to the premises and giving to Barney Garner some papers, have you? A. Yes, sir. Q. Do you recollect what papers you gave him? A. No; I couldn't say exactly what it was, any more than I gave him a copy of the writ of attachment and notice of attachment. That is what I suppose. Q. You suppose? A. Yes, sir. Q. And you only say that because it is your usual custom, isn't it? A. Not only that, but because it is my duty as well as my usual custom. Q. The question is now, have you any recollection of this particular act that took place ten years ago? A. I served a paper on Barney Garner. I can't say whether it was just as that is or not. There might be some difference in it. I couldn't say. There might have been a mistake, the same as there is in the return, but I intended it to be just as that is. Q. The question with me is a very easily answered one. Have you any recollection,—definite recollection,—now, as to what you served upon Barney Garner? A. I served a copy of the writ of attachment. Q. The basis of your testimony now is that you did serve him a copy of it, because that was your usual custom, and because it was your duty? A. I know I served a copy of the writ on him. Q. You know you served a copy of the writ? A. I don't know whether it was just word for word. Q. You don't know as to the notice? A. No; I wouldn't swear to it. Q. Now, let us see. Then, after having served this upon him, you then came and filed it in the recorder's office? That is your recollection? A. That is my recollection. It was filed there, I know. Q. And you recollect that act—that particular act—ten years ago, do you? A. Yes, sir. Q. Doing that particular act? A. Yes, sir; I am satisfied that I did. Q. Didn't you, a few moments ago, say that you could not swear that you did? A. I am satisfied that I did. Q. Didn't you, a few moments ago, say that you could not swear that you did give him a copy of that notice? A. I didn't swear it. I am satisfied that I did, but I am not going to swear that I did. Q. You are not going to swear that you did, but you are satisfied that you did? A. Yes, sir; I am. I served a notice,—a copy of the writ. I know that." The propriety of permitting the acts of an officer to be shown by parol, where he is required by law to make return thereof in writing, is open to serious question; and, where such proof is allowed, the evidence must be clear and satisfactory.

The evidence of this witness is anything but clear or satisfactory. As to one of the acts necessary to be done by him, viz., the service of the notice, he expressly says on cross-examination that he is not willing to swear that he served such notice, and he did not and would not swear that the other papers served were copies of the originals. It is evident that he testified to these facts, not from personal recollection of them, but because the law made it his duty to do certain things, and therefore he had done them. He presumed that in that instance the officer had done his duty,—a very natural presumption to be indulged in by him under the circumstances. If this evidence was sufficient, title to real estate in this class of cases must rest upon a most uncertain foundation. We know of no rule of law or reason that would justify us in holding it to have been sufficient, and we are clearly of the opinion that it was not. There are other questions discussed in the briefs, but, as the one last mentioned is decisive of the case, the others need not be considered. Judgment and order reversed, and cause remanded.

HEWES v. McLELLAN et al. (No. 9,652.)

TAX-SALE—DEED—ASSESSMENT.

1. Under Pol. Code Cal. § 3773, providing that "the person who will take the least quantity of land * * * and pay the taxes and costs due, including fifty cents to the collector for the duplicate certificate of sale, is the purchaser," if it appears from the tax-deed that 50 cents was charged for the certificate, instead of the duplicate certificate, the deed will not be invalidated on the ground that the sale was for 50 cents too much. Following Doland v. Mooney, 21 Pac. Rep. 436.

2. The provision in the statute that "the collector may designate" what portion shall be sold, leaves it in the discretion of the collector to sell either a part or the whole. Following Doland v. Mooney, 21 Pac. Rep. 436.

3. Under Pol. Code Cal. § 3785, providing that the deed must recite "substantially the matter contained in the certificate," and section 3776, providing that the certificate must specify "the time when the purchaser will be entitled to a deed," a statement in the deed that the certificate recited that the purchaser would be entitled to a deed on a certain date is sufficient.

4. Under Pol. Code Cal. § 3636, providing that, "if the name of the absent owner is known to the assessor, the property must be assessed in his name; if unknown, the property must be assessed to 'unknown owners,' "—in the absence of any evidence to the contrary, the person in whose name the property is assessed will be presumed to be the owner.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; M. A. EDMONDS, Judge.

Freeman & Bates and E. W. Ashby, for appellant. John H. Boalt, Chas. W. Wheeler, and E. A. & E. E. Lawrence, for respondents.

WORKS, J. Ejectment. The plaintiff based his right to recover on two tax-deeds, alike in form. The deeds were offered in evidence, and excluded on the defendants' objection. This left the plaintiff without any evidence of title, and judgment of nonsuit was rendered against him, from which he appeals.

The only question in the case is as to the validity of these tax-deeds. They were objected to on the following grounds: "(1) The deed shows that 50 cents was charged for the certificate, and hence the tax-sale was for too much by 50 cents. (2) The tax collector offered the entire lot for sale instead of the smallest quantity which any person would be willing to take and pay the tax. (3) That there is no recital in said deed that plaintiff was or would be entitled to a deed in one year. (4) The land was assessed to Thomas Hayes, not to the owner; that being no name in law."

The first and second of these objections are determined against the respondent by Doland v. Mooney 21 Pac. Rep. 436, as we understand that case. If not, we now hold that the deed was not subject to these objections. As to the first, all that can be said is that the deed shows that 50 cents was charged for the certificate, instead of the duplicate certificate, as allowed by the statute.[1] But there appears to have been but one 50 cents charged, which renders this difference in the recital wholly immaterial.

As to the second, the property was offered in the way that was held to have been proper in Doland v. Mooney, supra.

The third objection is based on the provision of the Code which requires the deed to contain the recitals contained in the certificate of sale, one of which was the time when the plaintiff was or would be entitled to a deed. The deed contains the statement that the certificate recited that "the purchaser will, if the property so sold be not redeemed within twelve months from such sale, be entitled to a deed thereof on the 3d day of April, 1882." The requirement of the Code that the deed shall recite when the purchaser will be entitled to it is absurd, and results from the general provision [1] that it shall contain the recitals contained in the certificate, which was enacted, no doubt, without observing that one at least of the recitals, proper in the certificate, would be entirely improper and useless in the deed as the recital of a fact. We think, therefore, that it was sufficient that the deed recited the fact that this statement was contained in the certificate.

[1] Pol. Code Cal. § 3773, provides that "the person who will take the least quantity of the land, * * * and pay the taxes and costs due, including fifty cents to the collector for the duplicate certificate of sale, is the purchaser."

The fourth objection seems to us to be frivolous. The Code provides: "If the name of the absent owner is known to the assessor, the property must be assessed in his name; if unknown, the property must be assessed to 'unknown owners.'" Pol. Code, § 3636. As the property was assessed in the name of Thomas Hayes, we must presume, in the absence of any showing to the contrary, that he was known by the assessor to be the owner, else the assessment would have been to "unknown owners." The certificate and deed are not required to state the name of the owner, but of the person assessed. Id. §§ 3776, 3786. It is not contended that this was not done in the present instance. The case of Roberts v. Chan Tin Pen, 23 Cal. 263, is cited in support of the objection that the property was not properly offered. That case does not support the contention of counsel. It was there held that the designation of the part of the property to be sold, and which was sold, was of an uncertain quantity, and that the sale was, for that reason, void. In this case there was no designation of a part, the offer being to the party who would take the least quantity of the land and pay the tax. The least that any one was willing to take was the whole. This was a definite amount, about which there could be no uncertainty. The statute in force at the time the sale mentioned in Roberts v. Chan Tin Pen was made, provided that in case the owner did not designate the part to be sold, then "the tax collector shall designate;" while the present statute provides that he may designate, etc. Pol. Code, § 3773. As this change was made by amendment, it may fairly be said that it was the intention of the legislature to leave it to the discretion of the tax collector to offer a part or the whole of the property, as he might think best. But, be this as it may, as the tax collector could find no bidder willing to pay the taxes for less than the whole property, there was no reason for designating a part less than the whole to be sold.

Counsel for respondent say that a deed precisely like the one under consideration was held to be invalid in Frink v. Roe, 70 Cal. 296, 320, 11 Pac. Rep. 820. The decision in that case was that "the tax-deed offered in evidence, executed by E. H. Washburn, tax collector, was properly excluded." The deed is not set out or mentioned in the opinion, except as above stated. We cannot know, therefore, on what ground this court held it to have been properly excluded. We think the deeds offered in evidence were valid, and that the court below erred in excluding them. There are some objections urged against them in this court that were not presented in the court below; but, conceding that objections to the admissibility of evidence that has been excluded can be made for the first time in this court, we hold that these additional objections are not well taken. Judgment reversed, and cause remanded.

ATTORNEY AND CLIENT—APPEAL.

1. In an action for services rendered as an attorney it appeared that the agreement was that the fee should be part of certain land when the client's title to it had been established. After a failure to recover the land, the attorney wrote to the client, proposing to go on with the litigation for a larger compensation. A witness testified that the attorney declined to proceed further under the old agreement. Held, that the evidence supported a finding that the attorney refused to perform the contract.

2. An excluded question will be presumed to be immaterial, unless the contrary appears from the question itself, or from an offer to prove the facts sought to be elicited by it.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; N. HAMILTON, Judge.

S. O. Houghton and John Reynolds, for appellants. Craig & Meredith, for respondent.

HAYNE, C. Action by attorneys to recover the value of professional services. Judgment passed for the defendant and the plaintiffs appeal.

It appears that the attorneys were retained in several suits in relation to certain land claimed by the client. During the pendency of the litigation the parties entered into a written agreement, whereby the client agreed to convey, and the attorneys to accept, a portion of the land in full satisfaction of all services rendered and to be rendered by them in the litigation. Nothing was said in the agreement as to whether the conveyance was to be contingent upon success in the litigation, but such was evidently the understanding of the parties; and the attorneys subsequently wrote a letter to the client in which they stated that, "to avoid any question in the matter, we hereby agree that we will not demand any conveyance of your land until your title shall be finally established." It was admitted that the agreement applied to all pending suits. The court found that the conveyance was to be made on condition that the title of the client should be finally established. The title of the client was not finally or otherwise established. It would seem that his success depended upon establishing that a decree in a certain foreclosure suit was valid. One of the cases came before the supreme court, which finally decided that the decree in the foreclosure suit was invalid; from which decision it seems to follow that the title of the client was not good. Nothing further appears to have been done with the other suits. But the attorneys had some idea that they could bring a bill in equity, "with a view of correcting, if possible, the defect in the decree of foreclosure," and that they drafted a bill "for that purpose, and for the purpose of enjoining the judgment." After this the client effected a compromise of the litigation, and in pursuance thereof conveyed to a third party the portion which he was to have conveyed to the attorneys. Since the title of the client was not established, it is clear that the attorneys have no claim upon the theory of performance of their agreement, and they make no such claim. Their position seems to be that they were prevented from performing the agreement by the act of the client in making the compromise. We do not deem it necessary to inquire whether any good could have come out of an attempt through a bill in equity to impart validity to a decree which had been finally decided to be invalid, or whether any different showing could have been made in the other suits; for upon the record before us we think that it must be held that there was no prevention. In this regard the trial court finds that after the decision by the supreme court, above referred to, the plaintiffs "refused to render to defendant any further services as attorneys unless he entered into a new agreement," giving them a larger share of the land; that he refused to enter into such new agreement, and thereupon made the compromise. It is manifest that if the attorneys refused to render further services they cannot claim that they were prevented from rendering them, or complain that the defendant took them at their word. Therefore, unless this finding can be set aside as unsupported by the evidence, the judgment and order appealed from must be affirmed. Such, in our opinion, is the question upon which the decision on this appeal must turn; and we think that the evidence upon the point was substantially conflicting, and that the finding cannot be set aside. It is certain that a letter was written by one of the attorneys to the client, in which the writer proposed to go on with the litigation for a larger compensation, and in which he, after stating that the partnership between him and his associate had been dissolved, said: "I expect to have his assistance in this matter to the end." The explanation given of this letter was that additional services were contemplated by the attorneys, and that it was a mere proposal by one of the former firm without the authority of his associate; and it is argued that "a careful reading of this letter will show that it contains no refusal to proceed under the contract." We think, however, that the client was justified in inferring from the letter that the attorneys were unwilling to proceed upon the basis of the existing agreement. And the wife of the client testified positively that the attorney (who seems to have been the one who had the management of the cases) "told me distinctly that he would not go any further under the old contract;" and that she never would have thought of compromising the litigation except for such refusal. She said she would communicate with her husband, who was then in Sonoma. And in a few days she went to Sonoma, and submitted the letter to him, and presumably told him what was said in connection with it. Apparently without further communication with the attorneys, the compromise was made. This evidence raises a substantial conflict with reference to the question of refusal; and if there was a refusal we think that it was not incumbent upon the client to communicate further with the attorneys.

[1] Pol. Code Cal. § 3785, provides that the deed must recite "substantially the matter contained in the certificate."

It is contended that there was error in sustaining the defendant's objection to the question at folio 122. The question does not of itself indicate whether the answer to it would have been material or not, and there was no offer to prove the facts sought to be elicited by it. Therefore it cannot be determined from the record whether there was error or not; and, as the appellant must show error, the ruling is no ground for reversal. Marshall v. Hancock, ante, 261. We therefore advise that the judgment and order appealed from be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; GIBSON, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

WORKS, J. Action to quiet title to real estate. Trial by jury, and verdict and judgment for the plaintiff. The defendants appeal.

The controlling question in the case was as to the execution of a deed for the property in controversy from the plaintiff's grantor to the defendant Elizabeth Weir prior to the deed under which the former claimed title. The alleged deed was not produced, had never been recorded, and was claimed, at the trial, to have been lost. The effort was made to prove the existence of the deed, and that the name of the grantor signed thereto was his genuine signature. It was attempted to prove by the defendant Elizabeth Weir that the signature to the lost deed was the same as the one signed to a purported deed of the alleged grantor, which was produced and shown to the witness. To this the plaintiff objected, on the ground that the signature to the deed, which was attempted to be used by way of comparison, was not shown to be genuine. The objection was sustained, and this is assigned as error. The testimony was properly excluded on the ground stated. It was also objectionable for the reason that the witness was not an expert, and the question called for a mere opinion. Counsel for appellants cite several authorities to sustain their contention that the evidence was competent, but none of them are in point.

It is also claimed that the court below erred in refusing to allow a son of the defendant to testify to the description and form of the letters in the name "A. Hemme," the alleged grantor in the lost deed, from his recollection of it from having seen it before the deed was lost. This evidence might have been competent and important if there had been any evidence tending to show the forms of the letters in the genuine signature of Hemme, but, as there was no such evidence, the exclusion of the proposed evidence was harmless, conceding it to have been competent; and the remark of the court below as to the weight that should be given such testimony was equally harmless for the same reason.

There was an attempt, also, to prove the genuineness of the signature to the lost deed by another witness. The witness testified that he had "seen a few" of Hemme's signatures. Had never seen him write, but had seen a great deal of his handwriting. If he had stopped there his opinion might have been competent, but he was asked: "How do you know it is his handwriting," (meaning the handwriting he had seen,) and answered: "I do not know whether it was or not. It looked like it." He was then asked whether the signature to the deed was Hemme's. To this the plaintiff objected, and the objection was sustained. There was no error in this ruling. The witness did not testify that he knew Hemme's signature; that he had ever seen him write; or that he had ever seen any writing that he knew to have been his. Therefore no foundation was laid for the opinion he was asked to give.

It is claimed by the appellants that the objection to the question was not sufficiently definite. But if the exclusion was proper on any ground, the cause will not be reversed, no matter what was the actual objection made, unless the objection not urged might have been obviated. People v. Graham, 21 Cal. 266; Miller v. Van Tassel, 24 Cal. 463. The court might properly have excluded the evidence without any objection being made. People v. Turcott, 65 Cal. 127, 3 Pac. Rep. 461. It is quite obvious that the objection to this evidence could not have been obviated. The witness showed by his own testimony that he was not competent to give the opinion he was asked to give.

There are other errors assigned upon rulings in the exclusion of evidence, but none of them are well taken.

One of the grounds of the motion for a new trial was newly-discovered evidence. We have carefully read the affidavits in support of and against the motion, and are satisfied there was no error in denying the motion on this ground. There was no error in allowing the plaintiff to file counter-affidavits on the motion after the time fixed by the Code, under the showing made that they had been prepared and copies served, and the filing had been omitted by oversight and mistake. As we view the testimony in this case, the alleged newly-discovered evidence could not properly have changed the result; and for this reason, if for no other, the court below was right in refusing a new trial on this ground. Rainey v. State, 53 Ind. 278. The refusal to grant a new trial on this ground is reviewable in this court only for abuse of discretion, (Hobler v. Cole, 49 Cal. 250;) and newly-discovered evidence as a ground for a new trial is not regarded with favor, (Baker v. Joseph, 16 Cal. 180; Arnold v. Skaggs, 35 Cal. 686.) The showing in this case does not impress us favorably, to say nothing more of it. There was no abuse of discretion in denying the motion. Judgment and order affirmed.

GODFREY v. MILLER. (No. 11,706.)

INSOLVENCY—PREFERENCES.

In an action to recover property under insolvent act Cal. 1880, § 55, providing that any property transferred by an insolvent within one month before the filing of his petition, with intent to prefer any creditor, to a person who had reasonable cause to believe the debtor to be insolvent, and that his intent was to prevent the property from going to his assignee, may be recovered, it appeared that the insolvent had collected money for defendant, and tortiously converted it; that he had notified defendant that his property would probably be attached the next day; that he turned over to defendant two days before the filing of his petition as an insolvent, and on a Sunday, the property in controversy in part payment of his debt; and that defendant received the property without making such an inspection and trial as he would have made under ordinary circumstances. Defendant testified that he took the property without design to defraud the other creditors of insolvent. The court found that defendant had acquired the property without any reason to believe that insolvent was unable to pay his debts, and without intent to evade any provision of the act. Held, that the finding was not supported by the evidence.

PATERSON, J., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; E. M. GIBSON, Judge.

John Reynolds and S. L. Rodgers, for appellant. J. E. Foulds, for respondent.

FOX, J. This action was brought by plaintiff, as assignee of the estate of an insolvent debtor, to recover the possession or value of a horse and carriage alleged to have been transferred by the insolvent to defendant, in violation of section 55[1] of the insolvent act. The case was tried by the court, and judgment given for the defendant, from which, and from an order denying a new trial, the plaintiff appealed.

The following is one of the findings: "(10) That the defendant took and received the property described in the complaint from the possession of said A. C. Gilbert within ten days before the filing of his petition as an insolvent debtor, as aforesaid, to-wit, on the 15th day of March, A. D. 1885, but that the same was purchased by the defendant from the said Gilbert for a valuable consideration, in good faith, and without intent to hinder, delay, or defraud any creditor or creditors of said Gilbert, or to violate any provision of the insolvent act of 1880. That at the time of said sale and delivery of said property said defendant had no reasonable cause to believe that said A. C. Gilbert was insolvent, and that such transfer of said property was made with a view to prevent his property from coming to his assignee in insolvency, or to prevent the same from being distributed ratably among his creditors, or to defeat the object of, or in any way hinder, impede, or delay the operation of, or to evade, any of the provisions of said act." It is this finding particularly that is attacked, on the ground that the evidence is insufficient to justify the same. From other findings it appears that on and prior to the 13th day of March, 1885, said A. C. Gilbert had collected moneys for the defendant to the amount of more than $800, including $607 which he had so collected on a note belonging to defendant, and of which last-named collection the defendant was not informed until on the said 13th day of March; that the moneys so collected by Gilbert for defendant had been used by Gilbert for his own benefit, without the knowledge or consent of defendant; that on the 14th of March defendant notified Gilbert by letter that he should call on him for the amount of said last collection; that on the 15th of March, which was Sunday, Gilbert went to the defendant, taking with him the horse and carriage described in the complaint, and informed defendant that he had none of defendant's money, and could not pay him; that certain of his property had been theretofore attached, and he had released the same; that on the day before (the 14th) it had again been attached by another creditor, and that he had been unable to release the same, and that he expected a further attachment would be levied on the following day, (the 16th,) and that if he were allowed time he could work out of his difficulties. He thereupon proposed to defendant that he should take the horse and carriage in part payment of the amount which he had collected on the $600 note, and, after some negotiations, the defendant agreed to take the same and credit Gilbert with the sum of $450 therefor, and the same was thereupon, on the said 15th day of March, delivered to the defendant, who had ever since retained the same. Defendant was not informed by Gilbert that he contemplated filing a petition in insolvency, and he knew nothing of Gilbert's financial difficulties, except what was told him by Gilbert, as aforesaid. Gilbert had been doing a large business, and had theretofore been believed by defendant to be perfectly solvent. The court also found that the defendant did not try the horse before making the purchase, and that he would not, under ordinary circumstances, have made such a purchase without first trying the horse.

The only evidence claimed to be in support of the tenth finding was that given by the defendant, as follows: "Question. Did you know, or did you have any cause to believe, that the transfer of this horse and buggy by Mr. Gilbert to yourself was made with a view to prevent the same from coming to his assignee in insolvency, or to prevent the same from being distributed ratably among his creditors, or to defeat the object of, or in any way to hinder, impede, or delay the operation of, or to evade, any of the provisions of the insolvency act? Answer. No." Before the answer was given the question was objected to as irrelevant and incompetent, and to the order of the court overruling the objection an exception was duly taken. That exception was well taken. In the form in which the question was put, it should not have been allowed. There were five questions in one. Which question should he answer? Which one did he answer? Whether he "had any reason to believe" was a question for the court, and not for the witness. Witnesses are to testify to facts, and from them the court is to determine what belief may properly be founded upon them. But in the view we take of this case this error becomes immaterial. The witness further testified that Gilbert had the horse and cariage long before he collected the money for him; and also that he, the witness, took the horse and carriage to save himself.

In view of this evidence, understanding that it is all there was on that subject, and of all the findings in the case, we do not see how this tenth finding can stand. If the transfer was not made in the usual and ordinary course of business, the statute makes that fact itself prima facie evidence of fraud. This certainly was not. It was made on a Sunday, between one attachment levied on Saturday and another that was expected on Monday, of both which facts the defendant was advised. The defendant took the property "to save himself," according to his own testimony, and also without trying it; a thing which he says himself he would not do under ordinary circumstances. It is true, prima facie evidence may always be overcome by other sufficient proof; but, under the circumstances developed here, we do not think there is other sufficient or any proof to sustain this finding. Even if Gilbert did not tell him in so many words that he contemplated filing a petition in insolvency, he must have had good reason to believe, from the facts which are found and undisputed, that Gilbert was in an insolvent condition; and it is certain that he took the property to prevent it being attached by some other creditor, and therefore the taking was contrary to the tenth finding, with intent to hinder, delay, and defraud any creditor or creditors of Gilbert. It was taken "to save himself," as against anticipated proceedings which would subject it to the claims of other creditors; a fact not consonant with the "good faith" found by the court. Two days afterwards the petition in insolvency was filed. It is hardly possible that Gilbert did not contemplate it on the Sunday when this singular transaction occurred, and enough was then brought home to the knowledge of defendant to put him upon inquiry, and to make him know that a preference was offered to him in fraud of other creditors. He was, in fact, put upon notice of the insolvency of Gilbert. "The fact that a sale of goods by an insolvent is not made in the usual and ordinary course of business is sufficient to charge the purchaser with notice of the insolvency of the seller." Ohleyer v. Bunce, 65 Cal. 544, 4 Pac. Rep. 549.

[1] Section 55 provides that any property transferred by an insolvent within one month before filing his petition, with intent to prefer any creditor, to a person who had reasonable cause to believe the debtor to be an insolvent, and that his intent was to prevent the property from going to his assignee, may be recovered.

But it is urged that the defendant did not stand in the same relation to Gilbert that other creditors did, and therefore had a right to this preference; that the debt due to him was for moneys held by Gilbert in a fiduciary capacity, thus creating a liability from which Gilbert could not be discharged in insolvency. To our minds that point militates against the defendant rather than in his favor. If he was better protected than the others, all the more reason why he should not be a party to an attempt to defraud them. Judgment and order appealed from reversed.

Contract—Mutual Assent.

Where plaintiff testifies that "agreement with Hudson [the defendant] was made September 9th at my office in Fresno; next saw Mr. Hudson four or five days thereafter; came and asked me to release him;" and defendant testifies that after the paper was made he next saw plaintiff at his office on the 15th of September, and said, "Mr. Martin, [the plaintiff,] I would like you to give up that contract,"—the evidence is sufficient to support a finding that defendant had asked to be released from the offer before plaintiff had accepted it.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; B. Campbell, Judge.

Church & Cory, for appellant. Wharton & Short and D. S. Terry, for respondent.

Belcher, C. C. This action was brought to enforce the specific performance of an alleged contract to sell and convey certain real property. The court below gave judgment for the defendant, and the plaintiff appeals. The record shows that on the 9th day of September, 1887, the defendant executed and delivered to plaintiff a paper, by which he agreed to sell and convey the property in question for the sum of $5,000 —one-half payable on delivery of deed, and the balance one year thereafter, with interest at the rate of 8 per cent per annum; the "contract" to be "valid till November 1, 1887, and thereafter till revoked in writing." The court found that the paper was executed as above stated; that no consideration whatever ever passed from the plaintiff to the defendant therefor; and that it was a mere proposal or offer to sell. It then further found "that thereafter, and on or about the 15th day of September, 1887, and before the plaintiff had in any way accepted said offer, or agreed to accept the same, the defendant went to the plaintiff and requested the return of said offer, and asked to be released therefrom, and verbally withdrew the same."

It is claimed by counsel for appellant that this finding was not justified by the evidence, but in effect admitted that if it was justified the judgment should be affirmed. Counsel say in their reply brief: "There is no question, and no contention to the contrary has been made, that a proposal to sell land, made without consideration, may be withdrawn before acceptance. Had the offer made by defendant to plaintiff to sell him the land been withdrawn before acceptance, that would have been an end of the matter, and plaintiff have had no standing in court. Here, then, is the question, and the only question, to be considered in this case: Was said offer accepted before rescission, or the attempted rescission?" We think there was evidence tending to support the finding. The plaintiff was a witness, and on cross-examination testified: "Agreement with Hudson was made September 9th at my office in Fresno; next saw Mr. Hudson four or five days thereafter; came and asked me to release him." Defendant was also a witness, and testified that after the paper was made he next saw the plaintiff at his office on the 15th of September, and said: "Mr. Martin, I would like you to give up that contract." No point is or could be made that a verbal withdrawal by respondent of his offer to sell, if made before acceptance, was not sufficient; but the contention of appellant is that there was no verbal or other withdrawal or attempted withdrawal by him until the 17th day of September, when he served a written notice of rescission, and that prior to that time appellant had verbally and unqualifiedly accepted the offer. But, in view of the testimony above quoted, we think this contention cannot be sustained. As we cannot say that the finding was not justified by the evidence, it follows, in our opinion, that the judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: Hayne, C.; Foote, C.

Review on Appeal.

1. Under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 939, an exception to the decision on the ground that it is not supported by the evidence will not be considered, unless the appeal is taken within 60 days after judgment.

2. An allegation in a suit to cancel a deed, that the alleged maker never had, after the making of the deed, sufficient strength of mind or body to deliver it, "and the said deed never was delivered by" him, sufficiently raises the question of delivery, when denied in the answer, to require a finding on such issue.

In bank. On rehearing. For opinion on hearing in department, see 21 Pac. Rep. 948.

E. B. & S. W. Holladay, (Craig & Meredith, of counsel,) for appellant. M. Cooney, for respondents.

Sharpstein, J. The transcript contains a bill of exceptions, and the appeal is from the judgment. The findings were filed on the 7th day of January, 1885, and the notice of appeal on the 10th day of October, 1885. As the appeal was not taken within 60 days after the rendition of the judgment, we cannot review an exception to the decision on the ground that it is not supported by the evidence. Code Civil Proc. § 939. The finding "that the said Michael Hyde did not at any time deliver said deed to said Ellen Hyde, the person named therein as grantor," is attacked by appellant on two grounds: (1) That it is not supported by the evidence; (2) that it is outside the issues. For reasons already stated, we cannot consider the first of these grounds; and the second, in our opinion, is untenable. The allegation of the complaint "that if the said Michael Hyde ever signed or acknowledged the said instrument he was forced and unduly influenced to do so by the defendant, and he had not then, or at any time since the 8th day of May, 1882, sufficient strength of mind or body to execute or deliver the said deed, or to understand its provisions or covenants, and the said deed never was delivered by said Michael Hyde to the defendant," in our opinion is an allegation of non-delivery of the deed. This, and all the other allegations of the complaint, were denied by the answer of the defendant. That, we think, presented an issue upon which it was the duty of the court to find. As the court found upon all the issues, and the findings support the judgment, it must be affirmed.

Gross v. Kelleher et al. (No. 12,388.)

Review on Appeal.

A motion by defendant for a new trial was granted, unless the plaintiff remitted $25 of the judgment. Defendant's notice of appeal was from the order granting a new trial. There was nothing to show that plaintiff had remitted the $25. Held that, as it appeared from the record that the judgment appealed from was vacated by the order granting a new trial, there was nothing before the court for consideration.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; T. H. Rearden, Judge.

Moses G. Cobb, for appellant. Joseph Mee, for respondent.

Works, J. This is an appeal from an order granting a new trial to the appellant on her own motion, and from a judgment against her. The order appealed from is as follows: "The motion of defendant Catherine Kelleher for a new trial having this day come on to be heard, and the matter having been argued and submitted to the court for decision, and the matter being fully considered, ordered that the same be granted, unless plaintiff forthwith file a waiver of twenty-five ($25) dollars of the money part of the judgment herein. If such waiver be filed, then that the new trial be denied. Filed August 5, 1887." The notice of appeal was as follows: "You will please take notice that the defendant in the above-entitled action hereby appeals to the supreme court of the state of California from the order of said court granting her motion for a new trial, made on the 5th day of August, and more particularly from so much of said order as permits the plaintiff to prevent the said grant of a new trial by the remission of $25 damages in the judgment recovered by him; and also from the judgment therein entered in the said superior court on the 13th day of June, 1887, in favor of the plaintiff in the said action, and against said defendant, and from the whole thereof."

There is nothing in the record showing or tending to show that the plaintiff ever remitted the amount mentioned in the order. If not, the order was one granting a new trial. We must presume the amount was not remitted, as the notice of appeal was from an order granting a new trial. This condition of the record renders it unnecessary for us to examine and pass upon the questions attempted to be presented upon the merits, as the judgment appealed from was vacated by the order granting a new trial; but we may say that we have carefully read the appellant's brief and the transcript, and are satisfied that no error was committed by the court below of which she has any reason to complain. If any error was committed, it was against the respondent, in requiring him to remit a part of his judgment or submit to a new trial. Judgment and order affirmed, with 20 per cent. damages.

Judgment—Res Adjudicata.

Defendants, first mortgagees, brought an action to foreclose, and made plaintiff, a second mortgagee, a party defendant. Pending suit, plaintiff bought the mortgagor's interest. After judgment, but before sale, a receiver was appointed, who collected the rents and profits until the sheriff's deed was given, defendants having purchased at the sale, when an account was had, and by order of court the amount of rents collected was applied in payment of a deficiency from proceeds of the sale. Defendants took possession and collected the rents pending an appeal from the judgment of foreclosure, which resulted in reversal. A new trial was had, a similar judgment rendered, and defendants again bought at sheriff's sale. On accounting before the court on the second trial, defendants had their mortgage debt credited by the amount received from the receiver, and by the amount of all the rents they had collected up to that time. Held, that plaintiff could not maintain an action against them to recover the rents so collected on the ground that he was the owner during the time defendants collected them. Having been a party to the foreclosure proceedings, and having acquiesced in the accounting, he is bound by the judgment therein. Paterson, J., dissenting.

Divorce for Drunkenness.

Under Civil Code Cal. § 106, providing that habitual intemperance as a ground for divorce shall be such intemperance as "would reasonably inflict a course of great mental anguish upon an innocent party," a complaint in divorce alleging intemperance as a ground, in the language of the statute, is sufficient without alleging the different acts of intoxication, and how the anguish was caused.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; F. W. Lawler, Judge.

Charles J. Swift, for appellant. Burnett & Bartlett, (Lester G. Burnett, of counsel,) for respondent.

Works, J. Action for divorce. Finding and judgment for plaintiff. The appeal is from the judgment, and the case comes to us on the judgment roll. The grounds for divorce are stated in the complaint as follows: "That for four years and eight months last past said defendant has been, and still is, guilty of habitual intemperance, and is habitually intemperate from the use of intoxicating drinks to that degree that the intemperance of defendant reasonably inflicts a course of great mental anguish upon said plaintiff, and to that degree which did in fact during that whole time inflict, and still inflicts, a course of great mental anguish upon her; and that during all that time said plaintiff has been an innocent party with respect to said intemperance. That defendant was so intemperate from the use of intoxicating drinks, then and theretofore, and acted so cruelly and in such a threatening manner towards the plaintiff in consequence of such intemperance, that it became necessary for her to, and she thereafter did, on August 13, 1884, at Cayucas, San Luis Obispo county, Cal., leave the defendant, and has not returned to him. That the course and conduct of defendant aforesaid and his habits of intemperance have not changed for the better at any time since the plaintiff so left him." The findings of the court are, in effect, the same as the allegations of the complaint. The contention of the appellant is that the complaint and findings are defective and insufficient, for the reason that they state conclusions of law, and not the facts; that it is not enough to allege habitual intemperance to a degree which caused great mental anguish, but the extent of such intoxication, and the acts done by him while in that condition, tending to cause such mental anguish, and reasonably sufficient to bring about such a result, must be specifically alleged and found. The Code provides: "Habitual intemperance is that degree of intemperance from the use of intoxicating drinks which * * * would reasonably inflict a course of great mental anguish upon an innocent party." Civil Code, § 106. The complaint and findings are in the language of this provision of the Code. The contention of counsel for the appellant, as we understand him, is that this is not enough; that the acts and conduct of defendant, showing that he was intoxicated to the extent required by the statute, must be set forth. In other words, the complaint must allege just how often he was intoxicated, and to what extent, on each occasion; and what he did and said when in that condition, tending to cause mental anguish. We are not inclined to this view. The allegations contained in the complaint were allegations of fact, not conclusions of law, and, being charged in the language of the statute, and found in the same way, the complaint and findings were sufficient. Judgment affirmed.

Declarations of Trust—Statute of Frauds.

1. Plaintiff's decedent conveyed certain land to defendant, his brother, to avoid his creditors. Defendant at the time signed and acknowledged a deed of the land to his brother, which was not delivered, and the nature of the deed was not shown. Defendant testified that he afterwards paid for the land, and the deed was destroyed by consent. Held, that the deed did not constitute a written declaration of trust.

2. Testimony of defendant, taken down in writing after the death of his brother, and in settlement of the estate, is not a written declaration of trust, even if defendant admitted therein that there was such a trust.

3. A statement of account, given to the widow of deceased, merely showing the amount defendant had received as rent, and certain expenditures made, did not amount to a written declaration of trust.

4. Under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1971, and Civil Code, § 852, in order to establish a trust over any estate in real property it must be proven that the trust was created "by operation of law, or a conveyance or other instrument in writing."

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; T. H. Rearden, Judge.

Minnie C. Hasshagen, as administratrix of Louis Hasshagen, deceased, sued John G. Hasshagen and others, to declare a trust in certain real estate, for a reconveyance, and an accounting. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1971, provides that no estate in real property, nor any trust therein, can be established otherwise than by operation of law, or a conveyance or other instrument in writing.

Joseph Kirk, for appellants. Taylor & Haight, for respondent.

Works, J. This action was brought to declare an express trust in land. The court below found that the conveyance from the plaintiff's intestate to the defendant "was made without consideration, and on the trust expressed and declared by said John in writing, that he, said John, would hold the premises therein conveyed for and to the use of said Louis, and that said Louis might have the same back again, together with all rents issuing therefrom, whenever desired by him, said Louis." It is contended by the appellants that there was no evidence to support this finding. The contention of the respondent is that the written declaration of the trust was established by —First, proof of the making, signing, and acknowledging of a deed of reconveyance at the time the property was conveyed to the defendant; second, by the testimony of the defendant, given in the matter of the estate of the deceased, in which he admitted the trust, the testimony being taken down in writing at the time; third, a statement of account.

1. The deed referred to, and claimed to have been a written declaration of trust, was not shown to have contained any such declaration. The evidence shows that at the time the deed from the deceased to the defendant for the property in controversy was delivered, a deed from the defendant back to the deceased was signed and acknowledged, but not delivered. The deed, not having been delivered, was not effective for any purpose; but, if it had been delivered, its contents were not proved, and we cannot know whether it was an absolute conveyance, a declaration of trust, or what not. Besides, the uncontradicted testimony of the defendant is that the conveyance from his brother to him was made by the former to avoid litigation with his creditors; that this deed for a reconveyance was made and retained by the defendant; that he afterwards paid his brother for the property in full; that he and his brother had a settlement of their affairs, and that the deed, instead of being delivered, was by the mutual consent of the parties destroyed. We cannot see, therefore, how this deed could be held to constitute a written declaration of a trust.

2. The evidence given by the defendant, and taken down in writing, did not constitute a written declaration of a trust, even if he had admitted therein that there was such a trust. But, instead of admitting any such trust, he positively denied it, and asserted that he had paid for the property in full. He did admit that there was a verbal understanding between him and his brother that the property was to be reconveyed. He says: "We had a verbal understanding that whenever he paid me what he owed I would deed him the property;" and says: "If paid now the money I gave to Louis Hasshagen, I don't think I would have any objection to reconveying this property to his heirs." This evidence had some tendency to show a verbal agreement that the property should be held in trust, but not that such a trust was declared in writing. This testimony, relied upon as a declaration of trust, was given long after the making of the deed, after the death of Louis Hasshagen and in the settlement of his estate.

3. The statement of account, relied upon as establishing a trust, was not one given by the defendant to the deceased, but to the plaintiff, his widow, and was merely a statement showing the amount the defendant received as rent, and how he had paid it out; some of the expenditures being for insurance, interest, and other expenses, and some payments to the plaintiff. There was nothing in this which could amount to a written declaration of a trust. There was an entire absence of any evidence to sustain the claim of an express trust, or to support the findings of the court below that there was any such trust. For this reason the motion of the defendant for a nonsuit should have been sustained, and the findings referred to are not sustained by the evidence. There was some evidence of circumstances tending to show that there was a verbal understanding that the property was held for the benefit of the deceased, such as the collection of the rents by the deceased, and payment of rents collected by the defendant to the plaintiff after the death of her husband. The explanation of these transactions by the defendant is not satisfactory. He says the money paid to her, and allowed by him to be collected and used by the brother, was merely by way of gift. But this cannot help the respondent's case. In order to entitle her to recover it was necessary for her to prove that the trust attempted to be established was created or declared in writing, or by operation of law. Civil Code, § 852; Code Civil Proc. § 1971; Feeney v. Howard, 21 Pac. Rep. 984; Barr v. O'Donnell, 76 Cal. 469, 18 Pac. Rep. 429; Donohoe v. Mining Co., 66 Cal. 327, 5 Pac. Rep. 495; Hellman v. McWilliams, 70 Cal. 452, 11 Pac. Rep. 659. There was nothing shown which could take this case out of the statute. Feeney v. Howard and Barr v. O'Donnell, supra. Nor was there anything in the transaction which could create a resulting trust. Feeney v. Howard, supra; Mescall v. Tully, 91 Ind. 96, 97; Barr v. O'Donnell, supra.

It is evident from the facts disclosed by the evidence that the original intent and purpose of the deceased in conveying the property was to hinder and defraud his creditors. The evidence of the defendant is that this purpose was finally abandoned, and he paid the consideration named in the deed. But whether he did or not, the object of the deceased being to defraud his creditors, and the agreement to reconvey, if one was made, having been verbal, there is the strongest reason in this case for a strict application of the statute of frauds. Judgment and order reversed, and cause remanded.

Romine v. Cralle et al. (No. 13,228.)

Dismissal of Appeal.

1. The supreme court can, after an order dismissing an appeal, and after a remittitur is sent to the court below, modify the order of dismissal so as to read "without prejudice."

2. A motion for a new trial was heard and denied October 15, 1888. Defendant excepted, but took no appeal. February, 1889, the motion was again called up, and denied on the ground that it had been decided in October. Held, that the order of February was not appealable, and an appeal from the order in October, taken more than 60 days thereafter, came too late.

3. The order denying the motion for new trial was not void because made in the absence of one attorney of record, where another was present, and the record shows no lack of authority to appeal on his part.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Sonoma county; Walter H. Levy, Judge. John F. Burris, (Carroll Cook and R. M. Swain, of counsel,) for appellants. Laughlin & Thompson, for respondent.

Thornton, J. Motion by respondent (plaintiff in court below) to dismiss two appeals. One of these appeals is from the judgment, and the other from the order denying a new trial. The appeal from the judgment is the second appeal from it. It appears that on the 18th day of January, 1889, an appeal from the judgment in this case was dismissed. On the next day the remittitur was sent to the court below. On the 22d of the same month the order dismissing the appeal was, on motion of appellant's counsel, modified so as to read "without prejudice." It is now urged that this court had no power to modify the order of dismissal after the remittitur had been issued; but we are of opinion that this court had, notwithstanding this fact, power over the order, and to modify it so as to permit the prosecution of a second appeal. The matter of prosecuting a second appeal from the judgment was one peculiarly within the power of this court, with the exercise of which power the lower court had no concern. This court could, in the exercise of its discretion, allow the plaintiff to prosecute a second appeal, and it was not divested of such power by the issuance of the remittitur on the dismissal of a prior appeal. The modification was one still within its discretion. We think the modification of the order of dismissal was properly made; therefore the motion to dismiss the appeal from the judgment is denied.

It is asked that the appeal from the order denying a new trial should be dismissed for the reason that a motion for a new trial had been made at a prior day, and was heard and denied by an order entered on the 15th day of October, 1888. To this order defendant, (appellant,) by his counsel, excepted, but no appeal was taken from it. The notice of this motion was served and filed on the 8th of October, 1888. On the 25th of February, 1889, this motion was again called up for hearing, when objection was made by counsel for plaintiff that it had been heard and decided on the 15th day of October, 1888, and should not be heard, and, if heard, should be denied. Thereupon the court denied the motion. It is objected that the order of the 25th of February, 1889, is not an appealable order. This contention must be sustained. The appeal should have been taken from the order of the 15th of October. As an appeal from the order last named, as it was taken more than 60 days after it was made, it was too late. It is said that the order of the 15th of October, denying the motion for a new trial, should be regarded as void, because it was made in the absence of one of the attorneys of record. But another of the attorneys of record appeared for the moving party. It is said that the latter attorney was not authorized to appear. The record shows no lack of authority. He signed the answer of the defendant (the moving party) as one of his attorneys. If he was not authorized to appear, that should have been inquired into by the court below. We cannot consider it. The record filed herein shows that he had authority, and this court cannot go behind the record. The motion to dismiss the appeal from the judgment is denied, and the motion to dismiss the appeal from the order denying a new trial is granted. So ordered.

Moulton v. McDermott et al. (No. 12,089.)

Ejectment—Parties—Tenants in Common.

Under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 384, providing that "all persons holding as tenants in common, * * * or any number less than all, may jointly or severally commence or defend any civil action or proceeding for the enforcement or protection of the rights of such party," one of several co-distributees of the estate of a decedent may maintain ejectment against another person in possession of the entire premises distributed.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge. H. A. Powell, for appellant. Carl T. Graef, for respondents.

Hayne, C. Ejectment. The answer, among other things, pleaded a non-joinder of parties plaintiff, as follows: "That there is a defect of parties plaintiff, which defect does not appear on the face of the complaint, for the non-joinder of Calvin R. Moulton, Ellen N. Verrinder, nee Moulton, and Frank E. Moulton, in this, viz.: That plaintiff claims as the devisee of one E. S. Moulton, deceased, who in his life-time pretended that he had a right of property in the parcel of land described in the complaint, and made plaintiff and other said parties co-devisees thereof." The plaintiff gave evidence tending to show that the defendant was the tenant of one Mrs. Chase; that while defendant was such tenant Mrs. Chase conveyed to one E. S. Moulton; that Moulton died, and a decree of distribution of his estate was regularly made, "which distributes the premises in controversy, three-quarters thereof to Mary S. Moulton, the plaintiff; one-twelfth thereof to Calvin R. Moulton; one-twelfth thereof to Ellen N. Verrinder; and one-twelfth thereof to Frank Moulton." The defendant objected to the admission of this decree "on the ground that it shows title in others than the plaintiff, and that it only shows she has received a portion of the title of an outside party." This objection was overruled, and the defendant excepted to the ruling, and specified the same as error. The plaintiff had a verdict and judgment, and the defendant moved for a new trial. As appears from a bill of exceptions, the court "granted said motion on the ground of non-joinder of parties plaintiff, and that the co-distributees of plaintiff should have joined with her as plaintiffs in the action; the court at the same time expressly overruling all other grounds urged by defendants on such motion." The plaintiff appeals from the order granting a new trial.

We think that the order was erroneous. So far as is shown by the record, the co-distributees were tenants in common. And it is expressly provided by statute that "all persons holding as tenants in common, joint tenants, or co-parceners, or any number less than all, may jointly or severally commence or defend any civil action or proceeding for the enforcement or protection of the rights of such party." Code Civil Proc. § 384; Morenhaut v. Wilson, 52 Cal. 268, 269; Himes v. Johnson, 61 Cal. 259.

No brief has been filed for the respondent, and we do not see that there was any error at law occurring at the trial. We therefore advise that the order granting a new trial be reversed.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; FOOTE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the order granting a new trial is reversed.

WILLS—CONSTRUCTION.

A clause in a will, requiring the executors "to purchase at a price not exceeding $——, a tract of land at or near the residence" of certain persons, for the latters' use during life as a cattle pasture, without any other description of the land to be bought, is void for uncertainty.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. V. COFFEY, Judge.

Petition by Elizabeth H. Siddall for construction of the will of Elizabeth D. Traylor, deceased. From the decree rendered certain contestants appeal.

Selden S. & George T. Wright, (Harmon Bell, of counsel,) for appellants. D. Wm. Douthitt, (J. C. Bates, of counsel,) for respondent.

MCFARLAND, J. This is an appeal taken by Joseph and Margaret Wilson and Kitty Bell from a judgment of the court below construing the will of the deceased, and ordering a distribution of the residue of the estate to the heir at law. The only point made by appellants is that the court erred in holding void for vagueness and uncertainty the following clause of the will: "I also require my said executors to purchase, at a price not exceeding $———, a tract of land at or near the residence of said Wilsons, at Santa Barbara, for a cattle pasture; the free and exclusive use of which the said Wilsons shall have during their life-time, and the survivor of them, but which tract of land shall at the death of both of them vest in fee in their daughter, Kitty Bell." We think that the judgment of the superior court was right. Counsel for appellants argue the case, mainly, as if the only question were, did the failure to state the amount to be expended render the devise void? But that is only half of the problem. If there had been any certainty in the description, or, indeed, any description at all of the land directed to be purchased, it may be that the will should have been construed as directing the purchase of the land described, no matter what it might cost. But when we go from the blank dollar-mark to look for a description of the land, we come upon another blank as empty as the first. There is no description, either by common name, or by metes and bounds, or by quantity, or by any other sort of designation, by which any particular piece of land can be indicated. The case is very different from the cases cited, where bequests for the education, or support, or maintenance, etc., of infants and others, without specifying the amounts to be used for such purposes, have been maintained. In such instances the amount necessary for the purpose, considering the station in life of the legatee and the condition of the estate, can readily be ascertained with reasonable certainty. But in the case at bar there is no path that will lead the inquirer out of the labyrinth. Judgment affirmed.

DUNCAN v. THOMAS. (No. 12,028.)

EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS—CLAIMS AGAINST ESTATES—APPLICATION OF PAYMENTS.

1. A claim against the estate of a decedent, presented to the personal representative, for services rendered, which gives the number of days' service in each month, the total for each year, and the grand total for all, with the wages per day, stating the full amount, and then credits the amounts received on account during each year, leaving a certain balance, is sufficient in form.

2. In the absence of application of payments by the parties, payments in each year are not applied on the services for the corresponding year, but, under Civil Code Cal. § 1479, on the obligation earliest in time, and the statute of limitations does not run against balances due on certain years, where there are subsequent payments.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Santa Clara county; FRS. E. SPENCER, Judge.

T. H. Laine, for appellant. Wm. B. Hardy, for respondent.

FOX, J. Action for balance due for work and labor. Claim duly presented to administratrix, and rejected; action brought thereon; issue joined; judgment for plaintiff; motion for new trial denied, and defendant appeals.

The first point made by appellant is that the claim, as presented to the administratrix, was unintelligible and insufficient. The claim was sufficient in form, under the rule prescribed in Fallon v. Butler, 21 Cal. 25, and Estate of Swain, 67 Cal. 641, 8 Pac. Rep. 497. And the complaint stated facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action; from which it follows that it was not error to overrule defendant's objection to the introduction of evidence in support of it.

The facts, as shown by the claim presented, the complaint and the findings, (which are fully supported by the evidence,) are briefly stated, as follows: Decedent was the owner of a grain warehouse at the town of Gilroy. Plaintiff was employed by him as foreman of such warehouse, and rendered service as such on such days as service was required, during every month, from January, 1881, to June, 1885, both inclusive; the service in the different months varying from 6 days to 27 days. He kept a tally of the service by the day, and charged for it at the rate of $2 per day, which was the minimum of value proved at the trial. No settlement seems ever to have been had, but decedent made payments from time to time on account of such service, and shortly before his death stated to his banker that he was indebted to plaintiff, and was looking over his account to see if he had a balance sufficient to pay him up. The account, as stated to the administratrix, and as sued upon, gave the number of days' service in each month, the total number in each year, and the grand total for all the years and months; being 951 days, at $2 per day, $1,902. It also credited the amount of money received on account thereof in each year, to-wit, 1881, $380; 1882, $200; 1883, $200; 1884, $250; 1885, $100; total, $1,130; and leaving a balance of $772. There was no conflict of evidence as to the number of days' service, or when it was rendered, or as to its value; and the amount of credits to which the estate was entitled was accepted as being correctly stated in the claim as presented.

Defendant pleads payment, and the statute of limitations, and under these pleas insists that the payments of each year must be applied to the service of the corresponding year, and that, when they are so applied, whatever balance there was on account of service rendered prior to July, 1883, (decedent having died July 3, 1885,) is barred by the statute of limitations, and that this will show that all the service rendered since that time has been fully paid for or nearly so. We know of no law, and we are cited to none, which will support such a contention. On the contrary, in a case like this, of several obligations, where neither party has made any express application of the fund paid to any particular obligation, the law itself applies each payment to the extinguishment of the obligation earliest in date of maturity. Civil Code, § 1479. So applied, no part of this claim is barred by the statute of limitations. The court found in favor of the plaintiff for the full amount of his claim, $772, and the evidence sustains the findings. Judgment and order affirmed.

TROVER AND CONVERSION—PLEADING.

A complaint alleged that plaintiff placed in defendant's hands $3,600 with which to buy mining stock, which she agreed to use for that purpose; that on a certain day defendant bought, for account of plaintiff, $600 worth of stock; on a certain other day, $1,500 worth; and on another day, $1,500 worth. Held, that the complaint contained a sufficient allegation of the value of the property to support a money judgment for the amount for which defendant had sold it.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; OLIVER P. EVANS, Judge.

Action by Herrlich against McDonald. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals.

Whittemore & Sears and W. B. Tyler, for appellant. Charles F. Hanlon, for respondent.

WORKS, J. This action was brought by the respondent against the appellant to recover certain mining stock, and the dividends thereon, or their value. It was alleged in the complaint, and the court found, in substance, that the plaintiff had intrusted to the defendant a large sum of money with which to purchase mining stock for the former; that she, the defendant, purchased the stock and retained it, and collected the dividends; that the plaintiff demanded said stock and dividends, but the defendant refused to surrender or pay the same. The court found that the defendant had invested for the plaintff the sum of $3,600 in mining stock, and had sold the same at a profit, and had realized therefrom net, over and above all payments made to the plaintiff, $4,950, and found certain credits in favor of the defendant which reduced the amount to $4,705, for which sum judgment was rendered.

The appellant contends that the complaint contained no allegations upon which the money judgment was proper, and that the findings do not support such a judgment. The claim is that the action was one to recover the stock, and that the complaint contained no allegation as to the value of the stock as a basis for a money judgment. The complaint is not as specific in this respect as it should have been, but we think that it was sufficient. It alleges that the plaintiff placed in the hands of the defendant, with which to purchase the stock, the sum of $3,600, which she agreed to use for that purpose, and "that on the first day of November, 1876, or thereabouts, the defendant bought, for account of plaintiff, six hundred dollars' worth of mining stock; and on the first day of April, 1877, or thereabouts, the defendant purchased for the plaintiff fifteen hundred dollars worth of other mining stock; and on the first day of May, 1877, or thereabouts, the defendant purchased for the plaintiff fifteen hundred dollars worth of other mining stock." This was a sufficient allegation of the value of the stock to support the judgment.

A demand and refusal was alleged, which was sufficient, with the other allegations of the complaint, to show a conversion of property belonging to the plaintiff, and a judgment for its value was proper. The court found the value of the property, and that the defendant had converted it to her own use, which was sufficient to warrant the judgment rendered. There is no merit in this appeal. It is obvious that it was taken for delay. The judgment is affirmed, with 15 per cent. damages.

INSOLVENCY—DISCHARGE.

1. On a motion to discharge an execution because of defendant's discharge in insolvency it appeared that the findings in the action in which the judgment on which the execution issued was rendered, were made and filed in 1881, but that the judgment was not recorded until 1886. Held, that defendant had had no opportunity to set up as a defense a discharge in insolvency, obtained between these dates, and hence it could not be held that she had waived her right to assert it on the motion to discharge the execution.

2. Though insolvency act Cal. § 53, makes the certificate of discharge prima facie evidence of the regularity of such discharge, she is still bound to show that the debt sought to be avoided is one which was affected thereby.

3. The complaint alleged that defendant was a dealer in mining stocks; that plaintiff employed her to purchase mining stock, and gave her a certain sum to be used for that purpose; that defendant purchased stock worth that sum, and collected the dividends thereon; and that plaintiff demanded the stock and dividends, but defendant refused to deliver them. The court found that defendant had sold the stock at a profit, for the amount of which judgment was rendered. Held, that the debt was created "while acting in a fiduciary capacity," and under insolvency act, § 52, was not discharged.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; T. H. REARDEN, Judge.

W. B. Tyler and W. H. Sears, for appellant. Charles F. Hanlon, for respondent.

WORKS, J. This is an appeal from an order refusing to recall and set aside an execution. The judgment upon which the execution was issued has been affirmed by this court. Herrlich v. McDonald, ante, 298, (opinion filed September 7, 1889.) The ground upon which the motion to recall the execution was made, if there was such a motion, seems to have been that the defendant had been discharged in insolvency. The record on this appeal is in an anomalous condition. It appears that a notice was given that on a certain day a motion would be made to recall and set aside the execution on certain grounds stated; but no such motion appears in the transcript, nor is it shown in any proper way that any such motion was made. The grounds of the motion, if one was made, do not appear in any way. The notice was that the defendant would make such a motion on certain grounds, but whether she did make it or not on those or any other grounds is left wholly to conjecture. We presume the appellant expects us to infer that because she said she would make the motion she did make it. The only thing tending to show that a motion was made is a recital in the order appealed from that the "cause came on to be heard this day on defendant's motion to vacate and set aside writ of execution issued December 31, 1886." There is no bill of exceptions, and the certificate of the judge as to what papers were used recites that "upon the motion to recall execution in the above-entitled action the following papers were read and referred to." Neither of these show that a motion was actually made, but, if they did, the grounds upon which it was made nowhere appear. This being the state of the record, we might properly affirm the order on the ground that no error is made apparent. The practice in this respect seems to be extremely loose. Counsel seem to confound the notice of motion with the motion itself. The notice is not a motion, and should not be so treated. The careful practitioner will either prepare and file his motion in writing, stating the grounds thereof, or have the same entered in the minutes. This is not necessary, however. The motion may be made orally; but in every case, whether the motion is made in writing, entered on the minutes, or stated orally, the same should be preserved by a bill of exceptions and brought to this court in that way, on appeal, so that we can see from the record that a motion was made, and the ground upon which it was made. It is also a matter of serious question whether any of the papers claimed to have been used on the alleged motion are properly authenticated. As we have said, there is no bill of exceptions. The only authentication is by the certificate of the judge of the court below, at the close of the transcript, as follows: "I, T. H. Rearden, judge of department seven of said court, hereby certify that upon the hearing of the motion to recall the execution in the above-entitled action, the following papers were read and referred to: 'The judgment roll in said action; adjudication of insolvency, stay of proceedings, and order of publication of notice to creditors upon petition in insolvency of M. H. McDonald, filed August 4, 1882, herein; certificate of final discharge of defendant, M. H. McDonald, in insolvency, filed January 30, 1883, in the insolvency proceedings; affidavit of defendant, filed March 18, 1882; affidavit of Julia Herrlich, filed March 27, 1882; affidavit of Marguerite Beneux, filed March 27, 1882, and notice of motion to recall execution, filed January 26, 1887; the execution, with its return and indorsements.' T. H. REARDEN, Judge of said Court, Department Seven. Dated March 17, 1887." Formerly it was expressly provided that on motion for a new trial affidavits used might be identified by indorsement by the judge or clerk, at the time, as having been read or referred to on the hearing. St. 1861, p. 590; Hayne, New Trials & App. 790. The present Code has no such provision. It is simply provided that "on appeal from a judgment rendered on an appeal or from an order, except an order granting or refusing a new trial, the appellant must furnish the court with a copy of the notice of appeal, of the judgment or order appealed from, and of papers used on the hearing in the court below." Code Civil Proc. § 951. We are of the opinion that without a statutory provision authorizing the authentication of copies of papers in some other way, the only proper way that they can be brought into the record and identified is by bill of exceptions. There are decisions of this court, however, in which it has been rather taken for granted that a certificate of the judge is sufficient. Walsh v. Hutchings, 60 Cal. 228; Nash v. Harris, 57 Cal. 243; Larkin v. Larkin, 76 Cal. 323, 18 Pac. Rep. 396. And in one case it was held in department that, as the statute prescribed no mode in which such papers should be authenticated, "this court had power to prescribe by rule how such papers should be brought before it on appeal; and if it had power to make such a rule in advance, it had the power to ratify the mode adopted by the court below;" and upon this proposition was founded the decision in that case that the certificate of the judge of the court below was sufficient. Pieper v. Land Co., 56 Cal. 173. But the Code does provide, in express terms, how all papers, proceedings, and exceptions, not otherwise a part of the record, may be made such, viz., by a bill of exceptions or statement. Code Civil Proc. §§ 646, 649-651. In case of an appeal from any decision made after judgment a bill of exceptions is the proper, and, in our opinion, the only proper, mode of authentication. Id. § 651. But the respondent has not asked us to affirm the order on the ground that the question is not properly presented, and in view of this fact, and considering the state of uncertainty in which the question is left by the decided cases, we prefer to decide this case on its merits. We must say, however, that if this court has the power to determine that papers to be used on appeal may be authenticated in a way not provided for by statute, when a different way is provided for,—which we very much doubt,—it should be done by a rule adopted in advance, and made applicable to all cases, and not be left for the court to say in each case whether or not the mode adopted in that case is sufficient.

The respondent contends that the discharge in insolvency, relied upon by the appellant, could not avail her on this motion, for the reason that she had such discharge before the judgment was rendered against her, and the same was not pleaded as a defense. This position would no doubt be unanswerable if it were true that the judgment was rendered after the discharge was given. But it does not so appear. The findings of the court were made and filed November 28, 1881, and the judgment bears the same date, but it is indorsed, "Recorded June 24, 1886," and the execution complained of recites the judgment as of the latter date. Now, conceding that the judgment could not have been enforced or appealed from until it was recorded, it does not follow that the defendant was at fault in not pleading her discharge. At the time of the trial and rendition of the judgment she had not procured her discharge, and consequently could not have pleaded it, nor could she have pleaded or set up such discharge in any way, to make the same available, between the rendition and recording of the judgment. Therefore, having had no opportunity to plead and prove her discharge at the trial, she cannot be held to have waived the right to assert it in the manner attempted in this motion.

It is further claimed by the respondent that the order of adjudication and certificate of discharge was not sufficient, without the other proceedings in insolvency, to show that the discharge was valid. Section 53 of the insolvency act provides that the certificate shall be prima facie evidence of the regularity of such discharge. This being so, it was sufficient to introduce the certificate alone. But while the certificate was sufficient prima facie to show a valid discharge from all debts from which the appellant was dischargeable, it does not follow from this that her case was made out by such proof alone. There are certain obligations from which she could not be discharged. Insolvency Act, § 52. We think it was incumbent upon her to show, not only that she had been discharged, but that the debt sought to be avoided was one which was affected thereby. Whether this was shown by the complaint on which the judgment was rendered will necessarily be considered in passing upon the next point made by the respondent.

It is also claimed that the debt for which the judgment was recovered was one created "while acting in a fiduciary character," and that for that reason it was not discharged. Section 52 of the insolvency act provides: "No debt created by fraud or embezzlement of the debtor, or by his defalcations as a public officer, or while acting in a fiduciary character, shall be discharged under this act, but the debt may be proved, and the dividend thereon shall be a payment on account of said debt; and no discharge granted under this act shall release, discharge, or affect any person liable for the same debt for or with the debtor, either as partner, joint contractor, indorser, surety, or otherwise." The question is, therefore, whether the complaint on which the judgment was recovered was for a debt contracted while acting in a fiduciary capacity. The complaint alleges, in substance, that the defendant was a dealer in mining stocks, but whether on her own account or as a broker or factor does not appear; that the plaintiff employed the defendant to purchase mining stock for her, and gave her $3,600 to be used for such purpose; that she purchased stock worth that sum, and retained and collected the dividends thereon; that the plaintiff demanded the stock and dividends, but she refused to deliver the stock or pay the dividends. The prayer of the complaint was for the stock and dividends, or their value. In addition to the facts alleged in the complaint, the court found that the defendant had actually sold and disposed of the stock at a profit, and for the amount for which the judgment was rendered. The appellant contends that this does not show that the debt was created by fraud or embezzlement, or while acting in a fiduciary character, but that the defendant was shown to have been acting as a factor, and that such a debt is dischargeable in insolvency. There are authorities holding that where a party doing business as a factor had money in his hands, received in the course of his business, or has used the same for his own purposes, the claim of one dealing with him for the money due him was not within the provision in the federal bankrupt law, similar to that of our insolvency act, against the discharge of a debtor from fraudulent or fiduciary debts. Chapman v. Forsyth, 2 How. 202; Zeperink v. Card, 11 Fed. Rep. 295; Woolsey v. Cade, 15 N. B. R. 238; In re Smith, 18 N. B. R. 24; Upshur v. Briscoe, 37 La. Ann. 138. So it is held that the claim relating to debts fraudulently created was meant to apply only to cases of "positive fraud or fraud in fact involving moral turpitude or intentional wrong, and not implied fraud, or fraud in law, which may exist without the imputation of bad faith or immorality." Neal v. Clark, 95 U. S. 704; Hennequin v. Clews, 111 U. S. 676, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 576; Strang v. Bradner, 114 U. S. 555, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1038. There was no direct allegation of fraud in the complaint in this case, nor was it averred that the defendant was engaged in the business of a factor or commission merchant, or that she acted as such in this instance.

The reason for holding that a factor is not one acting in a fiduciary character within the meaning of the bankrupt laws, in the class of cases mentioned, is apparent. The money received by him is not the money of the party for whom he does business. It is his own money; but on an accounting he is bound to pay over to his customers the amounts due them. The claim of the customer is a simple debt, and, independent of actual fraud, there is no reason why a factor should not be discharged from his debt, as well as any other business man. The factor may buy and sell in his own name, and mingle the money of his customers in the same way. Slack v. Tucker, 23 Wall. 321, 329. The question presented here is an entirely different one. The allegations of the complaint present a case in which the plaintiff intrusted money to the defendant to buy mining stock for her. When purchased, the stock was the property of the plaintiff, and the defendant held it as a trustee for her, and upon demand she was legally bound to deliver the stock and account for the dividends she had received. She was simply an agent to buy property in the name of her principal, and stood in a fiduciary relation. Her refusal to deliver the stock, and the sale of it by her, was a conversion of the property, and the proceeds remained in her hands in trust for the plaintiff. Matteson v. Kellogg, 15 Ill. 548. It is manifest that such an obligation could not be affected by a discharge in bankruptcy. Clark v. Pinckney, 50 Barb. 226; Matteson v. Kellogg, 15 Ill. 548; Woolsey v. Cade, 15 N. B. R. 243; White v. Platt, 5 Denio, 271; Stoll v. King, 8 How. Pr. 298; Flagg v. Ely, 1 Edm. Sel. Cas. 206; Fulton v. Hammond, 11 Fed. Rep. 291. The distinction between this case and those relating to general factors is well expressed in Matteson v. Kellogg, 15 Ill. 549. In that case it was said: "Under this act the supreme court of the United States, in the case of Chapman v. Forsyth, 2 How. 202, decided that money received by a factor on the sale of the goods of his principal does not create a fiduciary debt within the meaning of that act. The reason assigned for that decision is that, according to the course and usage of the trade, the factor is permitted to carry such money into account, and mingle it with his own money, whereby it ceases to be the money of the principal, and becomes the money of the factor, who becomes debtor to the principal to that amount. If there is an implied agreement between the principal and the factor that the latter may take and use the money in his business till called for, by being thus carried into general account, it becomes an ordinary debt, the same as money loaned, subject to call. But such was not the character of this transaction. The money was here placed in Wright's hands for a particular purpose, with no authority to use it in his general business, or appropriate it in any way different from the trust which he assumed when he received the money. It continued to be the principal's money in Wright's hands, as much as it was in Blish's hands, or even in their own; and using it any way different from his instructions and his agreement was a breach of the trust which he had assumed. He did not become debtor to his principals till he misapplied the funds. Had he bought the land intended to be purchased, or any other lands, with this money, and taken the deed to himself, a resulting trust would have arisen in favor of the principals whose money was thus invested. Had the principals consented that he might use the money in his business, and then, at a convenient season, purchase the land with his own funds for their use, then it would have become an ordinary debt so soon as he used the money in pursuance of such consent. I understand the rule to be, where one receives the money or property of another as agent or bailee, the title to which is to remain in the principal, and which is to be paid over or delivered to him, or to be used in a particular way or for a specific purpose for his use, that then the money or property is received or held in a fiduciary capacity, or as trustee. In such a case a special trust and confidence is reposed beyond that of mere credit, and it was against the violation of such confidence that congress designed to provide by the exception quoted." It will be found upon an examination of the cases holding that the liability on the part of a factor is discharged by bankruptcy, that they apply to cases where the factor has moneys in his hands growing out of the general business of such factor, and not to a case like this, where money is given him with which to buy property for his principal. Besides, the cases relied upon by the appellant were decided under the earlier bankrupt law, which differed materially from the latter statute on that subject, and from our insolvency act. But we do not regard this as material in this case, as it is not within the decisions relied upon, even if the language of the statutes were the same. There are numerous cases holding that under the later bankrupt law the debt of a general factor for a balance in his hands for sales made was not discharged by his bankruptcy; but, as we have concluded that the appellant cannot, under the allegations of the complaint, be treated as a factor, we need not cite them. It is the law of this state, however, that such a debt is not affected by a discharge in bankruptcy. Treadwell v. Holloway, 46 Cal. 547. The allegations of the complaint and findings of the court show that the appellant was acting in a fiduciary capacity, and that her appropriation of the stock and dividends was in bad faith and fraudulent. For both these reasons her discharge in insolvency did not affect her liability. Order affirmed.

HART et al. v. BRITISH & F. M. INS. Co.

MARINE INSURANCE—APPLICATION—CONCEALMENT.

H., when he applied for policy of insurance on a cargo of wheat, said nothing about the arrival or non-arrival of the barge on which it was due. Contrary to the practice, he insisted on paying the premium when the risk was passed. On the same day, after it was learned that the barge had been lost, he told the manager of the company that he knew when he made the application that a barge had been lost, but that he did not know that it was this special barge. In an action on the policy the consignee of the barge and his clerk testified to conversations held on that day with H., in which they informed him of the loss of a barge, and told him that if his barge was not insured he "had better get insured pretty quick." H. had been expecting the barge for one or two days. Held, that the evidence was sufficient to support a verdict for the company, on the ground that H., when he procured the policy, knew and failed to communicate the material facts and information concerning the probable loss of the overdue barge.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JOHN HUNT, Judge.

Henry E. Highton and W. C. Belcher, for appellants. Milton Andros and Page & Eells, for respondent.

FOOTE, C. This action was brought to recover on an insurance policy for a marine loss on a cargo of wheat, shipped on a barge called the "Grand Island" for a voyage from Colusa to San Francisco. The owners of the wheat were Messrs. Hart and Harrington, the plaintiffs here. Some time about the middle of the night or in the early morning of the 10th day of December, 1878, the barge suddenly sank in the bay of San Francisco, when just below "Red Rock," a well-known place in that body of water. Her cargo, consisting of the plaintiff's wheat, was a total loss. The night was not very dark, and a light north wind was blowing. The barge was being towed, about the usual course for such vessels over that water-way, and there is nothing to show any sunken rocks or other obstructions to navigation which would have caused her loss at the place where she was overtaken by disaster. Her pilot does not, from his testimony, seem to have any definite idea of the cause of her loss, except that she sprung a leak, the origin of which he was unable to determine. When afterwards the craft was raised, and her bottom examined, it was found that three of her planks were broken and splintered.

The defenses set up to the action were: (1) That the barge was unseaworthy. (2) That the plaintiff Hart, at the time he made application for the policy, fraudulently concealed from the defendant the facts known to him, viz., that the barge was overdue and probably lost, of which facts the defendant had no knowledge, and which at the time it had no means of knowing or ascertaining. (3) That Hart, at the time of the application, had knowledge of the loss of the barge, which fact, then unknown to and beyond the reach of the defendant, he fraudulently concealed. Which facts, it was alleged, avoided the policy. After the plaintiffs had rested their case, the defendant was not allowed to introduce proffered evidence to sustain the issues of fraudulent concealment; the plaintiffs claiming, and the court concurring, that, assuming such facts as alleged to be true, they did not in law avoid the policy, but gave the defendant the right only of rescinding the contract, and that, as the exercise of that right had not been pleaded by way of defense, the proposed evidence was inadmissible. By permission of the court the answer was so amended as to allege the required rescission. The trial was prosecuted to a conclusion, the jury finding generally "in favor of defendant." From the judgment, and an order refusing a motion for a new trial, this appeal is taken.

The reasons brought forward why the judgment and order should be reversed are because, as is claimed—First, the court committed errors in ruling on the allowing of amendments to the pleadings, and in the admission of evidence; second, the insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict; third, the refusal of the court to charge as requested by the plaintiffs.

We perceive no abuse of discretion in allowing the amendment of the answer. The evidence sought to be admitted was of a written character, well known to the plaintiffs long before the trial. They could not have been surprised by its production; and it was eminently just, in order to settle the rights of the parties upon the merits, that the proof should be admitted. Conceding, without deciding, that Mr. Touchard's evidence as an expert as to what effect the knowledge of the barge being overdue would have had in determining the amount of premium was inadmissible, yet the plaintiffs suffered no injury. The witness stated that the time during which it was shown in evidence the barge in question was overdue would not have influenced the amount of the premium.

We perceive no necessity to go into the question of whether the evidence was insufficient to support the verdict as to the defendant's first ground of defense, viz., that when the barge left Colusa to begin her voyage she was unseaworthy, because we think the evidence does support the verdict, upon the ground that when Hart procured the policy he knew, and failed to communicate to the defendant, of which it was ignorant, the material facts and information in his possession concerning the probable loss of the overdue barge. But it is claimed by the plaintiffs as a matter of law that such facts as Hart possessed and failed to communicate were not material facts as understood in the law of insurance. The sections of the Civil Code bearing upon the point raised are as follows: Section 2561: "A neglect to communicate that which a party knows, and ought to communicate, is called a 'concealment.'" Section 2562: "A concealment, whether intentional or unintentional, entitles the injured party to rescind a contract of insurance." Section 2563: "Each party to a contract of insurance must communicate to the other, in good faith, all facts within his knowledge which are, or which he believes to be, material to the contract, and which the other has not the means of ascertaining, and as to which he makes no warranty." According to the evidence on the part of the defendant, Hart, the plaintiff, when he applied for the policy of insurance, said nothing about the arrival or non-arrival of the barge on which was the wheat which he wished insured. He desired to pay for the policy when the risk was passed by the manager of the marine department of the agents for the insurance company. Woods, the manager, told him to let it lie as usual until his account was furnished. Hart said he preferred to pay for it. Woods saw Hart again that day about noon, and asked him about the circumstances of the insurance, it having then become known that the barge was lost. Hart told Woods that he (Hart) was aware at the time of the placing the insurance that a barge was lost, but that he did not know that it was this special barge. He admitted this fact before Mr. Balfour, one of the agents for the insurance company, but said that he did not consider himself bound to make that known. He was then informed that the insurance was not obtained by fair means, and that the company would not admit its responsibility. "Hart expressed himself as accepting the situation; that he expected it; that he would press his claims; and whoever won it was all right." Thereupon a letter from the agents of the company was handed Hart by Woods, rescinding the contract of insurance, and tendering Hart the premium he had paid them. Hart took the letter, but declined the money. Prior to Hart's applying for the policy on the morning of the loss of the barge containing his cargo of wheat, he was talking with the consignee of the barge, Mr. McNear, and was then asked by Mr. Marble, who was present, if this wheat was insured. Hart said, "No;" that he was just talking with McNear about it. Marble remarked: "If you are going to get insured at all, you had better get insured pretty quick." Hart or McNear or both asked, "Why?" Marble answered that he had been round the water-front, and that he had heard a rumor that a barge had been lost near Red Rock. Marble did not know what barge, or what kind of a barge. This was about 9:30 in the morning. Mr. McNear stated that between 8 and 10 o'clock on that morning Hart came to his office and asked if his barge was reported. Witness said not. There was some discussion. Hart stated that he had always insured except that time. Something was said about the barge being overdue; that it was a good time to get her insured. McNear's clerk, Marble, came in, and said a barge was reported lost up above Red Rock. McNear told Hart he had better go and get his barge insured. Hart then left the office. On cross-examination McNear stated that he did not know whether Hart said he would insure before the clerk came in. Hart had been expecting the barge for one or two days. The barge was expected to arrive on the morning of the taking out of the policy, before it was taken out, which took place about 9:30 A. M. of that day. It also appeared in evidence that usually, if a barge was due early in the morning, if it was not heard from by 10 or 11 o'clock, the agent of a certain wood company would make inquiries; that such barges were sometimes expected for a week; and that Hart and McNear, his broker, were expecting the particular barge in question, which was due when the conversation of McNear, Marble, and Hart took place.

There was a conflict in the evidence, as appears from the bill of exceptions, as to whether the plaintiffs communicated to the defendant when they applied for the policy, that the barge was overdue, if she was overdue; but the plaintiffs conceded that at the time of the application they did not inform the defendant that they had heard the rumor communicated by Mr. Marble, or any information whatever as to the loss of the barge, and it did not appear that they possessed any information of such loss beyond that furnished by Mr. Marble. The fact that Hart was inquiring about the barge when she was some hours overdue went to show that he was perturbed over the matter. Immediately upon hearing what Marble communicated, he sought the insurance office to get a policy on his property. This, and his anxiety evinced in insisting in paying for it out of the usual way, his neglect to inform the agent of what he had heard, all looked as if he feared that his wheat was lost, and wished, if possible, to saddle its loss on the insurance company, who knew nothing, and could have known nothing, of what Marble had said, and which Hart deemed material to the risk. Was this fair towards the company? Was it not Hart's duty to place the defendant in possession of the knowledge which made him so precipitate and persistent in getting out a policy before it should be absolutely known that the barge was lost? Is it not fair to presume that if he had done so the insurance company would have been as swift to decline to issue the policy as Hart was earnest to obtain it? The jury evidently thought so. They heard all the evidence, and saw the witnesses, and we are not prepared to say that the uncontradicted evidence of McNear and Marble as to Hart's acts in the premises, together with the evidence of the other witnesses, with which there is some conflict in the evidence, did not warrant the conclusion arrived at. The conviction is irresistible that Hart feared his wheat was lost, hoped to get out a policy before the loss was known, and did not deal fairly with the defendant, because he did not place the insurance company in a situation such as he occupied, to know all the necessary facts and circumstances believed by Hart to be material attending the non-arrival of the barge. Such, at least, is the view that an unbiased and fair-minded jury may have taken of the matter from all the evidence in the record, and we are not disposed to interfere with their determination.

We perceive nothing in the action of the court as to the matter of instructions which is erroneous, and advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; HAYNE, C.

WILSON v. TREADWELL. (No. 12,324.)

LIABILITY OF LANDLORD—DEFECTIVE PREMISES.

Civil Code Cal. § 1941, which provides that the lessor of a building intended for the occupation of human beings must, in the absence of an agreement to the contrary, put it in a condition fit for occupation, and repair all subsequent dilapidations which render it untenantable, does not render a landlord liable to an employe of his tenant of business property for injuries caused by a defective stairway on the premises; there being no covenant by the landlord to repair.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JOHN HUNT, Judge.

Fisher Ames, (Jarboe, Harrison & Goodfellow, of counsel,) for appellant. John H. Dickinson, for respondent.

WORKS, J. This is an action by an employe of a tenant of business property against the landlord for damages for personal injuries resulting from a defective stairway on the premises used in conducting the business of the tenant. The controlling question in the case is whether or not the landlord was legally bound to make necessary repairs. There was no covenant in the lease to that effect. This question was ruled against the defendant in the court below, and verdict and judgment went against her. At common law the landlord was not bound to make repairs, and the tenant alone was liable to third parties for injuries resulting from negligence in this respect. 1 Thomp. Neg. 317, 323; City of Lowell v. Spaulding, 4 Cush. 277; 2 Shear. & R. Neg. (4th Ed.) § 708; Clancy v. Byrne, 56 N. Y. 133; City of Brooklyn v. Railroad Co., 47 N. Y. 483; Nelson v. Brewery Co., L. R. 2 C. P. Div. 311; Marshall v. Heard, 59 Tex. 266. And the rule that the landlord was not liable to strangers for a failure to repair applied with equal force to the tenant and his employes. 1 Thomp. Neg. 323; O'Brien v. Capwell, 59 Barb. 497. The respondent contends that this rule has been changed by section 1941[1] of our Civil Code, and that the landlord is thereby bound to repair, precisely as if he had covenanted to do so in the lease. But this court has held directly to the contrary in the case of Van Every v. Ogg, 59 Cal. 563, in which it is said: "It is insisted that the section last cited, by operation of law, inserts in every lease a covenant on the part of the landlord to repair. But bearing in mind that at the common law no such covenant was implied, and reading the two sections together, the intent seems clear that the obligation of the landlord should be limited by the extent of the privilege conferred upon the tenant; that it is the duty of the landlord to repair upon notice, and if he does not perform this duty he is to be compelled to pay, by deduction from the rent, to the extent of a month's rental, or, at the option of the tenant, the term be concluded without redress to the landlord."

It follows that the complaint did not state a cause of action, and that none was shown by the evidence. Judgment and order reversed.

RICHARDS et al. v. DOWER et al. (No. 13,107.)

MINES AND MINING—ABANDONMENT—FINDINGS—EVIDENCE.

1. In an action for two town lots, plaintiffs claimed under a town-site patent from the United States, issued in 1869. It appeared that for many years before 1869 a gold vein within the limits of the lots had been profitably worked by various parties, successively, but that there had never been any location or conveyance of the vein before 1869, and defendants did not pretend to connect themselves with those who mined there before that time. Work on the vein was abandoned in 1869, before the patent issued, and none was afterwards performed until 1884, when defendants made the location under which they claimed. There was evidence that some work had been done on the vein, outside the limits of the lots, about 1876. Held not a mine, within 14 U. S. St. at Large, 541, providing, in relation to town-site grants, that "no title shall be acquired under the provisions of this act to any mine of gold," etc., and that defendants acquired no interest by locating a mining claim in 1884.

2. The evidence showed that the vein had been worked from 1851 until 1869, when the work was discontinued, the excavations filled up, and buildings erected. One witness testified that about 1876 work was done on the vein, some 400 yards outside the limits of the lots in question. Held sufficient to sustain a finding that the work was abandoned in 1869, and that none was afterwards done until defendants made their location, in 1884.

3. The mere possession of shafts, dumps, etc., on an exhausted vein which has been abandoned, does not amount to a mining claim.

4. Evidence that the claim of the person who last worked the vein was sold, in probate proceedings, for $500, two years after the patent was issued, is immaterial, as it only tends to prove that the purchaser thought that the interest of such claimant was at that time worth $500.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Nevada county; E. A. BRIDGFORD, Judge.

H. L. Gear, for appellants. P. F. Simonds and Fred Searls, for respondents.

BEATTY, C. J. This is an action to recover two lots in the city of Nevada. Plaintiffs had judgment; from which, and an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. The facts out of which the case arises are as follows: A patent for the town-site of Nevada was issued by the United States, July 1, 1869, and whatever title to these lots passed by the patent was vested in the plaintiffs at the commencement of the action. But the defendants claim that the portion of the lots which is in their possession was not granted by the patent, being reserved or excepted out of its operation by reason of the fact—by them alleged—that it contained a gold-bearing quartz vein, the existence of which was known at and before the date of the patent, and which has since that date been located by them in pursuance of the mining laws of the United States. From this general statement it will be seen that the question to be decided is whether or not the premises in controversy were reserved out of the land patented for a town-site. The determination of this question involves a construction of the laws of the United States relating to town-sites and mineral lands, and a consideration of the state of facts existing and known at the date of the patent.

[1] Sec. 1941. The lessor of a building intended for the occupation of human beings must, in the absence of an agreement to the contrary, put it into a condition fit for such occupation, and repair all subsequent dilapidations thereof, which render it untenantable, except such as are mentioned in section nineteen hundred and twenty-nine.

And, first, as to the facts. It appears from the findings of the superior court, and from the evidence, that for many years prior to the year 1869 a gold-bearing quartz ledge was known to exist within the limits of these lots, extending across the lots, and for a considerable distance outside of them. As early as the year 1851, it was known as the "Wagner Ledge," and was worked, apparently, at a profit, by a man of that name. It does not appear that the vein, or any part of it, was ever regularly located in accordance with the law, or local miners' rules, prior to the town-site patent, or that any title or right of possession in it was ever transferred by deed or other mode of conveyance from one to another of the various parties who at different times have mined upon it. The defendants do not pretend to connect themselves in any way with those who mined there prior to the issuance of the town-site patent. After Wagner ceased to work on the vein, other parties, in succession, worked there, from time to time, until the winter of 1868–69, at which time, and prior to the issuance of the patent,—according to the findings,—work on the ledge was abandoned, and none was thereafter performed until defendants, in 1884, made the location under which they claim. It is contended by the appellants that this finding is in conflict with the evidence; and it is true that one witness did testify that he saw "a man named Smith" at work on the vein after 1869; perhaps as late as 1876. His testimony, however, was extremely vague and uncertain. He could not fix the time when, or the place where, he saw Smith at work. He says it was on the vein, but not inside of these lots, and was perhaps as much as 400 yards distant from them. But, even if his testimony had been much more positive than it was, we cannot say that the court would have been bound to accept it. The fact sought to be established, viz., the working of a gold mine within the limits of a populous town, would necessarily, if a fact, have been known to many persons, and, considering the important effect attributed to it, ought to have been proved by stronger evidence, than the uncertain testimony of one witness. But, aside from this, the question here is as to the existence of a mine known at the date of the patent within the boundaries of these lots; and even if it had been clearly proved that one man worked on the Wagner vein as late as 1876, at a point 400 yards outside of the lots, that would have been a circumstance of very slight evidentiary value with reference to the matter to be proved. He might have found nothing where he was at work; and, if he did find gold in paying quantities at that point, it would not have proved that the same grade of ore was to be found at a distance of 400 yards. It is well known that veins rich at one point are often barren at a few yards distance. But what is more to the purpose here is that veins are frequently worked out and abandoned from point to point on their course until they are wholly exhausted. The evidence in this case shows that the Wagner vein was scarcely more than a foot in thickness; that some hundreds of tons of rock had been extracted from it within the boundaries of these lots prior to 1869; that it had been worked down to the water-line by means of shafts, drifts, tunnels, etc. Add to this the fact that from 1869 to 1884, a period of more than 15 years, it lay idle and untouched in the midst of one of the busiest and most enterprising mining regions of the state, and the conclusion is irresistible that from the time work on it ceased, in the winter of 1868–69, it was regarded as a worked-out and valueless lode; so much of it, at least, as was embraced within the lines of these lots. It is true, there is no express finding of the superior court to this effect, and the judgment for plaintiff seems to have gone upon other grounds; but certainly the evidence would have sustained such a finding, if an issue upon the specific point had been raised by the pleadings. There was, however, no such issue. The complaint merely alleges ownership, and right of possession, which is denied by the answer. The answer, it is true, goes further than a mere denial, and attempts to state a special defense, by averring that plaintiffs have no right except under the town-site patent, and that the demanded premises were reserved in the patent; but the only allegation of fact upon this point is "that the said Wagner ledge, and the portion thereof which crosses the said lands, was known to be a gold-bearing ledge, and was held, possessed, worked, and mined as such long prior and subsequent to said patent." Other allegations to the effect that the mine was reserved, that it is part of the public mineral lands of the United States, etc., are mere conclusions of law. It was unnecessary, therefore, for the court to make a specific finding as to the value of the mine, or its supposed value at the date of the patent. The fact that it was of no apparent value at that date will, if necessary to support the judgment, be deemed to be embraced in the more general findings in response to the issues raised. Assuming, then, that at the date of the issuance of the town-site patent that part of the Wagner ledge embraced in these lots was regarded as worked out, and as of no further value for mining purposes, we find that the predecessors of plaintiffs purchased the lots from the patentee, went into possession of them, fenced them, divided them into different inclosures, built valuable houses and outhouses upon them, planted them with fruit trees, filled up the old mining excavations, and, in short, devoted them to the purposes of a home. After 15 years and more, during which there was a complete cessation of mining on the lode, the defendants entered upon the possession of the plaintiffs, made a location of the ledge, claiming 300 feet of surface on each side of the croppings,—a strip 600 feet in width across plaintiffs' lots,—and proceeded to dig up their garden and orchard, demolish their fences and undermine their houses. All this the defendants justify upon the ground that the ledge and adjacent surface which they have located was reserved by the United States out of the land patented to the town-site trustee. It remains to consider whether they are correct in their construction of the law upon this point. They rely upon the following clause of section 2392 of the Revised Statutes of the United States: "No title shall be acquired, under the foregoing provisions of this chapter, to any mine of gold, silver, cinnabar, or copper, or to any valid mining claim or possession held under existing laws." This clause of the Revised Statutes had no existence in its present form at the date of the patent for the Nevada town-site. At that date the revision had not been made; and we must look to the town-site laws in the Statutes at Large to ascertain whether they contained equivalent provisions. The laws referred to are the act of March 2, 1867, (14 St. at Large, 541,) and the act of June 8, 1868, (15 St. at Large, 67.) The first contained the following proviso: "That no title shall be acquired under the provisions of this act to any mine of gold, silver, cinnabar, or copper." The second, which was amendatory of the first, contained the following proviso: "That no title under said act of March 2, 1867, shall be acquired to any valid mining claim or possession held under the existing laws of congress." The appellants contend that in July, 1869, both these provisos were in force. The respondents, on the contrary, claim that the second was substituted for the first, and that nothing was reserved at the date of the patent in question except "valid mining claims or possessions held under existing laws of congress." We find it unnecessary to decide which of these opposing views is correct. For the purposes of this case, we will assume, without deciding, that the appellants are right, and that not only mining claims, but all known mines, whether claimed or not, were reserved from the grant. The question, then, is reduced to this: What was a mine of gold within the meaning of the act of 1867? Without the aid of any judicial or legislative construction, we should say without hesitation that one essential requisite of a gold mine would be a natural deposit of rock or earth containing a sufficient quantity of gold to admit of profitable working. If lands are known to contain precious metals, but in quantities so small as not to justify the attempt to extract them, they are not properly called "mineral lands;" and even if they might be mined at a very small profit, but are clearly of more value for agriculture than for mining, they are agricultural, rather than mineral, lands. There is abundance of authority for this view. We know of nothing in the statutes of the United States as they existed in July, 1869, which indicates a more jealous policy with respect to mineral lands than is manifested by the following provision of the Revised Statutes: "In all cases lands valuable for minerals shall be reserved from sale, except as otherwise expressly directed by law." Section 2318. This is a clear declaration that the present policy of the government is to reserve only such mineral lands as are valuable as such; and there is no reason to suppose that it ever had a different policy.

In the case of Deffenback v. Hawke, 115 U. S. 392, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 95, a case much relied on by appellants, although the decision was in favor of the mineral claimant, who held a patent for his mine, and against the town-lot claimant, who had no patent, the carefully guarded language of the opinion of the court, limiting the operation of the principles decided, has all the force of a direct adjudication against the appellant on the point we are considering. We quote the following, (page 404, 115 U. S., and page 100, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep.:) "It is plain from this brief statement of the legislation of congress, that no title from the United States to land known at the time of sale to be valuable for its minerals of gold, silver, cinnabar, or copper can be obtained under the pre-emption or homestead laws or the town-site laws, or in any other way than as prescribed by the laws specially authorizing the sale of such lands. * * * We say, 'land known at the time to be valuable for its minerals,' as there are vast tracts of public land in which minerals of different kinds are found, but not in such quantity as to justify expenditures in the effort to extract them. It is not to such lands that the term 'mineral,' in the sense of the statute, is applicable. In the first section of the act of 1866, no designation is given of the character of mineral lands which are free and open to exploration. But in the act of 1872, which repealed that section, and reenacted one of broader import, it is 'valuable mineral deposits' which are declared to be free and open to exploration and purchase. The same term is carried into the Revised Statutes. It is there enacted that 'lands valuable for minerals' shall be reserved from sale, except as otherwise expressly directed, and that 'valuable mineral deposits' in lands belonging to the United States shall be free and open to exploration and purchase. We also say 'lands known at the time of their sale to be thus valuable,' in order to avoid any possible conclusion against the validity of titles which may be issued for other kinds of land, in which, years afterwards, rich deposits of mineral may be discovered. It is quite possible that lands settled upon as suitable only for agricultural purposes, entered by the settler, and patented by the government, under the pre-emption laws, may be found, years after the patent has been issued, to contain valuable minerals. Indeed, this has often happened. We therefore use the term 'known to be valuable at the time of sale,' to prevent any doubt being cast upon titles to lands afterwards found to be different in their mineral character from what was supposed when the entry of them was made and the patent issued." And again, on pages 406, 407, 115 U. S., and pages 101, 102, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep., note the following language: "While we hold that a title to known valuable mineral land cannot be acquired under the town-site laws, and therefore could not be acquired to the land in controversy under the entry of the town-site of Deadwood by the probate judge of the county in which the town is situated, we do not wish to be understood as expressing any opinion against the validity of the entry, so far as it affected property other than mineral lands, if there were any such at the time of the entry. The acts of congress relating to town-sites recognize the possession of mining claims within their limits. And in Steel v. Smelting Co., 106 U. S. 449, 1 Sup. Ct. Rep. 391, we said that 'land embraced within a town-site on the public domain, when unoccupied, is not exempt from location and sale for mining purposes. Its exemption is only from settlement and sale under the pre-emption laws of the United States. Some of the most valuable mines in the country are within the limits of incorporated cities, which have grown upon what was, at its first settlement, part of the public domain; and many of such mines were located and patented after a regular municipal government had been established. Such is the case with some of the famous mines of Virginia City, in Nevada. Indeed, the discovery of a rich mine in any quarter is usually followed by a large settlement in its immediate neighborhood, and the consequent organization of some form of local government for the protection of its members.' It would seem, therefore, that the entry of a town-site, even though within its limits mineral lands are found, would be as important to the occupants of other lands as if no mineral lands existed. Nor do we see any injury resulting therefrom, nor any departure from the policy of the government, the entry and the patent being inoperative as to all lands known at the time to be valuable for their minerals, or discovered to be such before their occupation or improvement for residence or business under the town-site title."

These extracts from the opinion of the highest judicial tribunal of the country show very clearly and precisely what are the limitations upon the right which the defendants are attempting to assert, and what is the effect of the provisos, above quoted, reserving mineral lands, mines, and mining claims from the operation of town-site patents. A mine is not reserved unless it is not only known, but known to be valuable, at the date of the patent, or discovered to be so before the occupation or improvement of the lots containing them for residences or business under the town-site title. Here the defendants admit that the lots in controversy are within the description of the patent, and they must assume, as they have in fact done, the burden of showing that they are of the class of lands excepted from its operation. This they have failed to do, both in their allegations and in their proofs, by failing to show that that portion of the Wagner ledge included within the boundaries of these lots was known to be valuable for mining purposes at the date of the patent, or discovered to be so before plaintiffs and their predecessors occupied and improved them for the purposes of residence under the town-site title. The tacit assumption upon which appellants base their whole argument, viz., that this ledge, having once been profitably worked, must be deemed to have continued valuable, cannot be admitted. It is a matter of universal knowledge that California is full of quartz veins, which have been worked at a profit for a time, and have been finally abandoned,—often after sinking more money in them than had ever been taken out of them; and there are large areas where placer mining was formerly conducted successfully, which now, after being exhausted of their gold, are held and occupied as farming and grazing lands under patents from the United States. When, upon lands of this character, mineral discoveries are made, the agricultural claimant is protected against mining locators. Cowell v. Lammers, 10 Sawy. 246, 21 Fed. Rep. 200.

The foregoing views dispose of the main contention of the parties to this appeal, but we will notice briefly some specific assignments of error. The finding of the court that work on the ledge was abandoned prior to the issue of the town-site patent is not contrary to the evidence. Our reasons for this conclusion have been already stated. The possessio pedis of Hughes and Lovey and Sigourney & Co. of the shafts, tunnels, inclines, dumps, and stopes on the vein, even if it had actually continued down to the date of the patent,—and it is not shown to have done so,—would not have had the effect of preventing the land in which they were situated from passing by the town-site patent. If there was no mine of value, and if they had abandoned all work on the mine, as the evidence shows they had done, their possession of the shafts, dumps, etc., would not have amounted to a mining claim, and nothing but a mine or a mining claim was reserved. Besides, the evidence was sufficient to prove an actual intention of these old miners to abandon the mine at the time they ceased to work it, in the winter of 1868-69. The court did not err in excluding evidence offered to show that in 1871, after the death of Hughes, his interest in the Wagner ledge was sold, under proceedings in probate, for $500. The most that such evidence could possibly have proved was that the purchaser, two years after the patent, thought that Hughes had an interest in the vein which was worth $500. As we have seen, the vein extended far beyond these lots, and, according to one witness, was worked at a point 400 yards distant from them in 1876, or thereabouts. Hughes' claim may have included this portion of the vein; but, whatever it included, the opinion of the purchaser, two years after the patent, is not competent evidence of the known or estimated value of the vein at the date of the patent. We find no error in the record. Judgment and order affirmed.

Powell v. Sutro. (No. 11,728.)

Change of Venue.

In an action before a justice to recover taxes paid for defendant, the answer averred illegality of the taxes; whereupon, as required by Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 838, the cause was certified to the superior court of the county. Held, under section 396, providing that the trial may be had in the county in which an action is brought, though it be not the proper county, unless defendant, at the time he appears and answers or demurs, demands in writing that the trial be had in the proper county, that a demand for change of venue, made in the superior court, was too late. Beatty, C. J., and Fox and Works, JJ., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; W. E. Greene, Judge.

For opinion on hearing in department, see 21 Pac. Rep. 436.

Edmund Tausky, for appellant. Moore & Reed, for respondent.

McFarland, J. After argument on hearing in bank, we adhere to the conclusion reached in department. The action was commenced in the justice's court in Alameda county, to recover $155.38 for certain taxes alleged to have been paid by plaintiff for defendant. Defendant filed a verified answer, in which he averred the illegality of the taxes. This answer made it necessary, under section 838 of the Code of Civil Procedure, for the justice to suspend all further proceedings, and certify the case to the superior court of Alameda county, which was accordingly done. After the case had been transferred to the superior court, the defendant demanded and moved for a change of venue to the county of San Francisco, upon the ground that his place of residence was in the latter county. The superior court denied the motion, and defendant appeals.

The right to have a change of the place of trial of an action pending in a superior court upon the ground of residence is purely statutory; and it can be successfully asserted only by a party who brings himself clearly within the statutory provisions on the subject. (There is no such right on the ground of residence in a justice's court.) It is the established law that, under the provision of section 396[1] of the Code of Civil Procedure, a motion for a change of venue, after demurrer or answer, is too late. Appellant filed his answer in the justice's court, and, of course, his demand for a change of venue in the superior court was after answer. It is not necessary to determine here what his position would have been if, when he filed his answer in the justice's court, knowing that it would cause a transfer to the superior court, he had then and there made his demand for a change. When he did make his motion, he was inevitably in the position of one who makes such a motion too late. It is vain to say that he could not have made his motion any sooner in the superior court. He is still seeking a privilege which can come only from a compliance with a statutory provision with which he had not complied. If there was no way in which he could have complied with the statute, then the fair inference is that the legislature intended that a motion for a change of venue should be allowed only in those cases which get into the superior court in the usual way,—where the complaint shows upon its face jurisdiction in that court,—and not in the few comparatively trivial cases where the amount sued for is within the jurisdiction of justices' courts, and where the cases are transferred on account of some averment in the answer. Order affirmed.

We concur: Thornton, J.; Sharpstein, J.; Paterson, J.

Works, J. I dissent. When the verified answer was filed ousting the jurisdiction of the justice's court, that court could take no further steps in the case. It was the duty of the justice to immediately certify the case to the superior court, and that court then had "over the action the same jurisdiction as if it had been commenced therein." Code Civil Proc. § 838. No affidavit could properly have been filed, or motion made for a change of the place of trial, in the justice's court. If that court had jurisdiction of the case, it would have been improper, because a change to another county cannot be had from a justice's court. If the justice had not jurisdiction, it would have been idle to file the affidavit there, because that court had no power to act upon it. The defendant made the necessary affidavit as soon as the case reached a court having jurisdiction to act upon it, and before any act was done by him in that court, or any other step taken therein. This was using the utmost expedition in the assertion of his rights that could be reasonably required under the statute. It is well enough to say that the "right to a change of the place of trial is purely statutory, and a party must bring himself clearly within the provisions on the subject;" but it is quite another thing for the courts to so construe a statute as, in certain cases, to deprive a party of the right entirely, and thus, in such cases, to nullify the statute itself. If the doctrine declared in the prevailing opinion is to obtain, all a plaintiff will have to do hereafter, in order to prevent a defendant from asserting his right to be tried in the county of his residence, is to bring his action in a justice's court, which has no jurisdiction, thereby compelling the defendant to be tried before the justice, or file such an answer as will cause the transfer of the case to the superior court of that county; in either of which events, if such a construction is to prevail, he is entirely cut off from his right to a change to the proper county. In my judgment, a plain statutory right should not be denied a party, even in a "comparatively trivial case," by any such strict construction of the provisions of the statute. The law is the same in all cases, and the courts cannot deny the right given by it because the court may regard the case in hand as comparatively trivial. I think the change should have been granted, and that the order denying it should be reversed.

[1] "Sec. 396. If the county in which an action is commenced is not the proper county for the trial thereof, the action may, notwithstanding, be tried therein, unless the defendant, at the time he appears and answers or demurs, files an affidavit of merits, and demands, in writing, that the trial be had in the proper county."

BEATTY, C. J., and FOX, J. We dissent. The case is a trifling one, as to the amount of money involved, but it involves a principle which it is important should be settled correctly. Under section 395, Code Civil Proc., it is a matter of absolute right, on the part of the defendant, that he shall have the case tried in the county where he resides. This section is mandatory in its terms, and so plain as not to be open to construction, either as to its meaning, or as to the intention of its framers. On the other hand, section 396, cited in the leading opinion, is a mere provision of the mode of procedure to secure the right. The right itself being absolutely established by legislative enactment, if no mode of procedure had been provided for its enforcement, it would be the duty of the court to prescribe one. Section 396 has prescribed one for all the ordinary cases arising in the course of practice; but here happens to come a case, as sometimes occurs in the conduct of human affairs, that the mode of procedure provided, if we follow the literal language of the statute, does not meet, and we have a case of a right without a remedy. In such a case it is the duty of the court, if possible, to provide a remedy. Examining the general remedy which has been provided, we find that the controlling idea of the framers of the statute was that the party seeking to avail himself of the right guarantied to him by section 395 should make his application therefor upon his first appearance in the court having jurisdiction to act thereon. That was done in this case. The answer was necessarily filed in a court which had no jurisdiction, either to try the case, or to transfer it to another county. That court, as in duty bound, transmitted it to a competent court of its own county; and, immediately upon the filing of the papers in the court to which it was so transmitted, the application for change of venue was made. It should have been granted.

INJUNCTION BOND—LIABILITY OF SURETIES—PLEADING.

1. In an action against the sureties on an undertaking on a preliminary injunction, the complaint alleged the pendency of the injunction suit, and the making of an order requiring an undertaking conditioned that said sureties on said undertaking would pay to the said parties enjoined, all damages that they might sustain by reason of said injunction, if said court should finally decide that said A. and M. were not entitled to the same; said damages not to exceed $10,000. It then alleged that an undertaking had been given in compliance with said order, and annexed the undertaking as an exhibit, making it a part of the pleading by reference. Held, that this was a sufficient showing of the terms of the contract of the sureties, and the condition on which their liability was to arise, and that it was not necessary to set forth the nature of the obligation.

2. The complaint also alleged that the business of the defendants in the injunction suit was the removal of dead animals, and "trying out dead animals, and selling the oil, bones, hides, and other products." It then alleged that an injunction was issued, which was annexed and referred to, "enjoining and restraining said plaintiff B. et al. from carrying on said business, as in said injunction particularly expressed." The injunction restrained defendants "from maintaining your certain order-boxes mentioned in the complaint, * * * and from removing, or in any manner interfering with or disposing of, * * * any dead * * * cattle, within the limits," etc. The undertaking was given "in order to continue in force said injunction restraining said plaintiff B. et al. from carrying on their said business." Held, that the complaint was not objectionable on general demurrer as failing to show the acts sought to be restrained, and whether the injunction restrained defendants from commission of the acts referred to in the undertaking.

3. A preliminary injunction was first issued, and afterwards the court ordered the injunction dissolved, unless defendants should give an undertaking in a much larger sum, which was given. It recited the commencement of the suit, and was conditioned "in case said injunction shall issue," etc. The complaint in the action on the undertaking alleged the granting of the injunction and the making of the order requiring a further undertaking, and that in compliance with such order, "and in order to continue in force said injunction," the undertaking in suit was given. The answers denied that defendants caused the undertaking to be filed, and averred that plaintiffs in the injunction suit caused it to be filed, and further averred that defendants had no knowledge of the "order and character" of the prior proceedings in the suit. Held, that if defendants executed the undertaking for the purpose mentioned, it is immaterial whether they or their principals caused it to be filed; also that, as the undertaking recited the pendency of the suit, defendants were bound to take notice of the order, and character of the proceedings therein; and therefore that the pleadings admitted that the undertaking was given to continue in force the injunction previously issued, and defendants could not contend that the words "shall issue" in the undertaking referred to a final injunction in the suit.

4. Civil Code Cal. § 2837, provides that in interpreting the terms of a contract of suretyship the same rules are to be observed as in the case of other contracts. Section 1643 requires that a contract be interpreted so as to make it capable of being carried into effect, if it can be done without violating the intention of the parties. Held, that as no undertaking could be required on final injunction, Code Civil Proc. providing only for undertakings on preliminary injunctions, the words "shall issue," in the undertaking, must be construed under these Code provisions as meaning "shall be continued in force."

5. Plaintiff can recover for profits which he would have made had he not been prevented by the injunction from carrying on his business.

6. The sureties on an undertaking on a preliminary injunction are not liable for losses or counsel fees accruing after the final decree making the injunction perpetual, as a preliminary injunction is merged and ceases to have effect when a decree for perpetual injunction is rendered.

7. Even if the undertaking expressly covered such losses, it would be, to that extent, inoperative, as Code Civil Proc. Cal. provides only for an undertaking on the preliminary injunction, and any statutory undertaking beyond what is required by statute is void.

8. The sureties are not liable for loss of profits or counsel fees incurred or expended before the giving of the undertaking, nor for counsel fees expended in defense of the suit, but only those expended solely or principally in procuring a dissolution of the injunction.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JOHN F. FINN, Judge.

Action by W. P. Lambert against J. L. Haskell and Christian Westphal, on an injunction bond. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal.

C. H. Parker and R. Percy Wright, for appellants. Lloyd & Wood, for respondent.

HAYNE, C. Action against the sureties on an undertaking on a preliminary injunction. Verdict and judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal from the judgment, and from an order denying their motion for a new trial. We think that the judgment and order appealed from must be reversed. But as some of the questions will arise upon a retrial, we have examined them.

1. We think that the complaint states a cause of action. The argument against it is that material allegations are omitted, and that such omission cannot be supplied by a copy of the undertaking annexed to the complaint; and the case of Los Angeles v. Signoret, 50 Cal. 298, is cited. The objection goes, in effect, to the long-existing and well-established practice of pleading by setting forth in full the instrument upon which the action or defense is founded; for there can be no difference between setting forth such instrument in the body of the pleading and in annexing it as an exhibit, and making it a part of the pleading by a proper reference. In each case the copy is part of the pleading. The only difference is in the arrangement or sequence of the parts. And this difference is entirely unimportant upon the question whether the pleading states a cause of action. The objection, therefore, as above stated, goes to the propriety of pleading an instrument by setting it forth in full. This, however, is a recognized mode of pleading in this state. In Stoddard v. Treadwell, 26 Cal. 303, the court distinctly stated that "a contract may be declared on according to its legal effect or in hæc verba." And the same rule has been laid down in other cases. Murdock v. Brooks, 38 Cal. 603; Joseph v. Holt, 37 Cal. 253; Hallock v. Jaudin, 34 Cal. 175; Wills v. Kempt, 17 Cal. 98. In Joseph v. Holt it was said that if there was any preference between the two modes of pleading it was more in harmony with our system to set forth the instrument. This does not mean that the party may plead matters of mere evidence. The instrument must be one on which the action or defense is founded. And the instrument set forth must be free from defect or ambiguity; if not, the pleader must put some construction upon it by averment. Durkee v. Cota, 74 Cal. 315, 16 Pac. Rep. 5. And the practice seems to be recognized by express provisions of the Code. Code Civil Proc. §§ 447, 448. The case of Los Angeles v. Signoret is not at all in conflict with the decisions above cited. It merely establishes what seems to us to be an obvious and necessary qualification of the rule, viz., that matters of substance, which are preliminary or collateral to the instrument pleaded, cannot be supplied by the recitals of the instrument. This must be true. All that is accomplished by setting forth an instrument in full is to allege its existence and character. It does not involve an assertion of the truth of preliminary or collateral matters recited in the instrument. Whatever may be the effect of such recitals as evidence, they cannot serve as allegations in pleading. The facts of the case relied upon will illustrate this. The action was upon a street assessment. The street law required certain preliminary steps to be taken to give the municipal authorities jurisdiction to make the assessment. The complaint was silent as to the taking of these steps. The only thing to show that they had been taken was the fact that they were recited in the assessment. This did not amount to an assertion by the pleading that the steps had been taken. It was at most an assertion that the officer who made the assessment had asserted that they had been taken, which was clearly insufficient. Now, in the case before us the complaint sufficiently alleges the existence of the preliminary facts. It alleges the pendency of the injunction suit, and the making of an order requiring an undertaking with specified conditions, viz., an undertaking "conditioned that said sureties on said undertaking would pay to said Wm. P. Lambert, B. W. Brown, et al., the said parties enjoined, all damages that they might sustain by reason of said injunction, if said court should finally decide that said Alpers and Mowry were not entitled to the same; said damages not to exceed $10,000." It then alleged that an undertaking had been given in compliance with said order, and annexed said undertaking as an exhibit, making it a part of the pleading by reference. This was a sufficient showing of the terms of the contract of the sureties, and "the condition upon which their liability was to arise." The "nature of the obligation" set forth was a matter of law, which it was not necessary to allege. Nor do we think that appellants are right in their contention that the complaint does not show the acts which were sought to be restrained, and that it cannot be seen from the pleading whether the injunction restrained the defendants from the commission of the acts referred to in the undertaking. The complaint first alleged that the business of the defendants in the injunction suit was the removal of dead animals, "and of trying out dead animals, and selling the oil, bones, hides, and other products derived from them." It then alleges that an injunction was issued, which was annexed as an exhibit, and referred to, "enjoining and restraining said plaintiff Brown et al. from carrying on said business as in said injunction particularly expressed." The injunction restrained the defendants "from maintaining your certain order-boxes mentioned in the complaint in this action, to which your attention is hereby directed, and from removing, or in any manner interfering with or disposing of, the carcass or carcasses of any dead horse, horses, or cattle within the limits of the city and county of San Francisco." The undertaking was given "in order to continue in force said injunction restraining said plaintiff Brown and others from carrying on their said business." This was sufficient, at all events, as against a general demurrer. The fulfillment of the conditions of liability, and the damages sustained, are sufficiently stated.

2. The appellants make several points, which rest upon the assumption that it does not appear that the undertaking in suit was given upon the preliminary injunction by which the parties were restrained, and that it appears that the undertaking was not so given. The facts out of which these objections grow are as follows: Shortly after the action was commenced a preliminary injunction was issued upon an undertaking in the sum of $2,000. Afterwards the court made an order that the injunction should be dissolved, unless the defendants should within 10 days give another undertaking in the sum of $10,000, with specified conditions. Such an undertaking was given within the required time, and is the one in suit; the one previously given having been released. It recited the commencement of the suit, and proceeded as follows: "Now, therefore, we, the undersigned, J. L. Haskell and C. Westphal, in consideration of the premises and of the issuing of said injunction, do jointly and severally undertake in the sum of ten thousand dollars, and promise to the effect that, in case said injunction shall issue, the said plaintiffs will pay to the said parties enjoined such damages, not exceeding the sum of ten thousand dollars, as such parties may sustain by reason of said injunction, if the said district court finally decide that the said plaintiffs were not entitled thereto." It is argued that the phrase "in case said injunction shall issue" shows that some injunction to issue in the future was intended, and that it must be held that the undertaking was upon the final injunction, to be issued in case judgment should be ordered for the plaintiffs upon the trial. But we do not think so. If the language had been "in case said injunction 'shall be continued in force'" instead of "shall issue," there could have been no doubt. The question is, therefore, whether the words "shall issue" can be construed to mean "shall be continued in force." Now, we think that there might be cases in which the circumstances would show that the two phrases were used as equivalent to each other. There is no provision of statute expressly authorizing the requirement of an undertaking as a condition for "continuing" an injunction. The only provision is that an undertaking may be required "on granting" an injunction. But it cannot be doubted that the court has power, where it appears that the injunction was issued on an insufficient undertaking, to order (as it did in the case in question) that the injunction should be dissolved unless a sufficient undertaking should be given; or, in other words, should be continued in force only on condition that a sufficient undertaking should be given. Such a proceeding would be sustained upon the theory that the words "on granting" were broad enough to mean "on continuing in force;" for the transaction would be in substance and effect, though not in form, the "granting" of an injunction. And the same would be true if the lanuage had been "on issuing," instead of "on granting," the injunction. We think, therefore, that the two phrases mentioned may be held to be in some cases equivalent in meaning, if the circumstances show that such was the intention. And the circumstances here clearly show that such was the intention, for it is admitted by the pleadings that the undertaking in suit was given to continue in force an injunction. The complaint first alleged the granting of the injunction and the making of the order requiring a further undertaking, and then that in compliance with such order, "and in order to continue in force said injunction," the undertaking in suit was given. The answers deny that the defendants caused the undertaking to be filed, and aver that the plaintiffs in the injunction suit caused it to be filed. But if they executed the undertaking for the purpose mentioned, it is unimportant whether they or their principal caused it to be filed. This denial, therefore, is immaterial. The defendants further aver that they had no knowledge of "the order and character" of the prior proceedings in the suit. But the undertaking recites the pendency of the suit; and this recital is conclusive of their knowledge of the suit, (Pierce v. Whiting, 63 Cal. 540;) and, having such knowledge, they are bound to take notice of the "order and character" of the proceedings therein. It is therefore admitted by the pleadings that the undertaking was given to continue in force the injunction previously issued. In the face of this admission, can the defendants maintain that the undertaking was not given to continue in force said injunction? There are other considerations which lead to the same result. It is perfectly true that a surety cannot be held beyond the express terms of his contract. But the meaning of the terms used is a matter of interpretation; and "in interpreting the terms of a contract of suretyship the same rules are to be observed as in the case of other contracts." Civil Code, § 2837. One of these rules is that a contract must be interpreted so as to make it operative, and capable of being carried into effect, if it can be done without violating the intention of the parties. Id. § 1643. But to give the undertaking the construction contended for by the appellants would be to make it inoperative, and of no effect. They say that it means that it was given upon "the perpetual injunction to be obtained by the judgment of the court as the result of the action." And the counsel are driven to this position; for unless it means either the continued injunction or the final injunction, it does not mean anything. But it is obvious that it cannot mean the final injunction, for, aside from the absurdity of requiring an undertaking a long time prior to the judgment upon which it was to be given, and the uncertainty as to which party would prevail upon the trial, it is manifest, for reasons stated below, that no undertaking could be required upon the final injunction; so that to adopt the construction contended for would be to make the order requiring an undertaking ridiculous, and the undertaking itself futile. Such a construction will not be adopted if a reasonable one be fairly open, which we think that we have shown is the case.

3. It is objected that the respondent was allowed to recover damages for the profits which he would have made had he not been prevented by the injunction from carrying on his business. We think that this was proper. It must be true that where a party is wrongfully prevented by injunction from carrying on a profitable and established business he can recover damages therefor. And if the profits which he would have made are not to be allowed, what damages is he to recover? Would it be adequate compensation to reimburse him merely for his expenditures, and for the losses which he might sustain from being prevented from fulfilling existing engagements, and the depreciation of his stock in trade? If this were true, there would be a very convenient way of getting rid of a business rival. A business might be destroyed by a preliminary injunction before the truth of the allegations upon which it was obtained could be inquired into. The best-considered cases agree that, where an established business is wrongfully injured or destroyed, the owner of the business can recover the damages sustained thereby, and that upon this question evidence of the profits which he was actually making is admissible. Terre Haute v. Hudnut, 112 Ind. 550 et seq., 13 N. E. Rep. 686; Allison v. Chandler, 11 Mich. 558 et seq; Chapman v. Kirby, 49 Ill. 219; Simmons v. Brown, 5 R. I. 299; Gibson v. Fischer, 68 Iowa, 30, 25 N. W. Rep. 914; Goebel v. Hough, 26 Minn. 256, 2 N. W. Rep. 847; Shafer v. Wilson, 44 Md. 268. The damages must be proximate, and not too speculative and remote. Thus it has been held that the profits which a party claims that he would have made from a contemplated extension of his business are too remote. Railway Co. v. Howison, 86 Ill. 215. But we think that the facts of the present case bring it within the rule above stated, although the business had only been established a short while.

4. We think, however, that the court erred in allowing the plaintiff to recover damages accruing after the final decree made in February, 1881. By it the court decreed that "the temporary injunction heretofore granted be made perpetual, and that said defendant be enjoined for the space of twenty years," etc. An appeal was taken from this decree, and it was reversed. The remittitur was filed in the lower court on July 5, 1882. Shortly afterwards the suit was dismissed upon motion. The trial court in the present case evidently proceeded upon the theory that the plaintiff herein was entitled to recover damages for the whole period from the giving of the undertaking down to the dismissal of the suit in 1882. It overruled an objection to evidence raising this question, to which ruling an exception was taken, and it is assigned as error; and subsequently (though not immediately) evidence was admitted in accordance with the ruling. The jury were distinctly instructed that the recovery, if any, should be for the whole period up to July 4, 1882; and it is evident from the record that the jury must have acted on this theory. The exceptions to the charge are probably too general. But we think that the record fairly presents the question in at least one way, if not in several. And the respondent claims to be entitled to damages for the whole period, and does not raise any question as to the sufficiency of the record. The position of the appellants is that all that could be recovered in any view was "such damages as were sustained by the parties enjoined by reason of the loss of profits of their business from the time the undertaking was given until the injunction was made perpetual by the court, i. e., between January 27, 1880, and February 5, 1881;" and we think that this position must be sustained, both as to the loss of profits and as to counsel fees. The condition of liability expressed in the undertaking is, "if the said district court finally decide that the said plaintiffs were not entitled," etc. This seems to us to point to the final decree to be made after trial of the case. But even if it were otherwise, even if the undertaking had expressly provided for a subsequent liability, if such provision be outside of what is required by the statute, it would be void; for it is settled that a statutory undertaking beyond what is required by the statute is to that extent without consideration and inoperative. Powers v. Crane, 67 Cal. 65, 7 Pac. Rep. 135; People v. Cabannes, 20 Cal. 528. The question is, therefore, what is the undertaking required by statute, and what liability does it impose? It seems plain that the undertaking provided for by the Code of Civil Procedure is upon the preliminary injunction. No other injunction is provided for therein; and, ordinarily, no undertaking could be required on the final decree. Possibly there may be exceptional cases in which the relief sought is of such a character as to make it proper for the court, under its general powers in deciding a case in equity, to require an undertaking from the plaintiff as a condition of relief; but ordinarily no undertaking could be required on the final decree. None could have been required upon the final decree in this case, and none was required. Hence, as above stated, it is plain that the undertaking provided for is upon the preliminary injunction only. Being upon the preliminary injunction, it can last only as long as such injunction continues, and expires with it. How long, then, does the preliminary injunction last? We think that the whole theory of a preliminary injunction is that it is to preserve the rights of the party until the truth of the charge can be regularly investigated. It is called by the Code a "provisional remedy." When the truth of the charge has been investigated, and a final decree made, there is no longer any necessity for a preliminary injunction. It has served its purpose and its functions cease. If its functions do not cease, then, of course, it remains in force. But the final decree is also in force. The injunction awarded by a final decree is not suspended by an appeal. Heinlen v. Cross, 63 Cal. 44. Hence, if the preliminary injunction does not cease, there would be the anomaly of two injunctions in the same case, each restraining the same act, and each valid. But, overlooking this anomaly, how could it be said in such a case that the party is injured by the preliminary injunction? If it were out of the way he would still be restrained by the final injunction. He would be no better off if the preliminary injunction were annihilated. What difference, then, does it make to him? How can he be said to suffer damages from it? The practical effect of giving the party a remedy upon the undertaking after the final decree is to require a bond upon the final decree, which is not authorized by law. The proposition we have endeavored to state was recently expressed by the court of appeals of New York, in reasoning to a different point, as follows: "An injunction by order is a provisional remedy, and temporary in its character. It assumes a pending litigation, in which all questions are to be settled by a judgment, and operates only until that judgment is rendered. If by that a permanent injunction is granted, the temporary one is, of course, ended, and equally so, if a permanent injunction is in the end denied." Jackson v. Bunnell, 113 N. Y. 220, 21 N. E. Rep. 79. The same doctrine was laid down, and the very point which is involved here decided, in Webber v. Wilcox, 45 Cal. 302. The material facts of that case were identical with the material facts of the case before us. A preliminary injunction was granted, and, after trial, a final injunction was decreed. The final decree was appealed from, and was reversed, and the suit was thereupon dismissed. In an action upon the undertaking it was held that there could be no recovery against the sureties for costs, or counsel fees expended after the rendition of the final decree in the court below; and the supreme court said: "When the decree for a perpetual injunction was rendered, the order for a preliminary injunction was merged, or ceased to have any further effect, and thereafter the case stood in the same condition, in respect to damages, as it would have done had no preliminary order been made." This case holds that the function of a preliminary injunction ceases upon the rendition of the final decree. And upon the same principle (differently applied) it has been held that the functions of a restraining order, pending the issuance of a preliminary injunction, cease upon the issuance of the latter. Cohen v. Gray, 70 Cal. 85, 11 Pac. Rep. 508. It results that the plaintiff cannot hold the sureties in damages, either for loss of profits or counsel fees accruing after the final decree in the court below.

The case of Webber v. Wilcox was not overruled by Porter v. Hopkins, 63 Cal. 53, as contended for the respondent. It is true that it was there held that counsel fees in the supreme court could be recovered from the sureties on the preliminary injunction. But this was held with reference to counsel fees on appeal from the order refusing to dissolve the injunction, and not with reference to counsel fees on appeal from the final decree. It is obvious that the party may move to dissolve the injunction without waiting until the trial of the cause, and may at once appeal from the order denying his motion. This appeal may possibly be disposed of before the final decree is made. In such case the preliminary injunction would not be merged in the final decree, for the simple reason that there would be no final decree; and the counsel fees on appeal from the order would be incurred in procuring a dissolution of the injunction, and would, therefore, be properly allowed as damages. Even if a final decree be rendered after the appeal from the order, and before such appeal be disposed of, it would seem reasonable that, inasmuch as it was taken before the decree, the party would be entitled to have it disposed of without reference to facts subsequently occurring in a different line of procedure. Now we have examined the report of the case of Porter v. Hopkins, in connection with the record on which the decision was rendered, (see volume 305, Supreme Court Records,) and we think that the most that can be claimed for it is that it decides—First, that the party enjoined is entitled to counsel fees upon appeal from the order refusing to dissolve the preliminary injunction, where such order is made and appealed from before the final decree is made; and, second, that, even when the final decree is made after such appeal, but before it is disposed of, the party is entitled to have his appeal disposed of, and may in a proper case recover his counsel fees thereon. We do not desire to be understood as expressing a positive opinion upon the second proposition, or as asserting that it was decided in the case. We merely say that the two propositions are the most that any one could claim to have been decided by the case. Neither of the propositions is in conflict with the doctrine of Webber v. Wilcox.

In the present case it does not appear that any appeal was taken except from the final decree itself; and, as has been stated, the plaintiff, under these circumstances, cannot recover either for loss of profits or for counsel fees after the making of this decree. The cases of Clark v. Clayton, 61 Cal. 634, and Dougherty v. Dore, 63 Cal. 170, are not in conflict with this conclusion.

It is unnecessary to consider whether the reversal of a final decree would revive a preliminary injunction previously granted. It is probable that it would. It is probable that the preliminary injunction in such case would stand "in the same attitude in all respects as before the former trial." See Hess v. Winder, 34 Cal. 270. But that is a question which is not presented by the record here.

Inasmuch as the case must be reversed for the above reasons, there are two observations which we think should be made with reference to a retrial. In the first place, the liability of the sureties commences with the giving of the undertaking. They are not liable for counsel fees or loss of profits previously expended or incurred, although evidence of the previous condition of the business is admissible for the purpose of showing its extent and character. In the second place, the counsel fees for which the sureties may be held are not those expended for the defense of the suit, but only those which have been expended solely or principally in procuring a dissolution of the injunction. Newton v. Russell, 87 N. Y. 531; Bustamente v. Stewart, 55 Cal. 115. And the evidence must show a case within the rule. It is not sufficient to show the value of service rendered in the case generally. Mitchell v. Hawley, 21 Pac. Rep. 833, No. 11,987, filed May 28, 1889. We advise that the judgment and order appealed from be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; VAN CLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

MORGAN v. BALL. (No, 13,220.)

FRAUDULENT GIFTS.

A husband, when perfectly solvent, made a gift of personal property to his wife, who duly accepted it. After delivery the husband at all times represented, claimed, and admitted that the property was the separate property of the wife, and whenever it was loaned to others it was by the direction and consent of the wife, and not of the husband. The latter, however, continued to use the property as before, and there was nothing in its use by the wife that was inconsistent with ownership by the husband, or from which the public could determine that the title had passed to the wife. The husband afterwards left the state, and the property was for a while in litigation, and in the hands of the sheriff, but otherwise the wife had the exclusive possession and use thereof. Held, that there was an "immediate delivery, followed by an actual and continued change of possession," within Civil Code Cal. § 3440, which makes every other transfer of personal property made by a person having possession and control fraudulent as to his creditors while he remains in possession, and the successors in interest of such creditors, etc.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Butte county; Phil W. Keyser, Judge.

Action by Belle M. Morgan against John M. Ball for the recovery of certain personal property or its value. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Reardan & Freer and H. V. Reardan, for appellant. John Gale, for respondent.

Foote, C. This action is for the recovery of the possession of certain personal property from the hands of the defendant, or, if delivery cannot be had of the property, for its value. The court below gave judgment as prayed for, and from that this appeal is taken.

In a former adjudication by the appellate court the property concerning which this litigation is now had was declared to be that of the plaintiff, derived by gift from her then husband, W. J. Morgan, and made by him without any fraud as to his existing creditors. Morgan v. Hecker, 74 Cal. 540, 16 Pac. Rep. 317. It appears from the findings in the present cause that the property, consisting of a mare, her colt, and a buggy, were given to the plaintiff, Belle M. Morgan, then the wife of W. J. Morgan, by him in good faith, when he was solvent, and able to pay his debts, and that at the time of the making of the gift the property was delivered to and accepted by his wife. Several years after the gift was so made, delivery and acceptance had, the husband became indebted upon a promissory note to one Daniel McCarthy in the sum of $300. After the note became due, on the 3d of May, 1888, it having been transferred to Fred Hecker, he commenced an action to recover what was due upon it. On the day the action was begun an attachment was issued in aid of it, and on the 3d of May, 1888, was levied by the sheriff of Butte county, the defendant here, upon the property involved in this discussion. On the 18th of May, 1886, Belle M. Morgan filed an inventory of her separate property, including the mare and buggy, but not the colt, in accordance with the provisions of sections 165, 166, Civil Code. About the month of May, 1886, W. J. Morgan, the husband of the plaintiff, left the state of California, and has never returned. At the time of his departure, and on the 23d of March, 1886, when he became indebted to McCarthy on the note afterwards transferred to Hecker, Morgan was greatly in debt and insolvent. It is further found that after the 6th day of July, 1883, the day on which Morgan gave and delivered possession of the property to his wife, as set forth heretofore, and until his departure from this state in 1886, he used it jointly with her, with her consent and knowledge, and that his use of it was the same after as before the gift; that there was nothing in the use of the same property by the plaintiff, Belle M. Morgan, which was inconsistent with its ownership by her husband, the donor, or from which the public could determine that the title of the property had passed, by gift or otherwise, to the plaintiff; that the colt was the foal of the mare, and all the expense of its getting and rearing was paid by the husband; that the use of the colt by him after its birth was identical with his use of the mare and buggy; but that at all times after the gift and delivery of possession was made the husband represented, claimed, and admitted that the property in question was the separate property of his wife, and whenever it was loaned out to or used by any other person than the wife or her husband it was loaned out and used by the direction and consent of the wife, and not by that of the husband; that during nearly all of the time since the departure of the husband from the state, and from whom it seems at this time the wife is divorced, the property has been the subject of litigation, and in the hands of the sheriff of Butte county; that during such times as it has not been in the hands of the sheriff the said plaintiff has had the exclusive possession and use thereof.

Upon this state of facts the appellant contends that the transfer to the plaintiff of the personal property now under consideration was fraudulent and void as against the successor of the husband's creditors, because, as is claimed, such transfer is not shown to have been accompanied by "an immediate delivery, and followed by an actual and continued change of possession of the thing transferred," so as to satisfy the provisions of section 3440, Civil Code. In this connection it is urged that for the wife to be able to maintain her claim she must have complied with sections 165, 166, Id., as otherwise the use by her husband of the property in a similar manner after as before the gift would be obnoxious to the provisions of section 3440, supra; and, as she did not so comply until the creditors' rights had attached, it was of no avail. Admitting, as the defendant contends, that sections 165, 166, supra, were intended as a means to enable a wife to protect her rights, because of the difficulty resulting from her relations as wife, in showing an immediate delivery and actual and continued change of possession to her from her husband, yet it seems to us that the provisions of section 3440, supra, have in this instance been fully met. The property was delivered to her, and she took immediate possession of it, when her husband was solvent, and could legally invest her with title. Her possession was actual and continuous so far as it could be, considering the relations she bore to her husband. His use of it was the same, so far as he was concerned, as it had always been. Her use was not inconsistent with his ownership, but the use of it by all other persons was openly as her property. It was proclaimed by her husband that the property was hers, and it seems to have been publicly known and recognized as hers by all who used it. In what other better way could the wife, consistent with her relations as wife, have maintained and had an immediate delivery of possession, followed by an actual and continued change of possession? She did not refuse her husband the use of it, but she did take it into possession at once, and continuously keep and use it as hers as to all the world, and it was not in any way used or possessed by her husband, except as subordinate to her dominion, possession, and control. The object of section 3440, supra, as contended for by the defendant, is to require an immediate delivery and continued change of possession of personal property after its transfer, in order, as he says, to give notice to the world that ownership has changed. If that is so, then, when a husband in solvent circumstances gives his wife personal property, which is at once delivered to her, and the possession is not resumed or continued by the husband as the owner of the property, but he simply continues to use it as he has hitherto done, and the wife has actual possession and claims it openly as owner, he declares it as hers, and all their acts show to the public that the property is hers from the date of the gift, she uses it as a wife ordinarily does, and all others use it as hers, acknowledging and owning it as hers, it seems to us that the object of the law is accomplished. It has been held that it is sufficient if there are circumstances which authorize the inference of a change of ownership. Clark v. Rush, 19 Cal. 394. It cannot be that the circumstance of a mere use by the husband of property given by him to his wife when he is solvent and can legally present her with it, such use being the same after as before making the gift, will make the gift void as to debts contracted by him while so using it, if a delivery of possession was made immediately to the wife, and that possession has been continuous, and such as is usual when a gift of this sort is made by a husband to a wife; and the acts and declarations of both these parties, and the acts of all other persons who use the property, both before and after the debt is incurred by the husband, are openly declarative and in acknowledgment of the wife's ownership and control over it, as distinct and changed from her husband to her. We perceive no prejudicial error, and advise that the judgment be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; GIBSON, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is affirmed.

DEWEY v. SUPERIOR COURT et al. (No. 13,299.)

COMMITMENT FOR CONTEMPT.

1. A judgment enjoined defendant from maintaining a certain dam or other obstructions in a certain creek, and from maintaining a certain ditch or canal in any condition that would interfere with the rights of plaintiff. Afterwards, on proceedings for contempt for violating the injunction, the court found that it was within defendant's power to obey the judgment, "and to remove said dam, and to fill up the mouth of said ditch, * * * and to cease to divert the waters of said creek;" and the court ordered that defendant be committed to the custody of the sheriff, and confined in jail till the dam or obstruction be removed, and the ditch be filled. Held, that the order committed defendant for omission to perform an act not commanded in the injunction, and, as Code Civil Proc. Cal. authorizes imprisonment only for contempt which "consists in the omission to perform an act which is yet in the power of the person to perform," the court exceeded its jurisdiction.

2. Under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 949, providing that the perfecting of an appeal (with certain exceptions not covering an appeal from an injunction) stays proceedings in the court below, an appeal from an order granting an injunction stays proceedings on all parts of the order commanding some act to be done, and the court had no power, pending appeal, to punish for omission to comply with the order to remove the dam, or fill the ditch.

THORNTON, J., dissenting.

In bank. Writ of review to superior court, Merced county; CHARLES H. MARKS, Judge.

Jarboe, Harrison & Goodfellow and J. W. Knox, for petitioner. Law & Law, for respondent.

FOX, J. This is a proceeding by writ of review to re-examine, vacate, and set aside an order of the superior court of the county of Merced, made after judgment, and in proceedings for contempt for violation of a judgment for injunction. The facts, as stated in the petition and appearing from the return, are that in a certain suit pending in said court, wherein one Turner was plaintiff, and Dewey, the petitioner here, was defendant, a judgment was made and given enjoining the defendant from maintaining a certain dam or other obstructions in Mariposa creek, and from maintaining a certain ditch or canal of defendant in any condition that would interfere with the rights of plaintiff, as in the said judgment and in the findings and conclusions of the court set forth; it being thereinbefore set forth that the plaintiff had the right to all the waters flowing in the Mariposa creek, without interruption by the defendant, down the bed, along the natural water channel of said creek, except at such times as there may be a surplus of water running in said creek. The judgment also awarded the plaintiff $1,000 damages. From this judgment an appeal was perfected to this court, and the statutory stay bond for the money judgment and bond for costs were duly given. After the perfection of such appeal, proceedings were instituted in the same case, and in the manner prescribed by the statute, to punish the defendant for violation of such injunction; the defendant was duly cited to appear and show cause, etc., and upon the hearing the defendant was adjudged guilty of contempt, and was fined in the sum of $150, and it was also ordered that he be committed to the custody of the sheriff of Merced county, and confined in the county jail until all dams and obstructions placed in said Mariposa creek by him, or through his procurement, which would obstruct the flow of the water therein, be dug out and removed therefrom, and until the ditch leading from said creek be filled up substantially, so that the waters of said creek cannot be diverted thereby. It is contended that this order requires of the defendant, petitioner here, things which were not required by the original judgment; imposes on him obligations not imposed thereby; and punishes him for the non-performance of duties which the judgment did not require him to perform.

The court clearly had jurisdiction of the proceedings for contempt, and upon the hearing of that proceeding it appears that evidence was taken, upon which the court found, among other things, that the defendant had, in violation of said injunction, "diverted and permitted the waters of said creek to be diverted from said creek, and from the lands of plaintiff, and deprived the plaintiff * * * of the use thereof." The evidence upon which such finding is based is not sent up. The finding itself is within the issues, and the jurisdiction of the court, and its judgment of conviction thereon rendered is final and conclusive. Code Civil Proc. § 1222. But the court further finds "that it is now, and was at all the times herein mentioned, within the power of said defendant, Henry Dewey, to fully obey said judgment, and to remove said dam, and to fill up the mouth of said ditch where it enters the said creek, and to cease to divert the waters of said creek therefrom, and from the lands of said plaintiff."

We have looked in vain in the "said judgment" for anything commanding or requiring the defendant to "remove said dam," or to "fill up the mouth of said ditch," either in express terms or by any fair implication. The dam was a wing-dam, reaching part way across the creek only, and both dam and ditch were constructed and owned by this defendant and two others in common, and in equal parts, but for the use and benefit of separate tracts of land held by the several parties in severalty, and said two other persons were never made parties to this suit. This fact is alleged under oath, and not disputed, and it furnishes a very good reason why the original judgment should have been prohibitory only against the defendant, and not mandatory, requiring of him an act which he could not do without making himself liable to others not parties to the suit, and over whom the court had no jurisdiction. But, notwithstanding the omission of all words of a mandatory character in the original injunction, we find the court, in this proceeding for contempt, and upon the faith of the finding above quoted, "ordered, adjudged, and decreed that he, the said Henry Dewey, be committed to the custody of the sheriff of Merced county; and that said sheriff confine him in the county jail of this county until all dams and obstructions placed in said Mariposa creek by said Dewey, or through his procurement, which will obstruct the flow of the water therein, be dug out and removed therefrom, and until the ditch leading from said creek be filled up substantially, so that the waters of said creek cannot be diverted thereby." This order we think was clearly in excess of the jurisdiction of the court. It is an order which can only be made upon and in consequence of a conviction for contempt which "consists in the omission to perform an act which is yet in the power of the person to perform," and which has been required by the terms of the original order which the party is charged with having violated. Code Civil Proc. § 1219. The original order or injunction did not require him to perform the act which is by this order enjoined upon him, and for the on-performance of which it is now ordered hat he be imprisoned.

Again, even if, by implication, the original injunction required the defendant to perform the act required of him by the last-named order, the court had no jurisdiction, at the date of entering said order in the proceedings for contempt, to require him to perform the act, or to punish him for its non-performance. At the date of that order an appeal to this court had been perfected from the judgment of the court below, the effect of which was to stay all proceedings for the enforcement of the judgment, except that of enforcing and punishing for a violation of the prohibitory injunction alone. An appeal, perfected as this was, under section 949, Code Civil Proc., stayed all proceedings upon every part of that judgment "commanding some act to be done." Mining Co. v. Fremont, 7 Cal. 130; Bliss v. Superior Court, 62 Cal. 544. A prohibitory injunction remains in full force, pending such an appeal, and the court below may enforce obedience thereto; but a mandatory injunction is stayed by the operation of such appeal, the object of the rule in both cases being to preserve the status quo. Otherwise the result of the final adjudication might often be a barren victory. During the pendency of the appeal, the court below could do no act which did not look to the holding of the subject of the litigation just as it existed when the decree was rendered. In the exercise of its authority, it was empowered to punish, as for contempt, for the violation of any provision of the injunction, where the parties were not allowing the property to remain as it was at the date of the decree. Mining Co. v. Mining Co., 13 Pac. Rep. 174, citing Hovey v. McDonald, 109 U. S. 161, 3 Sup. Ct. Rep. 136, and other cases. So in this case, the defendant may be punished for the actual diversion of the waters of Mariposa creek, pending the appeal, if done by himself, his agents, servants, or employes, or by his procurement, to the injury of plaintiff; but he cannot be punished for failure to remove the dam or fill up the ditch—First, because no such mandate is found in the judgment for injunction; and, second, because if there were such a mandate its execution would be stayed by the appeal, which has been perfected. It is therefore ordered that so much of the order of the superior court of the county of Merced made and entered on the 1st day of June, 1889, in the case wherein Nicholas Turner is plaintiff and Henry Dewey is defendant, as directs that the said defendant be committed to the custody of the sheriff of said county, and confined in the county jail of said county until all dams and obstructions placed in said Mariposa creek by him, or through his procurement, which will obstruct the flow of water therein, be dug out and removed therefrom, and until the ditch leading from said creek be filled up substantially so that the waters of said creek cannot be diverted thereby, be, and the same is, hereby vacated and set aside.

DEPOSITIONS IN FORMER ACTIONS.

Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 2034, provides that where a deposition has been once taken in an action it may be read by either party in any other action between the same parties upon the same subject. Section 1910 provides that the parties are to be deemed the same, where those between whom the evidence is offered were on opposite sides in the former case, and a judgment could in that case have been made between them alone, though other parties were joined with both or either. Held, in accordance with section 4, declaring that "the provisions of this Code shall be construed liberally," that the term "parties," in said sections, includes successors in interest; and a deposition taken in a former action is admissible in an action touching the same subject, and upon the same issues, wherein the plaintiffs are the former defendants, and the defendants are the grantees of the land in controversy from the former plaintiff.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Tulare county; W. W. CROSS, Judge.

W. C. Burnett, for appellants. Morrow & Stratton and N. O. Bradley, for respondents.

HAYNE, C. This suit was brought by one Frank T. Briggs and Mary E. Briggs, his wife, against his brothers, John G. and Albert L. Briggs, and one Mary J. Briggs, (which last made no defense,) for the purpose of setting aside a deed made by the plaintiff Frank to his father, Joseph W. Briggs. Judgment was given in favor of the defendants John and Albert, and the plaintiffs appeal.

The sole point made for the appellants is that the trial court erred in admitting in evidence the deposition of the father, Joseph W. Briggs. This deposition was taken in a suit brought by the father against the plaintiffs here. During the pendency of the father's suit he made a deed of gift of the property to the defendants John and Albert, and subsequently died. Thereupon the plaintiffs commenced the present suit as aforesaid. It is stipulated that the subject-matter of the father's suit "was identical with that of the suit at bar," and that "the issues in both cases were in all respects the same," with certain unimportant exceptions. It is further stipulated that the plaintiffs herein were "regularly notified of the taking of said deposition of said Joseph W. Briggs; that said Frank T. Briggs and Mary E. Briggs appeared by their counsel, W. C. Burnett, at the taking of said deposition, and were granted, and so exercised, the privilege of cross-examining said Joseph W. Briggs;" and that "said deposition was in all respects proper, and the same was taken upon full compliance with all provisions of law." The provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure in relation to the matter are as follows: Section 1870, subd. 8, provides that evidence is admissible of "the testimony of a witness deceased, or out of the jurisdiction, or unable to testify, given in a former action between the same parties, relating to the same matter." Section 2034: "When a deposition has been once taken, it may be read by either party, in any stage of the same action or proceeding, or in any other action between the same parties upon the same subject, and is then deemed the evidence of the party reading it." And in the chapter in relation to public writings, and in connection with provisions with respect to the conclusiveness of judgments, the same Code defines the word "parties" as follows: "The parties are deemed to be the same when those between whom the evidence is offered were on opposite sides in the former case, and a judgment or other determination could in that case have been made between them alone, though other parties were joined with both or either." Code Civil Proc. § 1910. The question is whether the phrase, "the same parties," in the above provisions, can be construed so as to include "successors in interest." It must be admitted that the strict and literal and ordinary meaning of the term is as appellant claims. But there is a larger, though less usual, meaning, which includes "all persons who are represented by the parties, and claim under them, or in privity with them." 1 Greenl. Ev. § 523. And a more liberal construction was given in the case of Fredericks v. Judah, 73 Cal. 608, 15 Pac. Rep. 305. There the testimony of a deceased witness, given in a former action brought against the plaintiff by the executrix of the person of whom the defendant was heir, and through whom he claimed, was proved by the introduction of the reporter's notes. It was held that there was no error, and PATERSON, J., delivering the opinion, after quoting from section 1870, above referred to, said: "Although in that action Mrs. Judah, as executrix, was plaintiff, it was an action between the same parties, within the meaning of this provision, for the executrix represented the heir therein, and the judgment in such cases is binding upon the heirs, whether they be made parties or not." That case is not absolutely identical with the case before us, for a successor in interest is not "represented" by his predecessor in the way that an heir is represented by the executor; but it affirms the principle that the phrase "the same parties" is not confined to the persons who are parties by name to the record. And we think that this principle is a sound one. Aside from the provisions of the Code, it is well settled that depositions taken in an action between two parties are admissible in actions between their successors in interest. 1 Greenl. Ev. §§ 164, 553, and 3 Greenl. Ev. § 326; Atkins v. Anderson, 63 Iowa, 743, 19 N. W. Rep. 323; Wade v. King, 19 Ill. 301; Goodrich v. Hanson, 33 Ill. 498; Adams v. Raigner, 69 Mo. 363; Cooper v. Smith, 8 Watts, 536; Kerr v. Gibson, 8 Bush, 130; Coke v. Fountain, 1 Vern. 413; Nevil v. Johnson, 2 Vern. 447; Starkie, Ev. *415; Pow. Ev. 187, 188; Steph. Dig. Ev. 48, 49. This rule was sanctioned by long experience, and was beneficial in operation. It is not an unsafe rule; for, while the successor in interest may not have had an opportunity to cross-examine the witness, yet the person in whose shoes he stands had, and this is sufficient for every practical purpose. The question arises, therefore, whether a long-settled and beneficial rule of evidence is to be abrogated by a somewhat strict construction of a phrase which is capable, without being strained, of a construction which would preserve the rule. We do not think that it should. The Code itself provides that its provisions "are to be liberally construed, with a view to effect its objects, and to promote justice." Code Civil Proc. § 4. And we think that if it had been the intention to change a well-settled and important rule such intention would have been expressed in plain terms. In this case there was a succession of interest on one side only. The appellants were parties to the suit in which the deposition was taken, and were notified of its taking, and were represented by counsel thereat, and were permitted to cross-examine the witness upon precisely the same issues as are involved here. We think that the ruling complained of was right, and we therefore advise that the judgment and order appealed from be affirmed.

Wright v. Roseberry et al. (No. 12, 811.)

Ejectment—Evidence.

1. The surrender of certificates of purchase of lands for the purpose of obtaining a patent therefor, as required by law, (Pol. Code Cal. § 3519,) does not destroy their value as evidence of ownership, in ejectment.

2. Nor does the issue of a patent for a portion of the land only, on the surrender of such certificates, destroy their effect as evidence of ownership of the remainder, in the absence of evidence as to why the patent was not issued for the whole.

3. Such certificates, and indorsements thereon, showing that patents had issued for part of the land described therein, together with the testimony of the surveyor general that patents had issued as noted in such indorsements, is sufficient proof of the patents to establish a prima facie case of ownership of the land patented, in the absence of an objection that the evidence is secondary, or on motion for nonsuit.

4. Where the certificates were produced on the trial by the surveyor general, who was examined and cross-examined in regard to them and the indorsements, and were left by him in the custody of the court, under its order, they will be considered as in evidence.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Yolo county; C. H. Garoutte, Judge.

C. P. Sprague, for appellant. J. C. Ball and S. C. Denson, for respondents.

Hayne, C. Ejectment. The plaintiff was nonsuited at the trial, and appeals from the judgment upon a bill of exceptions. The question is whether the plaintiff's evidence was sufficient to make a prima facie case. His evidence consisted of two certificates of purchase, and certain other documentary evidence, tending to show that the land was swamp land, and certain testimony in relation to said certificates. The case has been before the supreme court of the United States, and that court held that the documents made a prima facie case for the plaintiff. Wright v. Roseberry, 121 U. S. 517, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 985. That decision is conclusive in favor of the plaintiff, unless there is some material circumstance which was not presented to or considered by the court. The respondents contend that it now appears that said certificates had been surrendered and canceled, and that they are therefore no longer evidence of title. The certificates were produced at the trial by the surveyor general, who testified that they had been surrendered when the application for the patent was made, and were then in his office; that patents had been issued for a portion of the land; and that a notice of indorsement had been made upon each certificate as follows: On certificate No. 1,659 the following: "S. W. ¼ of S. E. ¼ of section 24, patented to Tierry Wright, April 14, 1884;" and on certificate No. 1,660 the following: "S.W. ½ and N. W. ¼ of sec. 36, patented to Teirry Wright, April 14, 1884." The witness testified that patents were issued for the portions designated in said indorsements, and were for part of the lands "described in the certificates." And the descriptions in the certificates show the number of the township, range, and meridian. The receipts upon the certificates show that the principal and interest thereon had been fully paid up. It will be observed that this evidence presents two cases, viz., one in which no patent had been issued; and the other, in which a patent had been issued.

1. As to the land for which no patent has been issued, we think that the certificates made a prima facie case. The indorsement does not constitute a material alteration. It does not purport to change the tenor or character of the instrument, but was a mere minute or memorandum of subsequent action; and such memorandum does not purport to be a cancellation of the certificate, and was not so, unless such a consequence results as a matter of law from the transaction appearing from the memorandum, viz., from the surrender of the certificates and the issuance of patents for a portion of the land described therein. The mere surrender of a certificate of purchase does not destroy its validity as evidence of title. The law requires that it shall be surrendered before a patent can issue. Pol. Code, § 3519; Duncan v. Gardner, 46 Cal. 25. And it cannot have been the intention that the holder should lose anything by complying with the law. The surrender is not absolute, but is for a certain purpose only; and upon such surrender (and until the patent has issued) the officer is the custodian of the document for the benefit of the person entitled. It is not impossible that the officer may be negligent. Or some mistake or inadvertence may occur, through which a considerable period may elapse before the patent is issued. And if during such a period a stranger should intrude, or be in possession, the owner of the certificate has the same right to have such person ejected that he had before his evidence of title was surrendered. It affirmatively appears that the surrender here was for the purpose of obtaining a patent; and therefore the surrender did not of itself destroy the effect of the certificate as evidence of ownership. Nor do we think that, if the certificate is otherwise valid, the fact that the officer has issued a patent for a portion of the land operates to destroy the certificate as to the remaining portion. We have not been referred by counsel to any provision of law which would work such a result; and the record does not show why the patent was not issued for the whole tract. It may be that the non-ac tion of the officer as to the omitted portion was mere inadvertence, or was the result of a clerical error; or it may be that the omission was owing to an erroneous view of the law on the part of the officer. In such case it might be considerable time before the error could be corrected; and we do not think that in the mean time the land is open to occupation by the public. If strangers intrude upon it, and the certificate be in fact valid, the owner should not be deprived of his recourse to the courts for redress, by the error or inadvertence of the officer. If the certificate be in fact invalid for any reason, such invalidity can be shown in such suit; but if it be otherwise valid the mere fact that patents have been issued for a portion of the land does not destroy the effect of the certificate as evidence of ownership. In the present instance no reason for holding the certificate invalid (other than the foregoing) is shown. If there were any such reason it should have been made to appear.

2. When a patent has been issued for the land called for by a certificate of purchase, the latter is superseded by the patent, and becomes functus officio. In this view the plaintiff's certificate was no longer evidence of ownership of the portion for which a patent had issued; but we think that, so far as this portion was concerned, the plaintiff made a prima facie case by the above-mentioned proof of his patents. As above stated, the surveyor general distinctly testified that patents had been issued, as noted in the indorsements upon the certificates, for part of the land "described in the certificates," and, taking his testimony in connection with said indorsements and certificates, the time when the land for which and the person to whom the patents were issued sufficiently appears. This, indeed, was not shown by the best evidence. But it is settled that, if a party permits his adversary to prove his case by secondary evidence, he cannot afterwards object that better evidence should have been produced. The secondary evidence is, under such circumstances, sufficient. Goode v. Smith, 13 Cal. 84; St. John v. Kidd, 26 Cal. 270; Janson v. Brooks, 29 Cal. 223; Rewrick v. Goldstone, 48 Cal. 555; Frink v. Alsip, 49 Cal. 103. There is a statement towards the close of the bill of exceptions that "all of the documentary evidence was objected to by the defendants, and each of them, upon the grounds of irrelevancy, incompetency, and immateriality." This does not show whether said objections were made at the time the evidence was offered, or towards the close of the trial. From the place in the bill of exceptions where the objection is inserted, the latter inference might perhaps be drawn. If such is the proper construction of the record, the objections were too late; for it is a familiar rule of practice that the party must make his objections to evidence at the time it is offered. If, therefore, the record is to be construed as showing that the objections were not made until towards the close of the trial, they were too late, and the case stands as if no objections were made. But without saying what the proper construction is, and assuming in favor of this branch of the respondents' case that the objections were made at the time the evidence was introduced, the same result follows; for, even where evidence is erroneously admitted against objection, but tends to prove something, full effect must be given to it upon motion for nonsuit, and upon the question of the insufficiency of the evidence to support the decision. This has been decided with reference to the insufficiency of the evidence. McCloud v. O'Neall, 16 Cal. 397; Pierce v. Jackson, 21 Cal. 636. And we think it plain that the same rule applies on motion for nonsuit. For reasons stated below it sufficiently appears that the certificate was admitted in evidence; and hence, upon any construction of the record, in this respect, there was sufficient proof of the patents to make a prima facie case as to the portion of the tract embraced therein.

Now, if either of the above positions is correct,—that is to say, if the plaintiff's evidence made a prima facie case either as to the land for which patents had been issued to him, or as to the land for which patents had not been issued,—the nonsuit cannot stand; for it cannot be seen from the record that the motion for nonsuit was made as to any particular portion of the tract sued for, (assuming that such a course would have been proper.) The record states that the motion for nonsuit was made "upon the several grounds then and there duly specified and stated," but it does not show what such grounds were, or whether the motion was as to a whole or a portion of the tract. Consequently, if either of said positions be correct, the judgment against plaintiff for the whole tract was erroneous.

3. It is contended for the respondents, however, that the certificates of purchase were not, as a matter of fact, introduced in evidence. They certainly were not formally introduced. They were at the time in the custody of the surveyor general. He was called as a witness, and produced and identified them. And the record states that the certificates of purchase were then placed in the hands of the reporter by the following order by the court: "It is ordered that the surveyor general leave them in the custody of the court until the conclusion of the case, thereupon to be returned to him at his office." The parties examined and cross-examined the surveyor general concerning them, and concerning the indorsements thereon. Furthermore, it is not entirely clear that the respondents' objections above quoted were not made to them; but, whether they were or not, it would seem clear from the other circumstances mentioned that both the court and the counsel for the appellant understood that the documents were in evidence; and under the circumstances they should be so considered. Compare Landers v. Bolton, 26 Cal. 414, 415; Pearson v. Pearson, 46 Cal. 628. We therefore advise that the judgment be reversed, and the cause be remanded for a new trial.

We concur: FOOTE, C.; GIBSON, C.

BORN v. HORSTMANN et al. (No. 12,586.)

WILLS—CONSTRUCTION—CONDITIONS.

A bequest to testator's daughters, to take effect "in the event of any of my said daughters becoming a widow, or otherwise becoming lawfully separated from her husband," is not void as against public policy by encouraging the legatees to become separated from their husbands.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JAMES G. MAGUIRE, Judge.

For opinion on application to modify stay of proceedings, see ante, 169.

Charles A. Summer, (M. T. Moses, of counsel,) for appellants. E. J. Linforth and A. H. Loughborough, (Henry N. Clement, of counsel,) for respondent.

WORKS, J. One Margaretha Faulhaber died the owner of certain real estate, and left surviving her four daughters and one son; some, if not all, of whom had children, who still survive. The deceased left a will, by which she conveyed her property to one Peter Schenkel and the defendant Horstmann, to be held and disposed of as follows, after the payment of certain specific bequests: "(4) To quarter-yearly equally distribute and pay unto my hereinafter named son and four daughters, during the term of their natural lives, the net income of the remainder of my said estate, in their own right, share and share alike, viz., Frank Faulhaber; Magdalena Ellen, now the wife of Henry Lux; Caroline, now the wife of Charles Born; Elizabeth, now the wife of George W. Zimmer; and Mary, now the wife of Christian Scheiffler. (5) And in the event of the death of any of my said children, then to equally distribute, transfer, and convey the net one-fifth part of the remainder of my said estate unto the surviving lawful issue of such deceased child, in her, his, or their own right, share and share alike. (6) In the event of the death of any of my said children without having any lawful issue surviving the same, then to quarter-yearly equally distribute and pay such proportion of the said income as the deceased should be entitled to receive (if living) by this will unto such of my said children as may survive the deceased in their own right, share and share alike. (7) And in the event of any of my said daughters becoming a widow, or otherwise becoming lawfully separated from her husband, then to distribute, transfer, and convey unto such of my said daughters the net one-fifth part of the remainder of my said estate, in her own right, and in lieu of the further distribution and payment to her of any of the said income." Horstmann alone accepted the trust. The will was probated, the estate settled, the specific bequests paid, and the residue of the property distributed to Horstmann, to be held in trust by him as provided in the will.

The plaintiff in this action was one of the daughters named in the will. After the property was distributed as above stated she was divorced from her husband, and the trustee, acting under the seventh clause of the will, conveyed to her the undivided one-fifth of the real estate, and this action was brought by her for a partition of the property, and to have her interest therein set off to her. The other daughters, who were made defendants, answered, among other things, as follows: "That it was the intention of said testatrix, in and by the said will, to give to each of her said daughters in fee-simple, an undivided one-fifth interest in the said land, upon condition that they should respectively separate or become divorced from their respective husbands, and that said condition was annexed to the said devise by said testatrix with intent to incite and encourage her said daughters to live separate or be divorced from their said respective husbands. That the said condition, and the provisions of the said will, in that behalf, are contrary to good morals and the policy of the law, and the trusts for that purpose created are null and void." We are pleased to see that this allegation is not verified by the daughters, but by their attorney, who cannot be charged with having reflected upon a dead mother in order to obtain possession of her property. The children of the son, who was deceased, and of the daughters, were also made defendants, and answered by guardian ad litem. The court below found the facts substantially as above stated, and also "that it was the intention of said testatrix, in and by said will, to give to each of her said daughters, in fee-simple, an undivided one-fifth interest in the said real estate, upon condition that they should respectively separate or become divorced from their respective husbands, and that said condition was annexed to said devise by said testatrix with intent to incite and encourage her said daughters to live apart or be divorced from their respective husbands." As conclusions of law the court below found that the above-named conditions were void; that the daughters all took the property absolutely freed from said condition, and that their children had no interest in the property; and rendered judgment of partition accordingly. The children of the daughters, by their guardian ad litem, appeal.

Both the appellants and the respondent now agree in contending that the condition in the will which affected their rights to the property in case of a separation from their husbands otherwise than by death, was void; but they do not agree as to the effect of the provision being so held. The appellants contend that, construing that clause to be invalid, the daughters were not entitled to the property until the death of their husbands· while the respondent and the other daughters contend that the clause referred to being void, they were, as held by the court below, entitled to the property at once. We regret that we are unable to agree with counsel on either side, or with the court below, as to the proper construction of this clause in the will. In our judgment there is nothing in the conditions referred to that can be held to be against public policy. There are cases holding that a condition in a will which holds out to the legatee an inducement to live separate and apart from her husband is void as against public policy. Thus, in Brown v. Peck, 1 Eden, 140, the will provided that the legatee should be paid two pounds per month if she lived with her husband, but if she lived from him, and with her mother, she should be paid five pounds a month. In Wren v. Bradley, 2 De Gex & S. 49, the bequest was "to my daughter, Ann Jefferies Wren, the wife of Abraham Wren, in case she shall be living apart from her said husband, the said Abraham Wren, and shall continue so to do during the life-time of my said wife, an annuity of £30, by equal quarterly payments, the first of such payments to be made at the expiration of three calendar months next after my decease. And I do hereby further direct that, if at any time the said Ann Jefferies Wren shall cohabit with the said Abraham Wren, the said annuity hereinbefore given to her shall, during the time she shall so cohabit, absolutely cease and determine." In Conrad v. Long, 33 Mich. 79, the clause of the will was as follows: "To my brother, Frederick S. Conrad, I give and bequeath the one-half so remaining, and the other half I give and bequeath to my sister, Elizabeth Long, upon this condition: if at any time subsequent she should conclude not to live with her present husband, Henry Long, as his wife. But if she continue so to live as the wife of the said Henry Long until her death, then, in that case, I give and bequeath all my property, real and personal, remaining after the burial of my mother aforesaid, to my aforesaid brother, Frederick S. Conrad." In all of these cases the conditions quoted were very properly held to have been void. The reason is apparent. They held out a direct inducement for the legatees to live separate and apart from their husbands. The result may have been to bring about the separation and violation of their marital duties and obligations without any just cause, and in an unlawful manner. This is not so in the case at bar. The condition under consideration could not be complied with except by a legal separation, and for causes found by a court of justice to be sufficient. This being so, there was nothing unlawful in the condition. It is true it may be said that it would have a tendency to induce the wife to assert her legal right to a divorce and separation, and that but for such inducement such right might have been waived, but it can hardly be said that it is against public policy to attach to a legacy such a condition as will tend to induce a legatee to do a lawful act in a lawful way.

The precise question presented here has been before the supreme court of Vermont, in which the will provided that the legatee should have the income of the estate, and such further sums as her wants might demand, so long as she remained the wife of I. A. Thayer; but if she was "left a widow, or for any cause should cease to be the wife of said Thayer," the whole estate should be given to her. In that case the court said: "The ground upon which it is claimed that the provision of the will violates public policy is that it furnishes an inducement to the wife to become the widow of her husband, or to separate herself from him in such a manner that she would cease to be his wife. The appellants, to sustain this claim, rely upon the rule as stated in 2 Redf. Wills, 293; 1 Story, Eq. Jur. 291, and the case of Conrad v. Long, 33 Mich. 78. The cases cited in support of the rule laid down in Redfield and Story it will be found on examination do not sustain the rule as here sought to be applied. They are generally cases in which an inducement was directly held out to encourage a voluntary separation of husband and wife, and where the intent to encourage such a separation could be found in the language employed in making the bequest. They are none of them so similar in their facts to the case at bar that they can be considered authorities in it The first object is to ascertain, if possible, what the intention of the testatrix was; and we find no difficulty in reaching the conclusion that it was to have her estate disposed of just as it has been by the probate court. It was a wise and prudent provision to make for her daughter. While she should remain a wife, her husband would be under obligation to support her, and hence the income only was absolutely left her during the continuance of that relation; but when she should cease to be a wife, and so become dependent upon her own resources, it was just and wise to provide that she should have the entire estate." Thayer v. Spear, 58 Vt. 327, 2 Atl. Rep. 161. We fully concur in this view of the law. Not only may there be a good and sufficient reason, as stated in the opinion cited, for providing that the legatee shall not have the bulk of the property until she is deprived of the support of a husband, but there may be the best of reasons for placing the same in such condition that she cannot be improperly induced by a worthless or profligate husband to squander it, while she continues to be his wife, and, it may be, under his influence and control. We think such a condition in a will is not only valid, but that under certain circumstances it may be just and commendable. For these reasons the judgment of partition in favor of the plaintiff was proper, but so much thereof as authorized the balance of the property to be set off to the daughters who were still married was erroneous. It was error, also, to hold and adjudge that the children of the daughters last mentioned had no interest in the property. They are entitled to have the property remain undisposed of until the conditions of the will are complied with, and to inherit the same upon the death of their mother before the condition shall happen. Judgment and order reversed, and cause remanded for further proceedings in accordance with this opinion.

We concur: FOX, J.; PATERSON, J.

HUDEPOHL v. LIBERTY HILL CON. MIN. & WATER CO. (No. 12,570.)

MINES AND MINING—CONSTRUCTION OF AGREEMENT.

Defendant, a corporation, agreed to lease to plaintiff, for one year, the right to work and mine certain mining ground, the gross products thereof to be equally divided between plaintiff and defendant. Held, that such agreement was not a lease, even though the parties so termed it, and so was not within the statute (St. Cal. 1880, p. 131) declaring all leases of mining ground by corporations unlawful unless ratified by the stockholders, but was an agreement for the working of a mine on shares, and a promissory note given to plaintiff for his share of the products was upon a valid consideration.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Nevada county; J. M. WALLING, Judge.

Byrne & Cross, for appellant. H. L. Gear, Gaylord & Searls; and C. A. & F. P. Tuttle, for respondent.

WORKS, J. Action on a promissory note. Answer, want of consideration. Trial and judgment for the plaintiff. The defendant appeals on the judgment roll. The court found that the defendant, being a corporation, entered into the following contract with the plaintiff and one Buckman, through its superintendent: "Know all men by these presents that I, S. Wheeler, superintendent of the Liberty Hill Consolidated Mining & Water Company, for and on behalf of said company, have leased, and by these presents do lease, to C. Hudepohl and B. S. Buckman, for the term of one year from the date hereof, the right and privilege to work and mine the ground at or near Little York, in Nevada county, Cal., known as the 'Empire' and 'Manzanita' claims, on the following terms and conditions, to-wit: The said Liberty Hill Company to make all the improvements necessary for commencing and carrying on the work of mining. Said improvements to consist of putting in flumes and under-currents in Scott's ravine, and a short piece of flume in the Big Tunnel emptying into said ravine; to furnish sufficient iron pipe and hydraulic machines, and all the water in what is known as the 'Lower Bear River Ditch;' in consideration for which the said Hudepohl and Buckman are to work and mine the said ground in an energetic and workman-like maner, bearing all expenses for the same, and to have and receive one-half of all the gross products thereof, including leases of cuts, tunnels, flumes, and bed-rock, which they may have run through and over during the existence of this lease. The other half of such gross products to be paid over to the said Liberty Hill Company immediately on clean-ups or leases or sales being made. Prior to each and every clean-up being made, the superintendent of the Liberty Hill Company shall be notified thereof in time to be present if he chooses, and he shall have the custody of all the bullion and the other products until a division be declared. In witness whereof I have hereunto subscribed the name of the corporation, this October 10, 1881." That said agreement was never ratified by the stockholders of the company. That the plaintiff and Buckman worked the mines described in the contract, and delivered the bullion to said Wheeler, who deposited it with the bankers, and drew on them during the lease to pay the expenses of the mining, including the wages of plaintiff and Buckman and their hired help. That when they ceased work there remained in the hands of said superintendent $3,422.01 of their one-half of the proceeds of the mines taken out by them, and that the note sued on was given for that sum of money, instead of delivering to them the money or bullion itself. That the president and secretary of the defendant were authorized, by a resolution of the board of directors of the defendant, to execute the note. That the said board of directors consisted of five members. That one was absent, one voted against the resolution, and three in favor of it. That one of the directors who voted for the resolution was indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of $500 on a promissory note, and shortly after the resolution was passed the plaintiff surrendered said note to said director without consideration. Buckman assigned his interest in the note sued on to the plaintiff before this suit was commenced.

The appellant contends that the agreement above set out was the only consideration for the note. That said contract was a lease of the real estate of the corporation, and as such was void, for the reason that the same was not ratified by the stockholders as required by the statute of 1880, which provides: "Section 1. It shall not be lawful for the directors of any mining corporation to sell, lease, mortgage, or otherwise dispose of the whole or any part of the mining ground owned or held by such corporation. * * * unless such act be ratified by the holders of at least two-thirds of the capital stock of such corporation. Such ratification may be made either in writing, signed and acknowledged by such stockholders, or by resolution duly passed at a stockholders' meeting, called for that purpose." St. 1880, p. 131. If the agreement could be construed to be a lease of the real estate of the defendant, it may be conceded that the point made against its validity would be well taken; but we do not regard it as a lease. It is true the parties so term it in the instrument itself, but that cannot affect its legal construction. As we construe the agreement, it was one for the working of the mine on the shares, and the parties became tenants in common of the products of the mine when taken out. Bernal v. Hovious, 17 Cal. 545; Smyth v. Tankersley, 20 Ala. 212; Ponder v. Rhea, 32 Ark. 435; Somers v. Joyce, 40 Conn. 592; Scott v. Ramsey, 82 Ind. 330; Dinehart v. Wilson, 15 Barb. 597; Aiken v. Smith, 21 Vt. 172; Haywood v. Rogers, 73 N. C. 320. Such a contract does not create the relation of landlord and tenant, but fixes a rule of compensation for services rendered. It is, in all its essential features, a contract for labor to be performed and to be paid for by a share of the profits realized from such labor. Civil Code, § 1965; Crowley v. Mining Co., 55 Cal. 273; Gardenhire v. Smith, 39 Ark. 280; Jeter v. Penn, 28 La. Ann. 230; Adams v. McKesson's Ex'x, 53 Pa. St. 81; Hoy v. Gronoble, 34 Pa. St. 9. So construing this agreement, it was not within the prohibition of the statute of 1880, above referred to. The plaintiff was the absolute owner of the share of the products of the mine, ascertained and declared by the parties to have been $3,422.01, and the note given by its officers therefor was upon a valid consideration, and binding upon the defendant.

It is further contended that it appears from the findings that one of the directors of the defendant was induced to vote in favor of the resolution authorizing the execution of the note, by the surrender of or agreement to surrender to him his note held by the plaintiff. But the court does not so find, and there is no allegation in the pleadings upon which to base such a contention. It is found that the director voted for the resolution, and that his note was afterwards surrendered to him by the plaintiff without consideration, but the transaction is in no way connected with his action as such director, and the finding is wholly outside of any issue made in the pleadings. Judgment affirmed.

I concur: Fox, J.

Paterson, J. I concur. With the money in its treasury for which this note was given, it would be grossly inequitable to allow the corporation, after full performance, practically to retain the money which should have been turned over to H. & B. in specie as their share of the proceeds. I think the corporation is estopped by its acts. Argenti v. San Francisco, 16 Cal. 266.

California Powder Works v. Blue Tent Consolidated Hydraulic Gold Mines of California, Limited. (No. 11,896.)

Mechanics' Liens—Mines and Mining.

1. The claimant of a lien for materials furnished set out in its notice that the claimant undertook to furnish to a certain mining company explosives in such quantities as it might require, each parcel to be paid for at delivery, or as soon thereafter as might be, with interest upon such payments in case of delay. Held, that this notice was in substantial compliance with Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1187, requiring such claimant to state the terms, time given, and conditions of his contract, wherein the words "time given" mean the time of payment for the materials furnished.

2. Code. Civil Proc. Cal. § 1187, which provides that the notice of such claim must be filed within 30 days after the completion of the improvement, alteration, etc., does not refer to the operation of the mine, which may be continuous in its nature, as the thing to be completed.

3. As the right to a lien does not attach until the materials have been used, plaintiff does not lose such right by a failure to file its claim within 30 days after the materials were furnished.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; F. W. Lawler, Judge.

Olney, Chickering & Thomas, for appellant. Pillsbury & Blanding, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. C. This action was brought to recover judgment for a balance due for powder and other explosive materials, sold by plaintiff to defendant for use, and actually used, upon defendant's mining property in Nevada county, and to enforce a lien therefor on the property. The complaint was demurred to on the ground of ambiguity, the demurrer was overruled, and thereupon the defendant answered. After trial, judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiff for the amount prayed for, including an attorney's fee, and the whole amount was declared to be a valid lien upon the property. The appeal is taken by defendant from the judgment, and an order denying a new trial.

The court found upon every issue in favor of plaintiff. The appellant concedes that the finding as to the amount of the indebtedness was authorized, and no objection is made to the judgment in so far as it relates to that indebtedness; but it is contended that plaintiff was not entitled to a lien, and that the part of the judgment which awarded an attorney's fee, and declared the judgment a lien upon the property, was erroneous. It is admitted that, if plaintiff was entitled to a lien, the amount awarded as an attorney's fee was reasonable and proper. The material facts of the case are, in substance, as follows: Plaintiff was a corporation, organized in this state, and engaged in the business of manufacturing powder and other explosives. Defendant was a foreign corporation, engaged in the business of mining in Nevada county, in this state. In 1875, defendant, by its attorney in fact and general manager, Thomas Price, entered into a contract with plaintiff, by which plaintiff agreed to furnish defendant with all the powder, caps, and fuse it should need to develop and work its mine, the materials so furnished to be paid for upon the delivery of each parcel thereof, or as soon thereafter as might be, and, in case of delay in payment, the amount delayed to bear interest at the rate of 1 per cent. per month. No specific quantity was named, but plaintiff was informed that, under the contract, defendant would probably need from eight to ten car-loads a year. No time was named for the completion of the contract, and it remained in force without any change of terms till within 30 days prior to November 1, 1883. Under the contract plaintiff furnished defendant with explosives from time to time, as they were ordered, up to the 16th day of July, 1883; and all the materials thus furnished were used by defendant in the construction of ditches and tunnels, and in other work upon its mine. Payments on account of such supplies were made from year to year, whenever a clean-up was made. The last clean-up was made about the 1st of September, 1883, and the last payment on the 4th day of that month. General work upon the property ceased at the time of the last clean-up, but some work to protect and keep the property in repair continued to be done till the 1st of November. On the 31st day of October, 1883, an account was stated between the plaintiff and defendant, the defendant acting by its attorney in fact, Thomas Price, and the amount found and agreed to be due plaintiff for materials furnished under the contract was $77,447.76. On the next day, November 1st, plaintiff filed its claim of lien for this sum, and thereafter, in proper time, commenced this action.

1. The demurrer was properly overruled. We see no material ambiguity or uncertainty in the complaint, and no argument upon this point is made for appellant.

2. It is contended that the notice of lien was insufficient, because the contract set out had no date, and the notice did not specify any time when the contract was made, or when any transaction was had between the parties. All that the law required a claimant to state in his claim of lien, as to the contract, was "the terms, time given, and conditions of his contract." (Code Civil Proc. § 1187;) and it has been held that the words "time given" mean not the date or time when the contract was made, but "the time of payment for the work and labor performed and materials furnished, as agreed on and expressed in the contract," (Hills v. Ohlig, 63 Cal. 104.) The terms, time given, and conditions of the contract under which the materials were furnished in this case, as stated in the claim of lien, were that the plaintiff (naming it) "should, and it undertook that it would, thereafter, continuously, and from time to time, and in such quantities as the said" defendant (naming it) "should thereafter request, furnish to said" defendant, and that the said defendant "should take and receive of and from the said" plaintiff, "in such quantities as said" defendant "might require in its said business, the said blasting powder, caps, and fuse; and that said material so delivered should be paid for upon delivery of each parcel, or as soon thereafter as might be; and that in case of delay in payment the said" defendant "should pay interest upon the amount so delayed at the rate of one per centum per month."

We find nothing in the law requiring any statement in the claim of lien as to the date of the contract, or as to when the transactions were had between the parties, and in our opinion the notice filed by plaintiff was in substantial compliance with the requirements of the statute.

3. It is next contended that the notice of lien was prematurely filed. This contention is based upon the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure, fixing a time within which a notice of lien must be filed. The provision is that all persons other than original contractors (and that plaintiff was not an original contractor, see Sparks v. Mining Co., 55 Cal. 389, and Schwartz v. Knight, 74 Cal. 432, 16 Pac. Rep. 235) must file the notice within 30 days after "the completion" of the improvement, alteration, etc. It is alleged in the complaint that "the construction, alteration, and repair of said mining claim, ditch, ditches, aqueducts, tunnels, and other structures on said premises, has been, during all said time, kept up by said defendant, and the same has not been completed." And it is argued that if there had been no "completion" the notice was premature. The record shows that the defendant's mining claim embraced 640 acres of mineral land; that defendant had been mining on the claim for 8 years, and only about 15 acres had been worked off; that the operations carried on were the ordinary operations of hydraulic mining, and that the powder used for the mine was used in blasting down the banks, and in pulverizing the cement. It is evident that work upon a mine like this is continuous in its nature and has no definite completion, but may go on for 50 years or more. The statute, therefore, cannot have reference to the work upon the mine as the thing to be completed. To hold otherwise would, in effect, be saying that the legislature was guilty of the absurdity of referring to the completion of a thing which has no necessary completion, but may go on indefinitely. We do not think the claim was filed prematurely.

4. It is next urged that the claim, if not filed too soon, was filed too late, and was therefore invalid. The argument is based upon the fact that all the materials for which a lien is claimed were sold and delivered by plaintiff to defendant more than 30 days prior to November 1, 1883. But the right to a lien did not attach when the materials were furnished. To give it that right it was necessary for the planitiff to show not only that it had sold the materials to be used on the defendant's mine, but that they had actually been so used. Silvester v. Mine Co., ante, 217, (opinion filed Sept. 11, 1889.) Evidently when a party obtains blasting powder to be used in mining operations, as in this case, very little if any of it, would ordinarily be used on the day of its delivery, and most or all of it might not be used for days or months thereafter. Here it appears that all the powder furnished by plaintiff had been actually used by defendant when the lien was filed, but it does not appear at what particular time or times the last of it was so used. It must follow, therefore, that the plaintiff did not lose its right to a lien because of its failure to file its claim within 30 days after the materials were furnished.

5. It is not questioned that a materialman may have a lien in a case like this, and that he can have one. See Powder Co. v. Flume Co., 20 Pac. Rep. 419. This being so, the question remains, was the plaintiff's claim filed in time? The only provision of the statute upon the subject is that "every person, save the original contractor, claiming the benefit of this chapter, must, within thirty days after the completion of any building, improvement, or structure, or after the completion of the alteration or repair thereof, or the performance of any labor in a mining claim, file for record," etc. Code Civil Proc. § 1187. There was, however, as we have seen, no completion of the improvement of the mine, or of the alteration or repair thereof. The language quoted is therefore not strictly applicable to the case in hand, and no definite time was fixed, within which the claim was required to be filed, unless the use of the material or the suspension of work on the mine should be treated as the completion referred to. See Schwartz v. Knight, supra. But if no definite time was fixed by statute, then it was necessary only that the claim be filed within a reasonable time, and we cannot say that it was not so filed. If, on the other hand, the 30 days commenced to run when the last of the material was used, or when work was suspended on the mine, still we cannot say that the filing was not in time. The court found that "the defendant was engaged in the mining business upon the premises described in the complaint in this action, and was using the said premises, and the whole thereof, including the said ditches, flumes, aqueducts, reservoirs, tunnels, and other structures and improvements for that purpose, and had been so engaged in the business of mining upon said premises, and using the same for that purpose, within the period of thirty days next prior to said first day of November." This finding is assailed as not justified by the evidence, and it is specified that "the evidence shows that the defendant herein was not engaged in the mining business upon the premises described in the complaint at any time after the first day of October, 1883." But we think there was evidence tending to support the finding. A witness for the plaintiff testified that "there was more or less work being done all the time in 1883 upon this property, to keep it in repair and condition up to the time this lien was filed." And, again: "The defendant operated the mine all the time, down to the filing of the lien." At most it can only be said, we think, that there was a conflict of evidence upon this subject.

It results, in our opinion, that the judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: FOOTE, C.; GIBSON, C.

HIGHWAYS—PRESCRIPTION—ABANDONMENT.

1. Pol. Code Cal. § 2631, provides that, "by taking or accepting land for a highway, the public acquire only a right of way, and the incidents necessary to enjoying and maintaining the same, subject to the regulations in this and the Civil Code provided." Civil Code, § 806, provides that "the extent of a servitude is determined by the terms of the grant, or the nature of the enjoyment by which it was acquired," and is extinguished, when acquired by enjoyment, by disuse "for the period prescribed for acquiring title by enjoyment." Held that, where the public have acquired a right to use a highway by five years' user, as prescribed by statute, non-user for less than that period will not create an abandonment by operation of law.

2. Under Act. Cong. 1866, (Rev. St. U. S. § 2477,) granting the right of way for the construction of highways over public land, it is immaterial that the land over which such right of way was acquired was at that time, and at the time the use ceased, public lands of the United States.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Butte county; JOHN GALE, Judge.

Reardan & Freer, for appellant. John C. Gray, for respondent.

GIBSON, C. Action by plaintiff, as road overseer, to enjoin the defendant from obstructing an alleged public highway. Trial before the court without a jury. Judgment for plaintiff, from which defendant appeals.

From the findings it appears that in the year 1858, and prior thereto, a strip of land leading from the defendant's brick store, at Thompson's Flat, in the county of Butte, in a north-easterly direction to and beyond the "old school house" site at said Thompson's Flat, was and had been used by the residents of Thompson's Flat as a street or way to and from their places of residence. This use was discontinued after the year 1858, and for more than 20 years prior to the commencement of this action. On or about the year 1858 the trustees of the Thompson's Flat school-district established and built a public school-house, for public school purposes, at the north end of the strip of land, and continuously thereafter, and until 1884, used the same as and for a public school. In the latter year the trustees sold the land upon which the school-house was located, and removed the school-house therefrom. From 1858 continuously until the removal of the school-house the strip of land was used as a means of ingress and egress to and from the school-house by the children attending school, and by the teachers and other persons having business at the school-house. This was the only use made of the strip from 1858 until 1884, and since the latter year it has not been used by the public for any purpose. The right of the public to the use of the strip for the purposes of a highway was acquired by its use as a street until 1858, and thereafter as a way to and from the school-house until 1884. This right has never been declared abandoned or discontinued by the board of supervisors of Butte county, or by any one having authority to so abandon or discontinue the same. The strip of land in question was at all times prior to the year 1887 public land of the United States. In 1887 the defendant acquired the title of the United States government to it, and in 1888 caused the same to be inclosed with a fence, which fence is the obstruction complained of, and which was thereafter removed by the plaintiff as road overseer.

The court, in rendering judgment for the plaintiff upon these facts, evidently proceeded upon the theory that it having been established that the strip in question was once used as a public way, it continued as such, irrespective of its non-user, because it had not been abandoned by an order of the board of supervisors.

Appellant contends that as the necessity for the use and the use ceased, the right of the use was abandoned by operation of law. By section 2621 of the Political Code, it is provided that "a road laid out and worked and used as provided in this chapter shall not be vacated or cease to be a highway until so ordered by the board of supervisors of the county in which said road may be located. * * *" This section, if it were the only one relating to the same subject-matter, would support the conclusion of the trial court; but there is a provision of section 2619 of the same Code which must be construed with it. Babcock v. Welsh, 71 Cal. 402, 12 Pac. Rep. 337. It is as follows: "All public highways, once established, shall continue to be public highways until abandoned by order of the board of supervisors of the county in which they are situated, or by operation of law, or judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction." This section adds two additional methods by which an abandonment may be effected, viz., by operation of law and by a judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction. As the findings show that the use of the strip as a public way was not abandoned by an order of the board of supervisors, it becomes necessary to determine whether the right was extinguished by operation of law; that is to say, by the application of legal rules to the facts appearing in the findings.

An act entitled "An act concerning roads in the county of Butte," approved March 20, 1874, (St. 1874, p. 503,) provides that all roads used as such in the county of Butte for a period of five years shall be public highways. The public, having used the strip of land in question as a public way for five years prior to the passage of that act, acquired the right to use the same as a public way. Bolger v. Foss, 65 Cal. 250, 3 Pac. Rep. 871; Gloster v. Wade, 21 Pac. Rep. 6. "By taking or accepting land for a highway, the public acquire only the right of way, and the incidents necessary to enjoying and maintaining the same, subject to the regulations in this and the Civil Code provided." Pol. Code, § 2631. "The extent of a servitude is determined by the terms of the grant, or the nature of the enjoyment by which it was acquired," (Civil Code, § 806;) and is extinguished, "when the servitude was acquired by enjoyment, by the disuse thereof by the owner of the servitude for the period prescribed for acquiring title by enjoyment," (Id. § 811.) These provisions are part of chapter 3, pt. 2, tit. 2, of the Civil Code, which relates to private easements and servitudes; but they are made applicable to a public easement of the character in question by section 2631 of the Political Code, supra. The reason of the law is clearly to protect the public in the use of public highways by preventing an abandonment of the right to the use being presumed from the cessation of the use for any period less than that by which the right may be acquired. In this respect public highways are placed upon the same plane with private rights of way. The period by which the public acquired the right to the use of the right of way in question was fixed at five years by the act of 1874. This action was brought on February 11, 1888, and the use by the public of the right of way, as such, was not discontinued until 1884, therefore the period of non-user was less than five years, and insufficient to support a presumption of an abandonment by operation of law.

The fact that the land was public land of the United States at the time the right to use it as a public way was acquired, and also at the time the use of it ceased, makes no difference. The act of congress of 1866 (section 2477, Rev. St. U. S.) granted the right of way for the construction of highways over public land not reserved for public uses. By the acceptance of the dedication thus made the public acquired an easement subject to the laws of this state, and, the easement not having been extinguished by the operation of such laws, when the defendant acquired the title to the land, she took it subject to the easement. For illustration of the application of this principle see De Necochea v. Curtis, 20 Pac. Rep. 563, and further opinion on rehearing. (ante 198,) filed Aug. 31, 1889.

We therefore advise that the judgment be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; FOOTE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is affirmed.

CHALMERS v. CHALMERS. (No. 13,012.)

PARTNERSHIP—ACCOUNTING—PLEADING.

1. The complaint in an action for an accounting alleged a partnership between plaintiff and two defendants, which was denied. The proof showed that one of the defendants was not a partner, and a nonsuit was granted as to him. Held, that under the issue made there remained the question of the relation between plaintiff and the other defendant, which could be tried without amendment of the complaint. WORKS and FOX, JJ., dissenting.

2. Where evidence as to the disposition of fixtures is not admissible under the complaint in such an action, which alleges only a conversion by defendant of a stock of goods, upon a new trial an amendment should be allowed which will bring into the accounting all the partnership effects, in order to arrive at a fair adjustment of the partnership matters.

3. One partner should not be charged with a debt due to the partnership on the ground that through his neglect it was barred by the statute of limitations, where the other partner was familiar with the debts due the partnership, and could have enforced payment of the same.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Joaquin county; J. G. SWINNERTON, Judge.

W. L. Dudley, for appellant. Baldwin & Campbell, (Edward I. Jones, of counsel,) for respondent.

FOOTE, C. The plaintiff brought this action as a partner of the defendant, Alexander Chalmers, and one Brown for an accounting. He claimed that he and the defendants were members of a firm engaged in carrying on a dry goods business, and that the defendants forcibly took from his possession, and without his consent, a stock of goods composed of a general assortment of dry goods, dress goods, and fancy goods, and that the firm had outstanding book-accounts to the value of $2,500, which goods the defendants converted to their own uses, and deprived plaintiff of any use or ownership of them. That the book-accounts were collected, and were being collected, by the defendants, and converted to their own use. The defendants denied these allegations, a trial was had, and a nonsuit moved for, which was granted as to Brown, he not appearing to have been a partner in the commercial business, but an employe. The motion for a nonsuit was denied as to Alexander Chalmers, and, without an amendment of the pleadings, the trial proceeded as between him and the plaintiff on special issues submitted to the jury as follows: "(1) Were George Chalmers and Alexander Chalmers partners in the dry goods business prior to February 12, 1885? (2) Was the property taken from the store of Chalmers & Brown on the 12th day of February, 1885, partnership property? (3) Were the book-accounts that were taken from the store of Chalmers & Brown on the 12th day of February, 1885, partnership property?" To all of which, answers of "Yes" were returned by the jury. Thereupon the court made an order appointing August Muenter referee to take an account between George and Alexander Chalmers, and their partnership, to report his findings of fact, and a judgment as to the state of said account. The order was obeyed, and, according to the report and findings of the referee as to facts and conclusions of law thereon, it was found that there was due to the plaintiff from the defendant the sum of $1,909.34, with interest from the 12th day of February, 1885, at legal rates. Whereupon the court adopted the findings of the jury, and made other findings of fact based upon the findings and report of the referee, and upon them and its conclusions of law gave judgment for the plaintiff for $1,909.34 principal, $417.10 interest, making $2,326.44, and costs. After the motion for a new trial had been heard, the court, in an order then made, recited "that the judgment of this court, based upon the findings of the referee, is for $800 too much, and, plaintiff's attorney consenting thereto, it is hereby ordered that said judgment be, and the same is hereby, modified by deducting therefrom said sum of $800, and the defendant's motion for a new trial is denied." Upon the appellant's motion that order was amended by striking out the words "eight hundred" and inserting in lieu thereof "nine hundred and seventy-seven 64-100 (977.64.)" The order was made nunc pro tunc as of November 19, 1888.

Although the appellant does not complain of this method of reducing the judgment, we may remark in passing that it strikes us as being not the proper method to have pursued in the affair, and that it would have been the correct procedure to cause the plaintiff, by his attorney or himself, to enter a remittitur for the amount. The appeal is taken from the judgment as modified, and from the order denying a new trial.

It is urged that in the condition of the pleadings no such judgment is admissible; that the nonsuit ought to have been granted, because the proof showed no such partnership as alleged; that there was no finding upon the material issue whether the partnership, as alleged and denied existed or not. The allegation was that a partnership existed between three persons, doing business under the style of Chalmers & Brown. The proof was that two of the persons—that is, the plaintiff, George Chalmers, and the defendant, Alexander Chalmers—were such partners, but that Brown was not a partner. This necessitated the granting of the nonsuit as to Brown, and the trial of the question as to whether a partnership, as alleged, existed between the other two. When the issue was disposed of as to Brown, a part of it was determined. The undetermined part had to be tried. The allegation that the three were partners necessarily included as a part of it that the two Chalmers were partners in that firm, as the greater includes the less. The issue as to Brown's relation to the other two parties being determined, still left the relations between the two Chalmers brothers to be determined. Therefore the refusal of the nonsuit as to them, considering the proof made, was not improper. So the issue to be tried included the assertion on one side and a denial on the other that all three of the above persons were partners, and that the two Chalmers were such partners as well as Brown. When the relation in which Brown stood was determined by the nonsuit as to him, the question still remained to be declared, under the issue made, what the relations and acts of George and Alexander Chalmers were. This could properly be ascertained under the pleadings without an amendment.

It is further claimed that the court should not have refused instructions to the jury to the effect that certain evidence was before them, and could be considered in making up their verdict. It is true that the granting of the instructions would not have been error, because the evidence alluded to in them had been admitted, and was before the jury without objection. Yet, this being so, it is not perceived why any harmful error was committed in not telling the jury what they already knew; that is, that the evidence was before them for consideration. From the books it appeared, and the evidence is not contradicted, that Alexander Chalmers collected accounts due the firm to the amount of $2,015.35, and that of this sum he paid out $544.41 in liquidation of the indebtedness of the firm. The finding, therefore, of the referee that the defendant had only paid the sum of $197.74 is unsupported by the evidence. He did not get credit for the difference between $197.74 and $544.41,—that is, $346.67; and the court was not warranted in giving judgment against the defendant without allowing him credit for the full sum of $544.41.

As to the matter of fixtures, which entered into the referee's statement of the account between the parties, it may be that under the allegations of the complaint no evidence of what disposition was made of them was admissible, and that a finding as to the proportion which each partner took of them was outside of the issues made by the pleadings; that is to say, construing the language of the complaint strictly against the pleader, it is not clear that fixtures are a part of a stock of goods, although a part of the stock in trade of this partnership. Yet it is plain that, to arrive at a fair adjustment of the partnership matters, the portion of the fixtures which each partner appropriated, or any other property belonging to the partnership effects, should enter into the accounting, and a proper amendment of the pleadings to that end should be allowed, as the case must be retried upon other grounds.

We are of opinion that it was erroneous to charge Alexander Chalmers with the James E. Brown account, viz., $693.40 and interest. The finding upon the point is not explicit in declaring that the debt was lost wholly by the neglect of the defendant, Alexander Chalmers, causing the bar of the statute of limitations to attach, nor does the evidence show that it was so lost by his carelessness. It is true that the defendant had the firm books in his possession and out of the control of the plaintiff. Nevertheless the plaintiff did collect some of the accounts contained in those books, and having been the managing partner, and in charge of the business, was familiar with what kind and amount of debts were due the partnership, and could have demanded the payment of the Brown account, and brought an action therefor if payment was refused.

We fail to perceive from the record wherein the partnership was indebted to George Chalmers in the sum of $162.12, as found in the fifth finding of fact of the referee. George Chalmers had due him as salary from the 1st of September, 1884, to the 12th of February, 1885, at $150 per month, the sum of $810. Of this he drew $800. He collected accounts to the amount of $244.45, and took from the receipts of the business $206.83. How, upon this state of facts, the partnership owed him $162.12 we must confess our inability to understand. For these reasons we advise that the judgment and order be reversed.

We concur: Belcher, C. C.; Van Clief, C.

Per Curiam. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order appealed from are reversed.

We concur in the judgment, but do not wish to be understood as agreeing to the proposition that a party can allege a partnership consisting of three persons, and recover upon proof of a partnership consisting of two of such persons, even under the circumstances of this case. Works, J.; Fox, J.

Paterson, J., took no part in the decision of this cause.

People v. Buelna. (No. 20,544.)

Larceny—Instructions.

1. On a trial of an indictment for larceny, defined generally in Pen. Code Cal. § 484, a charge in the language of section 485, that one who finds lost property under circumstances which give him knowledge of or means of inquiry as to the true owner, and who appropriates such property to his own use, without first making reasonable and just efforts to restore the property, is guilty of larceny, is proper where there is some evidence of the facts stated, as the two sections do not define distinct offenses.

2. Where there is evidence that the property alleged to have been stolen was the property of M., and was bought by him from certain persons, and also that M's. interest was merely that of an agister, and that the property was found by defendant as lost property, and appropriated by him in bad faith, a charge that, if there was a reasonable doubt whether M. had bought the property of those persons, defendant should be acquitted, is properly refused.

3. In view of such evidence, a charge that "if A. takes cattle from B. to pasture, and any cattle are stolen from the possession of A., it is larceny, and the property may be alleged to be the property of A.," is correct and not misleading.

4. Instructions that, if the property belonged to a partnership composed of M. and certain others, or if it belonged to others, and M. had an interest in the increase, defendant must be aquitted, are properly refused where there is no evidence of any partnership between M. and the others, and no evidence that there was any increase of the property.

5. An instruction that, if defendant gave "an honest account of how he came by" the stolen property, it is incumbent on the people, unless such account was unreasonable or improbable on its face, to show that it was false, is properly refused, as an "honest account" is necessarily a true account.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Luis Obispo county; V. A. GREGG. Judge.

Graves, Turner & Graves, for appellant. G. A. Johnson, Atty. Gen., for the People.

PER CURIAM. The defendant in this case was accused by information of grand larceny. He was convicted as charged. From the judgment rendered upon the verdict of the jury, and an order denying a new trial, he appeals. He contends that an instruction of the court in reference to the appropriation of lost property by the finder thereof is erroneous. The language complained of is as follows: "One who finds lost property under circumstances which give him knowledge or means of inquiry as to the true owner, and who appropriates such property to his own use, or to the use of another person not entitled thereto, without making reasonable and just efforts to find the owner, and restore the property to him, is guilty of larceny." It is not denied that the instruction is correct as an abstract proposition of law, but it is insisted that it was improper, under the charge contained in the information. The defendant argues that the acts defined in section 485 of the Penal Code constitute a different kind of larceny from that set out in the provisions of section 484 of the same Code. The two sections read thus: Sec. 484. "Larceny is the felonious stealing, taking, carrying, leading, or driving away the personal property of another." Sec. 485. "One who finds lost property under circumstances which give him knowledge of, or means of inquiry as to, the true owner, and who appropriates such property to his own use, or to the use of another person not entitled thereto, without first making reasonable and just efforts to find the owner and restore the property to him, is guilty of larceny."

It will be seen at a glance that it was not the legislative intent to create, by the enactment, of these provisions of law, any two distinct kinds of larceny such as the defendant insists upon. The first section defines larceny generally; the second section declares a rule of evidence, which, being fulfilled, constitutes the crime as defined in the first section. It is plain that the charge was correct under the information, and there was evidence in the case, proceeding from the defendant and his witnesses, which tended, in some degree at least, to show that the defendant did find and appropriate a stray steer, not then in the actual possession of Mosher, in whom the title was laid in the information, and that such appropriation was made without first making reasonable and just efforts to find the owner and restore the property to him. The instruction of the court was intended to meet this view of the case as presented by the defendant himself, in the attempted justification of his act of appropriation. On the other hand, the proof first adduced by the prosecution went to show that Mosher owned the steer; had bought it of Meade and Goldtree Bros. Then, upon further investigation, there was evidence tending to show that Mosher only had a special interest in it as an agister for the Vachel Bros. Thus there was evidence upon which the jury were to pass involving several propositions: First, whether the property was Mosher's absolutely, or that in which he had a special interest; second, whether the property was stolen from his possession either as the owner or agister; third, whether it was taken from Mosher's actual possession, or was, as claimed by the defendant, found by him as lost property, and taken up in good faith, to be accounted for to the true owner, or taken up and appropriated as lost property in bad faith, and with an intention to deprive the owner of it. Under this state of the evidence it was the duty of the court to instruct the jury as to the law bearing upon each class of facts as presented in the evidence, leaving it to the jury to determine which was the true state of facts. If Mosher owned the property, and it was stolen from his possession, the defendant would be guilty if he took or drove it away; but if Mosher did not own it by purchase from Goldtree Bros. and Meade, yet if he had a special interest in it, as agister or otherwise, it would not prevent the jury from finding the defendant guilty of larceny if the other facts warranted; so that the instruction to the jury asked by the defendant, and refused by the court, that "it is contended by the people that the steer mentioned in the information was purchased by I. E. Mosher from Goldtree Brothers and Meade, and, if you find from the evidence that there is a reasonable doubt that the said Goldtree Brothers and Meade sold said steer to I. E. Mosher, you will give the defendant the benefit of the doubt, and find the defendant not guilty," was wrong and properly refused. It took away from the jury all consideration of the other inculpatory facts in evidence, as affecting the question whether the defendant stole the property from Mosher as an agister, or found and appropriated it as lost from Mosher's possession as said agister, and without effort to return it to him. This instruction was given also: "If A. takes cattle from B. to pasture, and any cattle are stolen from the possession of A., it is larceny, and the property may be alleged to be the property of A." In view of the facts in evidence upon the question of Mosher's agistment of the stolen property, and the other instructions in the case, it is plain that this instruction was to the effect, and could only be understood as saying to the jury, that if Mosher took cattle from the Vachel Bros. or any other person to pasture, and any of such cattle were stolen from Mosher, it would be larceny, and the property may be alleged in the information to be the property of Mosher; and therefore the instruction was not misleading or wrong as a proposition of law. Taking the instruction by itself, and without considering all the evidence and the other instructions, it might be subject to the nice criticism put upon it by the ingenious counsel for the defense; but to a fair-minded person, in view of all the facts, circumstances, and other instructions, we cannot see that the defendant could have suffered any prejudicial error through the instruction as given. There was some evidence in the case that Mosher had a special interest in the property, and had it in possession as agister upon a special contingent contract with the owner. This being so, it was for the jury to say whether this special interest and possession existed; and that being so, there was no necessity for an allegation in the information of any joint ownership by Vachel Bros. and Mosher, naming each one.

The further claim is made by the appellant that certain other instructions requested to be given were erroneously refused by the court They are as follows: "(d) If you find from the evidence that the steer described in the information belonged, at the time of the alleged taking, to a partnership composed of A. H. Vachel, Arthur Vachel, and I. E. Mosher, you must find the defendant not guilty. (e) If you believe from the evidence that the steer described in the information belonged, at the time of the alleged taking, to H. A. Vachel and Arthur Vachel, and I. E. Mosher has a half interest in the increase of the value of said steer, you must find the defendant not guilty." The evidence did not disclose any partnership between Mosher and the Vachel Bros. He held the property as an agister in trust for them, and was to have a contingent interest in the increased value of the steer, if any accrued. There is no evidence that any such value did accrue. For this reason, not to speak of others which might be mentioned, the instructions were properly refused.

The court refused instruction marked "b," reading thus: "It is also contended by the people that the steer described in the information was sold to Byer Brothers to Goldtree Brothers and Meade, and if you have any reasonable doubt as to whether Byer Brothers did sell said steer to Goldtree Brothers and Meade you must give the defendant the benefit of that doubt, and find the defendant not guilty." If this instruction, as it appears in the bill of exceptions, is exactly as asked, it is plain that it is unintelligible. If it is meant to use the word "by" instead of "to" just before the words "Byer Brothers" where they first occur, then if granted the jury would have been confined to only one theory of the case, and would have been compelled to disregard all other facts in evidence bearing upon the defendant's possible guilt, and the instruction was properly refused.

The refusal of instruction marked "c" in the bill of exceptions, as asked for by the defendant, is claimed to be prejudicial to his rights. The instruction is: "If you find from the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, that on or about the time mentioned in the information the defendant was in possession of the steer described therein, and that the defendant gave an honest account of how he came by it, or under what authority he took said steer, it is incumbent on the people, unless the account given of the possession by the defendant was unreasonable or improbable on its face, to show that the account of said possession is false." The counsel for defendant probably intended to ask for an instruction to the effect that if his story showed that he was in possession of the property innocently, and his story was reasonable, etc., then the jury could not convict unless the prosecution showed that story to be false; that is, we suppose, directly disapproved it. Even that doctrine would be doubtful. But that was not what defendant asked. When an appellant seeks to reverse a judgment for a refusal to give a certain instruction, he must successfully maintain that the instruction asked clearly stated a correct principle. Here the proposed instruction was that if defendant "gave an honest account of how he came by" the property, it was incumbent upon the people to show that the account was false. Now, the only notion we can have of an honest account is a true account. If, therefore, according to this proposed instruction, a defendant in a larceny case should give an "honest account" of how he got the stolen property, and that account should be that he stole it, it would be incumbent on the people to show that the "account" was false,—that is, that he did not steal it; a proposition which, it may be safely said, is not law.

We see no error in the record. Judgment and order affirmed.

PATERSON, J. I dissent, because in my opinion the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict and judgment.

PENNIE v. HILDRETH et al. (No. 13,127.)

QUIETING TITLE—PARTIES—PLEADING.

1. Under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 738, providing that "an action may be brought by any person against another, who claims an estate or interest in real property adverse to him, for the purpose of determining such adverse claim," an administrator may maintain an action to quiet title to real property of his decedent.

2. There is no misjoinder of causes of action in a complaint to quiet title to several tracts of land not contiguous, where the adverse claimants are the same.

3. Where separate counts are not necessary, the fact that, where there are several, all of them except the first refer to certain paragraphs of that as true, without alleging the facts therein contained, is not reversible error.

4. In an action to quiet title by an administrator, a general denial puts in issue plaintiff's ownership of the land, and the fact that he is administrator, and is not demurrable on the ground that it does not set up defendant's claim or disclaim.

5. An answer alleging that plaintiff's only interest in the property is by virtue of a mortgage, is not demurrable on the ground that it does not show an offer to redeem or a tender of the amount due.

6. But an answer, alleging that defendant claims under an agreement with plaintiff's mortgagor, whereby defendant is to receive a conveyance of an undivided half of the land on payment of the purchase price, and that an action is pending between defendant and the mortgagor's personal representative, to which plaintiff is a party, to settle partnership accounts and sell the land without alleging payment of the price, or any excuse for failure to pay it, or that, on settlement of the accounts, defendant will be entitled to any interest in the land, is demurrable.

7. An allegation in the answer of another action pending between the parties is immaterial.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; J. B. CAMPBELL, Judge.

Milton E. Babb and Henry E. Highton, for appellant. L. D. McKisick, Wilson & Wilson, Joseph Naphtaly, and P. D. Wigginton, (Walker C. Graves, of consel), for respondent.

WORKS, J. The respondent, as administrator with the will annexed of the estate of Charles McLaughlin, brought this action to quiet the title to several tracts of land. Each tract of the land in controversy is made the subject of a separate count of the complaint. Each of the counts, after the first, refers to the first count, and alleges that certain paragraphs therein, which are necessary to the sufficiency of each count, are true, instead of restating such facts. The complaint was unverified. There was a demurrer to the complaint on several grounds; among others, that the same did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and that the several causes of action were improperly joined. The demurrer was overruled. The defendant Harper, who alone appeals, answered by a general denial, and by way of affirmative defense set up that he and the deceased Hildreth entered into a contract of copartnership for the purpose of "buying and selling cattle, and of buying and selling cattle ranches." This contract is set out as a part of the answer, and contains this clause: "The purchase of lands shall be confined to the lands in Fresno county known as the 'Hildreth and Jones Ranches' and the lands adjacent thereto, of which said lands said copartners have already purchased the E. J. Hildreth rancho, which now stands in the name of Thomas Hildreth, and have contracted to purchase the said Jones rancho; and it is covenanted that one undivided half of said lands now standing in the name of Thomas Hildreth shall, upon the payment to him of one-half of the cost price and expenses for the purchase thereof, be conveyed by him to said Harper, on request, by good and sufficient deeds thereof, the said cost price to include interest at the rate of 1 per cent. per month." The Hildreth ranch, named in the contract, is the lands in controversy in this action. It is further alleged that the plaintiff's decedent had, at the time of his death, no other or different title or interest in the real estate than such as he obtained by virtue of certain deeds of conveyance from said Hildreth, absolute in form, but which were in fact mortgages to secure the payment of a certain sum of money. It was also averred that an action was pending between said defendant and the defendant Hildreth's executrix, for the settlement of said partnership affairs, to which the plaintiff was a party. The plaintiff demurred generally to the first count of the answer, which, as we have said, was a general denial, and also demurred thereto on the special ground that it did not "state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action in this: that it does not allege or set forth any title or claim in or on behalf of said defendant to the real estate described in the complaint, or any part thereof, nor does the said defendant in his said first defense, as set forth in said amended answer, disclaim any interest or estate in the property described in the complaint." There was also a demurrer to the affirmative answer, on the ground that it did not state facts sufficient, and on the ground of ambiguity in several particulars specifically stated. There was also a general demurrer to the whole answer. The demurrer to the answer was sustained, and, the defendant declining to answer over, judgment was entered against him, and he appeals.

The first point made by the appellant is that an action to quiet title to real estate cannot be maintained by an administrator, for the reason that he has no title to the property, conceding title in the decedent at the time of his death. If it be conceded that, in order to maintain an action of this kind, the party bringing the action must have title in the property, the argument would have much force. But we do not understand this to be so. The Code provides: "An action may be brought by any person against another, who claims an estate or interest in real property adverse to him, for the purpose of determining such adverse claim." Code Civil Proc. § 738. The letter of this section would authorize any person to maintain the action whether he himself had any interest in the property or not. We are not, however, inclined to give it this broad construction. But it is clearly not necessary that he have title to the property. If he has the right to possession, and another is claiming an estate or interest adverse to such right, he may maintain the action. The language of the Code is broad enough to cover every interest or estate in lands of which the law takes cognizance. Pierce v. Felter, 53 Cal. 18; Stoddart v. Burge, Id. 398; Smith v. Brannan, 13 Cal. 107; Liebrand v. Otto, 56 Cal. 247. An administrator has an interest in the decedent's real estate, within the meaning of this statute, and if another is asserting a claim adversely to such interest, he may maintain the action. Code Civil Proc. § 1452; Curtis v. Sutter, 15 Cal. 259, 264.

It is further contended that there was a misjoinder of causes of action, in that the plaintiff sought in the same complaint to quiet the title to several tracts of land not contiguous to each other. There is no force in this contention. There is no reason, where the adverse claimants are the same as to each, why the rights of the parties in several tracts of land should not be adjudicated in the same action. Indeed we think the adverse parties would have had a much better cause of complaint if separate actions had been brought on account of each tract. The fault of the complaint is that it is made unnecessarily long by pleading for each of the tracts of land in separate counts. They should have been all included in one count. But this fault did not affect the substantial rights of the appellant, except as to the additional cost caused thereby, which the plaintiff should be required to pay.

It is also claimed that all of the counts of the complaint, except the first, are bad, for the reason that instead of alleging the necessary facts they aver that certain paragraphs of the first count are true. This is a slovenly mode of pleading, only convenient to the attorney who writes the pleading, and very inconvenient to opposing counsel and the courts, and should not be tolerated. Each count of a pleading must state a cause of action, and be complete within itself, without reference to any other count, but, as we have said, in this case separate counts were not necessary, and for that reason the cause should not be reversed on this ground.

The appellant insists that the court below erred in sustaining the demurrer to his answer, and rendering judgment against him. This depends upon whether an answer of general denial to an unverified complaint puts in issue any material fact in an action to quiet title. Counsel for respondent contend, with seeming confidence, that such an answer presents no issue to be tried. This is based upon the theory that in this class of cases the only course for a defendant to take is to set up affirmatively his adverse claim to the land or disclaim. They cite in support of this position Tompkins v. Sprout, 55 Cal. 36; People v. Center, 66 Cal. 551, 5 Pac. Rep. 263, and 6 Pac. Rep. 481. These cases do not support the position taken by the respondent. They simply hold that, in order to maintain his defense on the ground of an adverse claim, a defendant must set up such claim, and that the owner in possession may require the nature and character of the adverse estate or interest to be produced, exposed, and judicially determined. But the basis of his right to require the adverse interest to be produced and adjudicated is his own interest in or ownership of the land. This is the one thing necessary for him to prove in order to make out his case. If it is denied, a material issue is raised, which casts upon him the burden of proving such interest or ownership. Until he does this the defendant is not called upon to produce or prove his claim. Therefore the general denial put in issue a fact necessary to the plaintiff's recovery, and the demurrer to it was improperly sustained. City of San Diego v. Allison, 46 Cal. 167; Elder v. Spinks, 53 Cal. 294; Flint v. Dulany, 37 Kan. 335, 15 Pac. Rep. 208. In this case the denial put in issue another material allegation of the complaint. The action being by an administrator, it was necessary for him to allege and prove that he was such administrator, and, it having been denied, he was not entitled to judgment without such proof. It has been held by this court that a denial casts upon the plaintiff the burden of proving that the defendant's adverse claim is unfounded. Elder v. Spinks, 53 Cal. 294; Tompkins v. Sprout, 55 Cal. 35. The correctness of the rule that a plaintiff must prove, under a general denial, either that the defendant claims an interest in the land, or that his claim is unfounded, may be a matter of question, but there is no question in our minds that such an answer renders it absolutely necessary for him to prove his own title or interest in the land, and that, without such proof, he is not entitled to judgment.

The question as to the sufficiency of the special answer of the defendant presents a more difficult question. The respondent attacks it on the ground that the same set up that the only interest in the property was by way of a mortgage in the form of a deed, and that there was no offer to redeem shown or tender of the money due; and that such offer to redeem or tender was necessary to entitle him to relief in equity or deprive the plaintiff of his right to possession under the deed. This might be so if this were an attempt to defeat the mortgage, but it is not. On the contrary, the defendant asserts that the plaintiff has a valid mortgage, and that it is unpaid, and alleges a claim to the property in himself, by way of a contract to convey the same to him by the plaintiff's mortgagor. The position taken by counsel shows, it seems to us, an entire misapprehension of the object and effect of an action of this kind. It is not necessary to the right of a defendant to recover in this kind of action that he should show that the plaintiff has no title or interest in the property. If the plaintiff claims a fee-simple, he may show that he has nothing more than a lien or any interest less than he claims, and that he, the defendant, has an interest also, either paramount or subordinate to that of the plaintiff, and the decree of the court should declare the rights of the parties in the property accordingly. If the defendant had an equitable title to one-half of the property in controversy, whether that interest was subject to the mortgage of the plaintiff or paramount to it, he had a right to have it so decreed and the interest of the plaintiff declared; and a judgment against him on the demurrer that he had no right, title, or interest in the property would have been erroneous if the answer had been sufficient in other respects.

But the answer is not sufficient in other respects. It fails to show any equitable title in the defendant. The agreement under which he claims provided that he was to have an undivided half of the Hildreth rancho deeded to him upon payment to Hildreth of one-half of the cost price and expenses for the purchase thereof, the said cost price to include interest at the rate of 1 per cent. per month. There was no allegation that the defendant had paid this purchase money, or any part of it, nor was any excuse shown by the answer for not having done so. There was an allegation that an action was pending between the defendant and the administrator of the said Hildreth to dissolve the copartnership and settle its accounts, and to have this property sold, and the proceeds thereof first applied to the payment of plaintiff's claim, and that plaintiff was a party to that suit; but there is no allegation that upon a settlement of the accounts the defendant would be entitled to any interest in the land, or that there would be anything due him that should have been applied to the payment of the amount agreed to be paid by him for the one-half interest therein, whereby he was equitably entitled to an interest in the land. For this reason this count of the answer was bad, and the demurrer to it was properly sustained.

Counsel for respondent has contended that the deed under which plaintiff claimed was a deed of trust and not a mortgage. As the case may have to be tried on going down, we may say that we regard it as a matter of no consequence as to the sufficiency of the answer whether it was a mortgage or a deed of trust requiring that the land be applied to the payment of the amount due the plaintiff. The defendant would in either case have the right to a judgment declaring just what interests in the property were held by each of the parties. The allegation of another action pending between the parties was immaterial, and added nothing to the answer. Such an action pending could not bar the right of the plaintiff to have his title or interest in the property, whatever it might be, determined in this action. Judgment reversed, and cause remanded, with instructions to the court below to allow the plaintiff and defendant Harper to amend their pleadings, if they so desire.

We concur PATERSON, J.; SHARPSTEIN J.; FOX, J.

I concur in the judgment: BEATTY, C. J.

MCFARLAND, J., (concurring.) I concur in the judgment and in the opinion of the court, except that part of it which states that "each count of a pleading must state a cause of action, and be complete within itself, without reference to any other count." There are cases where several counts are proper and necessary, and where numerous averments of the same facts are necessary to the completeness of each count. In such cases, where the averments of such facts in the first count are referred to in the succeeding counts in a clear and methodical manner, and incorporated by such reference, I see no necessity of rewriting them several times, and thus making the complaint unnecessarily cumbersome. It should be done, of course, clearly, and without uncertainty in the reference; but I do not think that the rule should be laid down that it cannot be done at all.

FALKNER (STEEN Substituted) v. HENDY.

INTEREST—COMPUTATION.

Plaintiff and defendant entered into an agreement by which plaintiff examined and purchased second-hand machinery, defendant furnishing all funds, and, after repairs were made, both parties used their efforts to sell it, after which defendant was reimbursed for all advances, and the profits evenly divided. Plaintiff, being advised that the contract was a partnership, gave notice of dissolution. He was then indebted to defendant. Defendant continued to make sales and collections, and, when plaintiff sued for an accounting, was indebted to plaintiff. After the action was brought several years elapsed before a receiver was appointed, and defendant still continued the sales and collections. While the contract was in force the parties agreed that interest at 1¼ per cent. per month should be charged on all balances. Defendant used the money collected in his business, but there was no finding as to his profits. Held, that the agreement as to interest ended when the business contract ended, and that defendant should be charged with the profits of the fund held in trust by him for plaintiff, or with interest computed as follows: Interest should be allowed on the amount due the defendant from the time of notice of dissolution to the commencement of the suit at the legal rate, and also on the sums collected by defendant during that time, and a balance struck, and on such balance, beginning at that date, it should be compounded annually at the legal rates; also interest on the sums collected by defendant from time to time, at like rates, to the next annual rest,—the amount of these sums forming a new principal; and this rate should be allowed to the time of the first decree in the action, and only simple interest thereafter.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco. H. H. Hart and E. W. McKinstry, for appellant. C. E. K. Royce, (Ralph Harrison, of counsel,) for respondent.

BEATTY, C. J. This action was commenced in March, 1876, by Falkner, as assignee of Steen. In the course of the litigation the cause of action was assigned to Steen, who was thereupon substituted as plaintiff. The complaint alleges the formation of a partnership between Steen and Hendy in 1873, under an agreement, the terms of which are fully set out; the carrying on of business in pursuance of the agreement until May, 1875; the dissolution of the copartnership at that date by plaintiff; retention of all the partnership assets by the defendant, and refusal to account. The prayer is that the partnership be adjudged to be dissolved, for an accounting, receiver, injunction, sale of partnership property, division of the surplus, costs, and general relief. By his answer defendant denies that there had ever been any partnership, but admits an agreement, setting forth its terms, which differ in some particulars from those alleged in the complaint, admits that business was carried on in pursuance of the contract till May, 1875, and admits that plaintiff will be entitled to a share of the proceeds of property in defendant's hands after deduction of the amount of certain notes and other obligations pleaded by way of counterclaim. Upon these issues the cause was tried, and very voluminous findings made by the superior court, upon which judgment was entered for the plaintiff in August, 1885, in the sum of $35,254.24. Defendant moved for a new trial, which was denied, and he prosecutes this appeal from the judgment and order.

A very general statement of the contract relations of the parties, and the circumstances out of which they arose, will be sufficient for the purposes of this opinion. The defendant, in 1872, was, and for some years prior thereto had been, the proprietor of a foundry and machine-shop in the city of San Francisco. He was possessed of means and credit. Plaintiff was an expert machinist, but had no means or credit. His business was partly mining, and partly the buying up of second-hand machinery, which he repaired—sometimes at defendant's shop—and sold as occasion offered. Transactions of this kind seem to have brought him and defendant together. In 1872 defendant, at plaintiff's request, advanced the money to purchase two or three large lots of machinery, under an agreement such as is described in findings 4 and 5 of the superior court: "That about the 1st day of August, 1872, plaintiff ascertained that there was a certain lot of machinery near Santa Barbara, in this state, and the terms and conditions upon which it could be purchased, which, in his judgment, were such that it could be purchased, repaired, and sold at a large profit, and so informed the defendant. That plaintiff and defendant then orally agreed that plaintiff should proceed to Santa Barbara, examine the machinery, and, if satisfied of its value, telegraph that fact to the defendant in this city, where the owner resided. That upon the receipt of such telegram defendant should close the bargain for the purchase thereof; advance the money required therefor, as well as the money required to pay freight thereon from Santa Barbara to the city of San Francisco; take a bill of sale thereof in his own name; receive possession of the machinery when it reached this city, and retain said possession until such property should be sold; make all necessary repairs thereon at his machine-shop; charge the usual shop rates therefor; deliver the property when sold to the purchaser or purchasers thereof; receive the proceeds of any such sale; deduct therefrom, and retain for his own use, the amount due him for such repairs on said machinery; also all moneys advanced by him on account of said machinery, either for the purchase price thereof, freight thereon, or for other purpose, with interest thereon from the date of such advances until the receipt of the proceeds of such sale at the rate of 1¼ per cent. per month, and the residue of the proceeds of such sale to be equally divided between plaintiff and defendant. That plaintiff should superintend the shipping of such machinery, if purchased, from Santa Barbara to this city, both parties to use their best exertions in making sales of such machinery. That the machinery was so purchased in accordance with such agreement, and an account thereof was entered in defendants' individual books of account as 'Matanza machinery.' That on this account the machinery was charged with all expenditures made by defendant on its account, including the amount due defendant for repairs thereon, and credited with all moneys received by defendant from the sale thereof. That the expenses of plaintiff in going to and returning from Santa Barbara were charged against such machinery in this account, and credited to plaintiff upon a personal account previously existing between plaintiff and defendant." This was followed by other similar transactions, and on March 15, 1873, the agreement was made which gave rise to this litigation. This agreement, the manner in which business was conducted under it, and the accounts kept, are set forth in findings 7, 8, 9, of the superior court, as follows: "That on March 15, 1873, the Matanza machinery having been previously brought to defendant's shop, and a portion thereof repaired and sold, plaintiff and defendant entered into a further oral agreement, in which plaintiff stipulated to, and did, cease from dealing in second-hand machinery on his individual account. That thereafter all second-hand machinery purchased, repaired, or sold by either plaintiff or defendant, and all dealings had therein by either plaintiff or defendant, should be for and on their joint account, and any such machinery should be so purchased, repaired, or sold by either plaintiff or defendant, and all dealings had therein by either of them should be on their joint account, and any such machinery should be so purchased, repaired, and sold upon the same terms and conditions as those in relation to the Matanza machinery, and such terms and conditions were to be applied to all machinery then on hand, and all machinery which might be purchased, repaired, or sold by either plaintiff or defendant subsequent to that date. That there was not any mention made in this agreement in regard to any losses which might be sustained on any of the property so purchased, or as to any charges or expenses which might be incurred in relation thereto for storage or rent of any premises required or used therefor, nor was there any mention made as to the method or manner in which the accounts between plaintiff and defendant, in relation thereto, should be kept, or the time during which such agreement should remain in force. That thereafter plaintiff and defendant purchased, repaired, and sold second-hand machinery, under and by virtue of such agreement, until on or about the 2d day of June, 1875. That their manner of transacting the business was substantially as follows: It was conducted in the name of the defendant. The accounts relating to the business were kept by defendant in the same manner and in the same books in which he kept the accounts of his private business transactions, all of which was with the knowledge and consent of plaintiff. That plaintiff occasionally entered the details of orders received in relation to these transactions in the order-book of defendant. That defendant received and disbursed substantially all moneys coming from or connected with the joint transactions of plaintiff and defendant. That the machinery was usually purchased in large quantities, a name given to each particular lot thereof so purchased, and an account, to which plaintiff had access, opened therewith, under the name so given it. Subsequently, however, this was found impracticable, and an account was opened called the 'Merchandise Account,' in which all future transactions of plaintiff and defendant in relation to second-hand machinery were entered, and gradually all accounts in relation thereto were merged." Neither plaintiff nor defendant understood that they were partners, and neither claimed, to the other or to third persons, that they were partners, until plaintiff consulted a lawyer about the time he gave notice of a dissolution. Everything was conducted in Hendy's name, and on his premises. He was exclusively the ostensible owner of all the property involved in the business, and at least believed in good faith that Steen had no interest therein, but only a right to his share of the profits when the property was sold and the profit ascertained.

Hendy kept all the accounts of the business in his own private books, to the knowledge of, and apparently without objection from, Steen. While matters were proceeding in this way Steen found that Hendy had purchased at a discount some of his obligations to third parties, and charged them at their face in his personal account. He took offense at this, consulted an attorney, was advised that he and Hendy were partners, and in May, 1875, gave notice of a dissolution. At this date he was considerably indebted to Hendy, as found by the court. An inventory of the stock in which he claimed a partnership interest was taken, and efforts made to effect a settlement. These failed by reason of the fact that each made claims against the other which he would not admit, and which were not allowed afterwards by the court. Meantime Hendy continued in possession of the property, as by the terms of the agreement (whether partnership or not) he was entitled to do, and continued to make sales and collections, so that at the date of the commencement of the action, March, 1876, as finally determined after a long and tedious trial, he was indebted to the plaintiff. The state of the account at these different dates is exhibited by findings 26 and 42, which are as follows: "That the court, in this accounting, first adjusted all accounts between plaintiff and defendant up to the 2d day of June, 1875, on which last-mentioned day the accounts as adjusted were as follows: 'First. The plaintiff was indebted to the defendant on the personal account in the sum of $3,739.08. Second. The defendant had received on account of sales of property belonging to plaintiff and defendant, in excess of all his outlays and expenditures thereon, the sum of $1,483.51. Third. That there were not any debts owing from plaintiff and defendant to other parties on account of their joint transactions. Fourth. That machinery had been sold by defendant to the value of $10,368.31, for which he held accounts and bills receivable, but upon which the money had not been collected. Fifth. That defendant then had in his possession a large amount of second-hand machinery, the property of plaintiff and defendant, inventory of which was made and a copy retained by each.' [Finding 26.] That at the commencement of this action the accounts between the plaintiff and defendant, as subsequently ascertained by this court, were as follows: 'First. The plaintiff was not indebted to defendant in any sum or amount whatever, either upon their joint account or his personal account. Second. The defendant had in his possession the sum of $3,799.60, money collected by him from the sale of the property of plaintiff and defendant, over and above all expenditures made by him, and all advances, with interest thereon, and over and above all sums and amounts which the defendant was entitled to deduct therefrom under the aforesaid agreement between plaintiff and defendant.' That the plaintiff was then entitled to have and receive one-half of the sum of $3,799 60, and the defendant entitled to retain the residue for his own use and benefit. [Finding 42.]"

After the commencement of the action several years elapsed before a receiver was appointed to sell and divide what remained of the partnership (to so call it) stock, and meantime Hendy continued to sell and dispose of it from time to time, and collect the proceeds, all of which he has kept, mingled with his private funds, and used in his business. He furnished statements of account to Steen from time to time, but the court finds they were not true statements, and, although he had in his hands at all times after the commencement of the action considerable, even large, sums to which Steen was justly entitled, he never tendered or offered to pay him any amount whatever. A part of the time he was under process of garnishment in a suit by one of Steen's creditors, but it does not appear that he admitted any indebtedness, or offered to pay any sum into court, or that he would have paid anything to Steen if there had been no garnishment. Very likely, if he had paid Steen what was due him, there would have been no garnishment; and certain it is that he had the use of the money while Steen and his creditor were deprived of its use.

The court finds, and its finding was not attacked, that the net amount realized by Hendy out of the partnership property, (we use this term for convenience merely, not deciding or assuming that it was partnership property,) after deducting everything he was entitled to charge against it, was something over $20,000, of which one-half belonged to Steen. The difference between this sum and the amount of the judgment is about $25,000, which is made up of interest, computed at the rate of 1¼ per cent. per month, compounded monthly on all balances down to the date of the judgment, August, 1885. The contention between the parties here is over this item of interest. We are clearly of the opinion that the judgment as to interest is erroneous, and that it must at least be materially reduced. As bearing on this element of the judgment, counsel for the respective parties have very elaborately argued the question whether or not the agreement found by the court constituted them partners. In our view of the case it makes no difference whether there was a partnership or not. Even conceding there was, the judgment as to interest cannot be upheld.

Counsel for respondent seeks to sustain it on two grounds: First. He says interest to be compounded at this rate was stipulated by the parties. Second. He claims that the defendant was plaintiff's trustee as to his share of the partnership funds; that he used these funds in business ventures, out of which he made large profits, and that plaintiff is entitled to the avails, which, not being exactly ascertainable, the court allowed according to this measure of computation, viz., interest at 1¼ per cent. per month, compounded monthly.

Neither of these positions is maintainable. First. There was no such stipulation. The only evidence tending to sustain the finding of the court to that effect is this: In 1874, while the agreement was in force, Hendy proposed to change it so that out of the profits he should get one-third on account of his capital, and another third for his services, leaving one-third only to Steen. Steen declined to accede to this proposition, and Hendy then proposed that they should "settle up." Thereupon Steen said he was willing that interest at bank rates, which were then 1¼ per cent., should be charged on all balances. Apparently this was agreed to, and the business proceeded as before. This stipulation, however, was merely an element of the partnership agreement, and, as made and intended, only applied during its existence to the monthly balances found due Hendy on account of advances of capital for carrying on the business. It ended when the partnership ended, and that was at the time plaintiff gave notice of its termination, in May, 1875, nearly a year before this action was commenced. This is alleged in the complaint, not denied in the answer, and is clearly proved by the evidence. The finding or assumption of the court that the partnership continued down to the entry of the decree in August, 1885, is in conflict with the pleadings, and wholly unwarranted. There was, therefore, no agreement by virtue of which this extraordinary rate of interest could be allowed. Nor could it be allowed in lieu of profits made by Hendy in the business ventures in which he used plaintiff's share of the funds. To charge Hendy as a trustee in this manner, a case must have been made against him either in the original, or by an amended or supplemental, complaint. Nothing of the sort was done, and the findings, which are supposed to sustain the decree on this ground, are wholly outside of any issues in the case. But in fact there is no finding that Hendy made profits equal to the interest allowed. It is only assumed that he might have done so. But, we repeat, if there had been such findings, they would have been outside the issues. We do not deem it necessary to decide the question, so much debated by counsel, whether the parties were partners. Whether they were or not, the amount due the plaintiff, except as to the matter of interest, was correctly computed, and the relation between the parties was to that extent confidential that it might have been the foundation of a voluntary trust, and the retention of the money gained by its violation constituted the defendant an involuntary trustee for plaintiff of his share of the profits of the business. He is therefore, though not a partner, accountable as a trustee; and we have recently held (Adams v. Lambard, ante, 180, opinion filed September 3, 1889) that compound interest at legal rates may be charged against such a trustee upon moneys fraudulently or wrongfully or oppressively withheld.

The judgment and order appealed from are, for the reasons stated, reversed, and the cause remanded, with leave to the plaintiff, if he be so advised, to file a supplemental and amended complaint charging the defendant with profits actually realized from the use of the trust fund, upon which the cause may be tried anew. Or, if the plaintiff elect not to file an amended or supplemental complaint, the superior court is directed, without a new trial, to state the account between the parties anew in the following manner: The amount found to have been due at the commencement of the action will be taken as a basis upon which interest is to be computed, beginning at that date, compounding annually at the legal rates. On the sums found to have been collected by defendant from time to time interest at like rates is to be computed to the next annual rest; the amount of these various sums forming a new principal, upon which interest is to be computed for another year. Interest shall be computed at this rate, and according to this method, down to the date of the former decree, August 15, 1885, after which time only simple interest shall be allowed; all of which is so ordered.

ON REHEARING.

(Oct. 30, 1889.)

In bank.

PER CURIAM. A rehearing in this case is denied, but the judgment is hereby modified so as to read as follows:

The judgment and order appealed from are, for the reasons stated in the opinion filed herein, reversed, and the cause remanded, with leave to the plaintiff, if he be so advised, to file a supplemental and amended complaint charging the defendant with profits actually realized from use of the trust fund, upon which the cause may be tried anew. Or, if the plaintiff elect not to file an amended or supplemental complaint, the superior court is directed, without a new trial, to state the account between the parties anew, in the following manner: Interest to be computed on the balance found due the defendant, June 2, 1875, at the legal rate, till the commencement of this action, March 11, 1876, and credited to defendant. Interest to be computed at the legal rate on the sums collected by defendant from time to time between June 2, 1875, till the commencement of this action, and charged against defendant. A balance then struck. The amount thus found to be due the plaintiff, at the commencement of this action, will be taken as a basis upon which interest is to be computed, beginning at that date, compounding annually at the legal rates. On the sums found to have been collected by defendant from time to time, interest at the like rate is to be computed to the next annual rest; the amount of these various sums forming a new principal, upon which interest is to be computed for another year. Interest shall be computed at this rate, and according to this method, down to the date of the former decree, August 15, 1885, after which time only simple interest shall be allowed.

ALBERTOLI v. BRANHAM. (No. 12,018.)

FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES—PLEADING.

An answer seeking to avoid a transfer to plaintiff, as in fraud of creditors, alleged that the purpose was to defraud, etc., but failed to state any facts showing fraud, except that the sale was not accompanied by immediate delivery, nor followed by actual or continued change of possession, and in this the finding was against the answer. It did not allege that no consideration passed, or that there was no other property of the debtor with which to satisfy his debts, and the only allegation tending to show knowledge on the part of plaintiff that the conveyance was to defraud creditors was that plaintiff knew that his grantor was insolvent. The finding was that the conveyance was made by both parties thereto to defraud creditors of the grantor, and that the sale involved all the property of the debtor. Held, that the answer and findings were insufficient to show a fraudulent conveyance.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Santa Clara county; E. SPENCER, Judge.

Action by Sebastian Albertoli against B. F. Branham, sheriff, to recover goods taken by defendant on attachment. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals.

John Reynolds and Hiram D. Tuttle, for appellant. T. H. Laine, for respondent.

WORKS, J. The only question presented by this appeal is whether the answer of the defendant and the findings of the court show that the conveyance of the property in controversy to the plaintiff was fraudulent as against the creditors of his grantor. The answer alleges: "Defendant further alleges, upon and according to his information and belief, that heretofore, to-wit, on the 4th day of July, 1885, Serefino Albertini, hereinbefore mentioned, was the owner and in possession of all the property sued for in this action, described in the complaint herein; and that he was then justly indebted to divers persons in large sums of money, and among them to Attilio Agustini, to whom he was indebted in the sum of $387.85, and to whom he is now justly indebted in a large amount, to-wit, in the sum of $955.94, the judgment hereinbefore mentioned and referred to; that the plaintiff herein, and the said Serefino Albertini, with a full knowledge of said indebtedness of said Albertini to said Attilio Agustini and others, thereafter, and on or about the 18th day of July, 1885, for the purpose of hindering, delaying, and defrauding the said Attilio Agustini and the other creditors of said Serefino Albertini, in the collection and recovery of their just debts and claims against the said Albertini, made a pretended sale and transfer of the whole of said personal property (seized as aforesaid) from said Albertini to the plaintiff herein; that at the time of said transfer said plaintiff knew that said Albertini was insolvent; and defendant avers that said transfer was made with the intent on the part of plaintiff and said Albertini to hinder, delay, and defraud the said creditors of said Albertini, including said Attilio Agustini; and he further avers that said Serefino Albertini, at the time of said pretended sale and transfer to the plaintiff herein, had the possession and control of all of said personal property seized by defendant as aforesaid; and he avers that said sale and transfer was not accompanied by an immediate delivery of said property, nor followed by an actual or continued change of possession thereof." The court found on this issue as follows: "That on said 18th day of July, 1885, said Serefino Albertini made a sale to the plaintiff of his said leasehold interest, and of his right and title to all said property sued for in this action, except said ninety-six cheeses herein, and then and there delivered said property so sold to the plaintiff herein, all of which was situated on said leased lands; that said sale was made with the intent to hinder, delay, and defraud the creditors of said Albertini, on the part of both of said parties thereto, and especially to hinder, delay, and defraud the said Attilio Agustini, and those who assigned their demands to him, as hereinbefore stated; that said sale involved and comprehended all the property of said Albertini, and left him without any visible property." It is contended by the appellant that the answer stated nothing more than the conclusion that the conveyance was made to hinder and defraud creditors, and not the facts constituting such fraud. It is well settled that in pleading fraud it is not sufficient to allege it in general terms, and that the facts constituting the fraud must be stated. Pehrson v. Hewitt, 21 Pac. Rep. 950; City of Oakland v. Carpentier, 21 Cal. 642; Castle v. Bader, 23 Cal. 76. The only fact alleged in the answer, sufficient to avoid the transfer, was that the sale "was not accompanied by an immediate delivery of said property, nor followed by an actual or continued change of possession thereof," and the findings do not support this allegation. Where a creditor attacks a transfer of property made by his debtor, on the ground that such transfer was made to defraud, hinder, or delay creditors, facts must be alleged showing that the conveyance was made in such manner, and under such circumstances, as to have that effect. Therefore it must appear that, at the time the conveyance was made, the debtor had not other property subject to execution out of which his debts could be satisfied. Evans v. Hamilton, 56 Ind. 34; Deutsch v. Korsmeier, 59 Ind. 373; Pfeifer v. Snyder, 72 Ind. 78. This allegation is necessary to show that the conveyance was in fact fraudulent as against the creditors. If the debtor has other property subject to execution, sufficient to satisfy his indebtedness, the conveyance cannot amount to a fraud on his creditors. And, where the attempt is made to set aside a conveyance on such grounds, it must appear from the complaint that, at the time the action is commenced, the debtor has not other property sufficient to satisfy his debts. Bruker v. Kelsey, 72 Ind. 51; Sherman v. Hogland, 73 Ind. 472. This is for the reason that the conveyance, although made for the purpose of defrauding creditors, is valid as between the parties, and cannot be set aside unless it appears to be necessary for the protection of the creditor, and no such necessity exists if, at the time he commences his action, there is other property of the debtor out of which his debt can be made. In this case it should have been alleged, for a like reason, that, at the time of the levy of the execution under which the defendant attempted to justify his possession of the property, there was not other property of the debtor subject to such execution sufficient to satisfy the debt for which the levy was made. In the answer before us no such allegations are to be found. The court found that the transfer left the debtor without visible property, but this was a finding outside of the issues. There is no direct allegation that at the time the conveyance was made, or at any time subsequent thereto, the debtor did not have other property sufficient to satisfy his debts, nor is it alleged that the conveyance was without consideration. If full consideration was paid for the property, the creditors were not defrauded, and, unless the grantee of the property had notice of the intended fraud of the debtor, he would be protected, having paid a valuable consideration. The only allegation of fact tending to show knowledge on the part of the plaintiff that the conveyance was for the purpose of defrauding creditors was that he knew, at the time, that his grantor was insolvent. This was not sufficient, as there is no reason why an insolvent debtor may not convey his property for full value, which may have been the case here. It was not sufficient to characterize the conveyance as pretended and fraudulent, (Pehrson v. Hewitt, 21 Pac. Rep. 950,) and this was all that was done, except for the allegation of non-delivery, which, as we have said, was found against the defendant. We have in this case, as in many others, found it difficult to separate the different counts of the pleadings, and desire to suggest to attorneys that, if the several counts of the pleadings were consecutively numbered in all cases, the practice would be much improved. The judgment and order are reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial, with instructions to the court below to allow the parties to amend their pleadings.

GORDON HARDWARE CO. v. SAN FRANCISCO & S. R. R. CO. (No. 12,030.) [1]

MECHANICS' LIENS.

1. A claim of lien, filed by a material-man, giving the names of several persons to whom different portions of the material were furnished at different times, without any designation as to what portion was furnished to each severally, does not sufficiently comply with Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1187, requiring the claim to state "the name of the person by whom he was employed, or to whom he furnished the materials."

2. A description of the materials furnished as "nails, spikes, iron, steel, picks, shovels, and other like material," is too indefinite and uncertain to sustain the lien.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Marin county; E. B. MAHON, Judge.

Hepburn Wilkins, for appellant. Lloyd & Wood and F. S. Lippitt, (O. P. Evans, of counsel,) for respondent.

FOX, J. This is an action by material-men to enforce a lien for material furnished to certain original contractors to be used under their contract "to construct the excavations, embankments, tunnels, box culverts, rubble walls, and such bridges as might be designated by the chief engineer of said railroad company on all that portion of the located line of railroad, then projected, of the San Francisco and San Rafael Railroad lying between the town of San Rafael and Point Tiburon in Marin county," with certain exceptions not necessary here to repeat. The case turns entirely upon the question of whether or not the court erred in sustaining defendant's objection to plaintiff's offer in evidence of "The Claim of Lien," which was filed in the county recorder's office of Marin county, on the 18th day of June, 1884, a copy of which is set forth in the record. When this claim of lien was offered in evidence the defendant objected thereto on several grounds, one of which was: "It does not appear to have been filed within thirty days after the completion of the work." This ground of objection seems to be good. The plaintiff does not claim to be other than a material-man, or a subcontractor for the furnishing of material, under an original contractor. He was, therefore, required by the statute, if he claimed a lien, to file the same within 30 days after the completion of the work. The claim was filed June 18, 1884. The evidence shows, and upon that point there does not seem to be any material conflict, that the last work done under the contract, or by the contractors, was on the 2d of June, 1884, and that for two weeks prior to that time they had not been working on the contract work, but had been engaged in removing debris which the contractor, without right, and in violation of instructions, had dumped on the land of a stranger, and for which he was liable in damages. The men were instructed to do this work on the 17th day of May, and the contract work was presumably finished at that time. Even if it was not, it appears clear from the evidence that it was finished, or that no more was done on it after the men commenced to remove this debris, which was two weeks prior to the 2d of June, and in either event this was more than 30 days before the filing of this claim of lien. However, the margin was so close that we should be unwilling on this ground alone to disturb the finding of the court below, whichever way it had ruled. Other grounds of objection were that the claim of lien did not state the demand, or the terms of the contract, upon and for which the lien is claimed. The claim shows upon its face that the original contractor for the work was one McDonald. With him the plaintiff contracted for the delivery of the material, as required. McDonald entered upon the performance of his contract in October, 1882, and prosecuted the same until February 6, 1883, plaintiff furnishing material as required. On the last-named date McDonald assigned to one Hawley. Plaintiff then contracted with Hawley, as before. He died before the work was completed, and it was subsequently carried on and completed by the legal representative of the estate of Hawley, to whom, the claim shows, plaintiff continued to deliver material as required, until the completion of the work. The statute expressly provides that the claim filed shall contain a statement of the demand, after deducting all just credits and offsets, with the name of the owner, or reputed owner, and "also the name of the person by whom he was employed, or to whom he furnished the materials." Code Civil Proc. § 1187. The lien can be maintained only by a substantial observance of the provisions of the statute. Wood v. Wrede, 46 Cal. 637; Hooper v. Flood, 54 Cal. 218; Goss v. Strelitz, Id. 640. The object of the statute is to advise the owner at whose instance, the material was furnished. Where, as in this case, material was furnished at divers times, and at the request of, or under subcontract with, different persons, it is not a substantial compliance with the statute for a material-man to file a claim for the gross sum of the balance claimed for all material furnished for that work, without any designation of the amount claimed on account of material furnished at the request of either or any one of the several persons at whose request it was furnished. For all the purposes of the statute, he might as well omit giving the name of any person for whom, or at whose instance, he had furnished the material. Such an omission would be fatal. Phelps v. Mining Co., 49 Cal. 339. We think it equally fatal to give the names of several persons to whom different portions of the material have been furnished at different times, without any designation as to what portion was furnished to each severally. As to the objection that the claim as filed does not state the terms of the contract upon or for which the lien is claimed, it is not necessary for us here to pass upon it. The claim does intelligibly state the terms of plantiff's contracts with the several original contractors, but it gives no information as to the terms of their contracts, except in the single particular of what they undertook to do. The statute is not free from ambiguity as to which of the contracts is referred to in that part of it which requires a statement of the terms of the contract; but, looking to the purpose of the requirement, it would seem to be the subcontract, for of this the owner may not be otherwise advised, while he is presumed to know the terms of the contract between himself and the original contractor.

[1] Reversed in banc. See 25 Pac. 125, 86 Cal. 620.

An objection was also taken on the ground that the description of the materials furnished was too indefinite and insufficient to sustain a lien. The only description of the materials was that they consisted of "nails, spikes, iron, steel, picks, shovels, and other like material." This is altogether too indefinite and uncertain to sustain a lien, and especially since it is conceded to be the law that a lien can only be maintained for the material which was actually used in the work contracted to be done. We understand that to mean, in a case like this, that which became by its use a part of the completed work. That, certainly, could not include tools of trade,—"picks, shovels, and other like material." And it would not necessarily include any one of the items mentioned in the claim. As well might a house be held under a lien for a chest of carpenter's tools sold to the man who had contracted to build it as a railroad for picks and shovels used by a contractor in grading it, or for nails, spikes, iron, steel, and other like material used by him for the purpose of erecting temporary habitations and sheds for the occupancy of his men and animals while engaged in the work. These objections being fatal to the claim of lien, as offered, we need not consider other objections which were urged. Our conclusion is that the court did not err in sustaining the objection to the introduction of this claim of lien. The foreclosure of the claim being the sole purpose of the action, there was no error in granting the nonsuit. Judgment and order affirmed.

Mechanics' Liens.

The fact that a claim of lien, filed by a material-man, included more than was due him, if the error was without fraud, will not defeat his right to recover.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Marin county; E. B. Mahon, Judge.

F. H. Boalt and H. A. Powell, for appellant. Lloyd & Wood and Hepburn Wilkins, for respondent.

Fox, J. This case is like that of Gordon Hardware Co. v. Same Defendant, ante, 406, (No. 12,030, just decided,) except that at the hearing, on the offer in evidence of the claim of lien, which was substantially like that in the other case, open to all the same objections, and objected to on the same grounds, the court overruled the objections, and admitted the claim in evidence; but afterwards, upon plaintiff's resting his case, the court, on motion of defendant, struck out the said claim from the evidence, to which plaintiff excepted, and thereupon the nonsuit followed, as before. This was only another way of reaching the same result, and for the same reasons. In his proofs in this case the plaintiff showed what part of the material furnished by him had not gone into and become a part of the actual structure, which would reduce his claim by some $6,000; and, if there had been no other ground of objection, the bare fact that he had filed his lien for too much, if it were shown that it was done without fraud, would not have defeated his right to recover. But this did not cure the defects in the claim of lien, to which attention is called in the opinion filed in said No. 12,030, and on the authority of that case the judgment and order appealed from in this case are affirmed.

O'Hanlon v. Denvir. (No. 12,489.)

Contracts—Pleading—Improvements on Public Land.

1. In an action on an agreement to pay plaintiff certain sums of money, an allegation in the complaint that defendant "has failed, neglected, and refused" to pay such sums, is a sufficient allegation of non-payment.

2. One who has made improvements on public lands may sell them, and they will constitute a good consideration for a promise to pay the price.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco. T. H. Rearden, Judge.

B. B. Newman and Wm. Rix, for appellant. William H. Fifield, for respondent.

Belcher, C. C. The only question presented by this case is whether the complaint stated a cause of action when tested by a general demurrer. The court below held that it did not, and gave judgment for defendant, from which the plaintiff has appealed. The facts stated in the complaint are in substance as follows: The plaintiff and defendant were "in the actual possession as joint owners and tenants in common of all the possessory rights and improvements upon" certain lands described by legal subdivisions according to the government surveys. The improvements consisted of "dwelling-houses, the clearing of a portion of the land of scrub-oaks and other wild shrubbery, constructing roads leading to and upon the land, planting grape-vines thereon, and other improvements, all of which were made by plaintiff and defendant as such joint owners and tenants in common." While the parties were such owners, and so in possession of the premises, they mutually agreed that plaintiff should, and he did, "relinquish, sell, and assign to defendant all his right, title, and interest in and to said possessory claims, possession, and improvements;" and, in consideration therefor, the defendant agreed to pay plaintiff, on demand, the several sums of money expended by him in making the improvements, etc.; and also the reasonable value of his work, labor, and services. It was agreed between the parties that the sums of money so expended amounted to $632, and the alleged value of the labor and services was $325; but "the defendant, although thereto often requested by plaintiff, has failed, neglected, and refused to pay" these sums of money, or any part thereof.

[1] Reversed in banc. See 25 Pac. 124, 86 Cal. 618.

It is argued for respondent that the demurrer was properly sustained, because the complaint contained no sufficient averment of non-payment, and in support of this position Scroufe v. Clay, 71 Cal. 123, 11 Pac. Rep. 882, is cited. That was an action on a promissory note, and the averment was that the defendant "has refused, and still refuses, to pay," etc. The complaint was demurred to on the ground that there was no allegation of non-payment, and the demurrer was overruled. It was held in this court that the demurrer should have been sustained; the court saying: "The averments of the complaint are not equivalent to an averment of non-payment. The failure to pay constitutes the breach, and must be alleged." We do not think that case at all in point for respondent. Here it is not only alleged that defendant had refused to pay, but that he had failed and neglected to do so. This was a direct allegation of "the failure to pay," and was clearly sufficient.

It is also urged that the lands described must be presumed to be public lands of the United States, because the complaint speaks of possessory rights upon them. And this being so, it is said that "the clearing of a portion of the land of scrub-oaks" was illegal, and the defendant's promise to pay for either the timber or the labor and money expended in doing this illegal act was void; citing Ladda v. Hawley, 57 Cal. 51, and Swanger v. Mayberry, 59 Cal. 91. We do not see that any necessary presumption arises that the lands were public lands. One may have "possessory rights" to land the title of which has passed from the government. But, conceding that the respondent is right in his assumption, still the cases cited only hold that one is not permitted to cut or sell the timber growing upon public land, but he may "occupy, settle upon, and use the land for the purpose of settlement, which would, of course, include the right of clearing away the timber for the purpose of cultivation or occupation." Now, "scrub-oaks" can hardly be said to be the "timber" which the government forbids any one to cut and sell from its lands. Some of the meanings of the word "scrub," as defined by Webster, are: "Something small and mean;" "close, low growth of bushes; low underwood;" "mean; dirty; contemptible; scrubby." It would seem, therefore, that when the plaintiff and defendant cleared a portion of the land of scrub-oaks and other wild shrubbery, they were preparing the land for the purpose of planting grape-vines thereon, or other cultivation, and were doing nothing more than they were authorized to do.

It is further claimed that an agreement to sell a "possessory right" to public lands prior to entry and payment, is void, and that by removing from the land described plaintiff relinquished to the government all his rights to it, including his improvements; that there was therefore no consideration for defendant's promise to pay. Counsel cite, in support of this position, Damrell v. Meyer, 40 Cal. 166, and Huston v. Walker, 47 Cal. 484. These cases decide that an agreement by a pre-emptioner upon public land, prior to entry and payment, to sell the land to, or divide it with, another, after he shall have obtained title, is void. The decisions are undoubtedly correct, but no such question arises here. The single question presented here is, can one who has made improvements on land, admitting it to be public land, sell his improvements to another? and does the sale constitute a good consideration for a promise to pay the agreed price? We know of no law, federal or state, forbidding such a sale, and of no decision by any court, upholding respondent's theory. We conclude, therefore, that the demurrer was improperly sustained, and we advise that the judgment be reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the court below to overrule the demurrer.

We concur: Gibson, C.; Van Clief, C.

Trial—Findings on Immaterial Issues—Impeachment of Witness.

1. In an action for money loaned, evidenced by due-bills, where the court finds that the bills were executed and delivered by defendants to plaintiff; that plaintiff is the person described therein as Mrs. A. B.; and that the money loaned was her separate property, acquired by gift from her husband, A. B.,—failure to find as to whether plaintiff was the wife of A. B. is not cause for reversal, though that fact is alleged in the complaint, and denied in the answer.

2. Where plaintiff testifies on cross-examination that she was married to A. B. at a certain time, evidence that she was at that time the wife of another man, and had testified in another case that she was married to that other before the time mentioned, is not inconsistent with her testimony, and is not admissible to impeach her.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

R. B. Mitchell and Mitchell & Ricketts, for appellants. J. F. Wendell and F. W. Van Reynegom, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. C. This action was brought to recover moneys alleged to have been loaned at different times by plaintiff to defendants, several of the loans being evidenced by due-bills made by defendants to Mrs. A. B. Evans. The complaint states that the plaintiff was at the time of the loans the wife of Allan B. Evans, and that the money was her separate property. The answer denies that plaintiff was the wife of Allan B. Evans, or that she loaned to defendants any of the money sued for, or that it was her separate property; and, by way of defense, alleges that defendants made a verbal agreement with Evans to sell him a half interest in their business, and that the moneys alleged to have been loaned were partial payments made by him on his purchase. Plaintiff had judgment, a motion for a new trial was denied, and defendants appeal.

It is urged on behalf of appellants that the court found only inferentially, and not directly, that plaintiff was the wife of Evans, and that therefore the judgment should be reversed. The complaint alleged that defendants executed and delivered to plaintiff each of the due-bills sued upon, "describing her therein by her married name of Mrs. A. B. Evans." The answer denied the delivery, but not the execution, of the papers. The court found that the due-bills were executed and delivered by defendants to plaintiff, and that she was the person described therein as "Mrs. A. B. Evans." The court further found that the moneys loaned were all the separate property of plaintiff, "acquired by her during coverture * * * by gift from her husband, Allan B. Evans." These findings were amply sustained by the evidence, and in view of them it was entirely immaterial whether plaintiff was in fact the wife of Evans or not. The moneys being plaintiff's separate property, she had a right to loan them to defendants, and to sue for and recover them; and it was a matter of no concern to them whether she was married or unmarried, or whether she was the lawful wife of Evans or some other man. The contention of appellants cannot, therefore, be sustained; the rule being that findings upon immaterial issues are unnecessary, and that judgments will never be reversed for the want of them.

It is next claimed that the court erred in sustaining objections to offered testimony. The plaintiff was called as a witness in her own behalf, and, on cross-examination, testified that she was married to Evans on the 27th of April, 1880. She was then asked, "Had you another husband at that time?" Counsel for plaintiff objected to the question as immaterial and not cross-examination, and the objection was sustained. Counsel for defendants then offered to prove that, at the time plaintiff claimed to have been married to Evans, she was the wife of one Frank Cunningham; that in a certain case she had testified that she was married to Cunningham in January, 1869; that Cunningham was alive, and that they had never been divorced. Counsel for plaintiff objected to the offered evidence on the same grounds as before, and the objection was sustained. Counsel for appellants say in their brief: "The object of the evidence sought to be elicited was to impeach the credibility of the witness. She had testified she was married to Evans in 1880, and we had the right to prove her statements at other times which would contradict those she made on the stand, or which were inconsistent therewith." But the offered evidence did not tend to contradict the statement of the witness that she was married to Evans in April, 1880. At most, it tended only to prove that she had another husband at the time, and was therefore guilty of bigamy. This, if true, was a wrongful act, but it was irrelevant, and not collateral to any material issue before the court. And it is a well-settled rule that a witness cannot be impeached by evidence of particular wrongful acts. Code Civil Proc. § 2051; Hinkle v. Railroad Co., 55 Cal. 627; People v. Hamblin, 68 Cal. 101, 8 Pac. Rep. 687; Sharon v. Sharon, ante, 26. Besides, the fact of the witness' marriage to Evans was called out on cross-examination, and as said in People v. Dye, 75 Cal. 112, 16 Pac. Rep. 539: "A party cannot cross-examine his adversary's witness upon irrelevant matters for the purpose of eliciting something to be contradicted; and, if such matters are drawn out, the court should stop the inquiry there."

Finally, it is contended that the evidence establishes the fact that the money was not loaned, but was advanced by plaintiff on account of a proposed purchase by her of an interest in defendants' business. And it is said "that when the defendants failed to carry out their agreement to admit the plaintiff as a partner her remedy was by a suit to recover damages for breach of contract and not for money loaned." The court found that the moneys sued for were loans, and we think the evidence abundantly sufficient to justify the finding. It is true that plaintiff occasionally speaks of some of them as advances, but she also speaks of them as loans. The two terms are not necessarily inconsistent. Mortgages are sometimes given to secure future advances. The evidence shows that there were some negotiations for a partnership between plaintiff and defendants, but that the minds of the parties never met, and the negotiations came to naught. No partnership agreement was ever arrived at, and there could, therefore, be no action for its breach.

We advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

SMITH et al. v. MATTHEWS. (No. 11,644.)

QUIETING TITLE—PLEADING.

A complaint showing that plaintiffs' grantor attempted to convey certain lands to defendant's grantor, and by mistake included too much land in the deed; that the land thus included has never been taken possession of by defendant or his grantors, but has remained in possession of plaintiffs and their grantors,—states a cause of action to quiet title, and is not barred by the statute of limitations, on account of plaintiff's actual possession. Overruling ante, 170.

McFarland, J., dissenting.

In bank. On rehearing. For report on former hearing, see ante, 170.

Mich. Mullany, Aylett R. Cotton, and W. H. H. Hart, for appellants. Wm. Matthews, for respondent.

Works, J. This case was affirmed on a former hearing, and a rehearing granted. The only question in the case is as to the sufficiency of the complaint. The complaint seems to have been regarded and treated by the parties, by the court below, and by this court on the former hearing, as one to correct a mistake in a deed conveying real estate. Ante, 170. So treated, the complaint was clearly bad, on the grounds stated in the former opinion. But on further consideration, and by sorting out a few simple and proper allegations from a mass of irrelevant and surplus matter, that never should have been in it, and which has only tended to confuse the real questions involved, and which has, so far, resulted in the appellants' defeat, we have concluded that, while the complaint is bad as one to correct a mistake, it states facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action to quiet title. If attorneys could be induced to plead, as required by section 426 of the Code of Civil Procedure, by stating "the facts constituting the cause of action in ordinary and concise language," instead of loading their pleadings with a detailed history of their case and the evidence by which their cause of action is to be established, they would save themselves and the courts a great deal of unnecessary labor, materially simplify the practice, save much expense to their clients, and sometimes avoid a decision against them, because of the extreme difficulty of understanding what their cause of action is.

Looking at the evidence pleaded in this complaint, in addition to the allegations of fact, it proves, if properly detailed in the complaint, that the plaintiffs' grantor attempted to convey certain lands to the defendant's grantor; that, by a mistake in locating one of the monuments, too much land was included in the deed; that the land thus improperly included in the deed was never taken possession of by the defendant, or any of his grantors, but has for many years, and ever since the conveyance, remained in the actual possession of the plaintiffs and their grantors. The right of the plaintiffs to have their title to the land quieted, as against a claim asserted by the defendant under this deed, was not barred, and could not be while the plaintiffs and their grantors remained in the actual possession of the land, claiming to be the owners thereof, and the actual owners, as against the defendant, of all interest therein except the mere naked title. Day v. Cohn, 65 Cal. 508, 4 Pac. Rep. 511; Barroilhet v. Anspacher, 68 Cal. 121, 8 Pac. Rep. 804; Love v. Watkins, 40 Cal. 563. We think, therefore, that the complaint states a cause of action to quiet title. Instead of pleading the evidence, it would have been much better if counsel for appellants had set up the facts and allowed the defendant to plead the statute of limitations; but this violation of good pleading has not rendered their complaint wholly bad. There were other objections to the complaint in the demurrer, but none of them are well taken, and they have not been pressed in this court.

Judgment reversed with instructions to the court below to permit the plaintiffs to amend their complaint, if they so desire; but, if not amended, to overrule the demurrer thereto, and proceed in accordance with this opinion.

We concur: Sharpstein, J.; Fox, J.

concur in the judgment: Beatty, C. J.

McFarland, J. I dissent. I do not think that the complaint avers that plaintiffs have been in possession of the land in contest since the execution of the deed. On the contrary, I think there is a marked attempt to avoid making such an averment. And, that being so, it follows clearly that the alleged cause of action was barred long before the suit was commenced. I think that the judgment should be affirmed.

FRIVOLOUS APPEAL.

Under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 957, providing that, when it appears to the appellate court that the appeal was made for delay, it may add to the costs such damages as may be just, such damages will be assessed in a case where the court is satisfied that the appeal was merely for delay, though the attorney for appellant prosecuted the appeal in good faith, believing that there was sufficient ground for reversal.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JOHN F. FINN, Judge.

J. M. Wood, for appellant. G. B. Merrill, for respondent.

WORKS, J. The only point made on this appeal is that the findings do not cover the issues, or, as counsel for appellant expresses it, "that the case alleged is not found, and the case found is not alleged." We have compared the complaint and the findings, and are thoroughly convinced thereby that the point is not well taken, that the criticisms made upon the findings are frivolous and unworthy of consideration, and that the appeal is wholly without merit.

Judgment affirmed, with 20 per cent damages.

(Oct. 29, 1889.)

PER CURIAM. On rehearing. Counsel for appellant has filed an earnest and elaborate petition for a rehearing in this case, in which he urges upon us his good faith in prosecuting the appeal, and contends that damages should not have been assessed.

We cannot, after reading this petition, question the good faith of counsel in taking the appeal. He was undoubtedly of the belief that there was sufficient ground for reversing the case; but we are still of the opinion that this belief was wholly unfounded. Therefore the question is whether or not the right and duty of this court to assess damages depends upon the belief of the attorney for appellant that he has sufficient ground for a reversal. The Code provides: "When it appears to the appellate court that the appeal was made for delay, it may add to the costs such damages as may be just." Code Civil Proc. § 957. In many cases the appeal may be prosecuted with the full belief that the cause may be reversed, and not only the appeal be taken, but the reversal desired for delay only. This may, and generally does, occur where the appeal does not affect the merits of the case, but rests entirely on technical grounds. The case before us is one of this kind. The cause of action was that the appellants, as real-estate agents, had sold the respondent's land for one price, and reported the sale to her at a less sum, and pocketed the difference. The evidence was not brought up, nor was it questioned by the appeal that the decision against the appellants was right on its merits. As was said in the former opinion, the appeal rested entirely on objections to the findings, which, in our judgment, were not only purely technical, but in fact wholly without foundation. A reversal, if the technical objections had been sustained, would not have reached the merits of the case, but would only have resulted in delay. It is fair to presume that this was the sole object of the appeal, as this would have been the only result, in view of the fact that the merits of the case were not presented to this court. It seems to us, therefore, that if there ever was a case in which the assessment of damages was not only justifiable, but eminently proper, this was such a case. In the crowded condition of the business of this court it is due, not only to the respondent, whose right to the recovery of her money is delayed, but to the court and other litigants, whose appeals are waiting to be heard, that the respondent should be properly remunerated for the delay, and this kind of appeals be discouraged. For these reasons the petition for a rehearing, and for a modification of the judgment by striking out the assessment of damages, is denied.

Tunstead, Sheriff, v. Nixdorf et al. (No. 12,158.)

Indemnity Bond—Sheriffs.

1. A bond of indemnity to a sheriff for a sale under execution provided that the obligors would indemnify and save him harmless "of and from all damages, expenses, costs, and charges, including all counsel fees, which he * * * may incur in consequence of the legal enforcement of payment of the penalty of this bond, and against all loss and liability which he * * * shall sustain or in any wise be put to by reason of the levy," etc. Relying on this bond, the sheriff refused to return the property, and sold it, and a judgment was obtained against him therefor. Held, that the fact that, before the original execution was executed, an alias was necessary and was issued after the bond was given, did not preclude the sheriff from recovering on the bond.

2. Under the terms of the bond, the sheriff could recover of the obligors a reasonable amount which he paid as attorney's fees in the action on the bond.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Marin county; E. B. Mahon, Judge.

Action by James Tunstead, sheriff, on an indemnity bond given to him by defendants, Gustav Nixdorf and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Plaintiff also appeals from refusal to give judgment for his attorney's fees.

Joseph Kirk, for James Tunstead. E. W. Ashby and L. Quint, for G. Nixdorf and others.

Works, J. There are two appeals in this case, both of which are presented and will be considered together. The facts are somewhat complicated, and are thus stated by counsel for the defendants in their brief in support of their appeal: The facts of this case are that in July, 1876, the appellants Nixdorf and Schroeder commenced an action in the third district court of San Francisco against one James McCue to recover $10,000 damages; that in December, 1877, judgment was rendered in favor of said Nixdorf and Schroeder, and against said McCue, for the sum of $500; that on January 12, 1878, an execution on said judgment was issued, directed to the sheriff of Marin county, and placed in the hands of James Tunstead, plaintiff in this case, as such sheriff, with written instructions to levy upon and sell a certain stallion called "Copperhead," the property of said McCue, in said Marin county; that said Tunstead, as such sheriff, did, on the 12th day of January, 1878, by virtue of said execution and instructions, levy upon and take into his possession said stallion, and advertise him for sale; that after such levy, and after advertising the said stallion for sale, said McCue demanded that said Tunstead, as such sheriff, should release from said levy said stallion, as property of said McCue, as exempt from execution; that notice of said demand of McCue was given by said Tunstead, as such sheriff, to said Nixdorf and Schroeder, who as principals, and the other defendants herein, Jacob G. Gundlach and Henry Tromer, as sureties, executed the bond of indemnity set out in the complaint in this action, that on March 1, 1878, and before the sale of said stallion, said McCue commenced an action in the twenty-second district court, of Marin county, against said Tunstead, as such sheriff, to recover from said Tunstead the possession of said stallion, or its value, viz., $1,000; that such proceedings were had in said twenty-second district court, in said case of McCue v. Tunstead, that on April 15, 1878, a judgment was rendered in favor of said sheriff, plaintiff herein, and against said McCue, for the possession of said stallion, and thereafter said stallion was returned to said sheriff; that on the 3d day of May, 1878, an alias execution was issued out of the twenty-third district court, San Francisco, in the said case of Nixdorf and Schroeder against the said McCue, directed to and placed in the hands of the sheriff of Marin county, plaintiff here, and thereafter said stallion was levied upon and sold under said alias execution; that such further proceedings were had in said case of McCue v. Tunstead, Sheriff, that judgment was entered in favor of McCue, and against said Tunstead, for the return of said stallion, or its value, viz., $1,000, and certain costs; that said stallion was never returned to said McCue. This suit was therefore brought by plaintiff, upon the bond of indemnity set out in the complaint, to recover from the obligors therein the amount of plaintiff's liability in the case of McCue v. Tunstead, and $200 counsel fees, paid in this suit. See, also, for further particulars of the litigation resulting in this suit, McCue v. Tunstead, 65 Cal. 506, 4 Pac. Rep. 510, 66 Cal. 486, 6 Pac. Rep. 316; McCue v. Superior Court, 71 Cal. 545, 12 Pac. Rep. 615. The court below rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiff for the amount recovered against him by McCue, with interest and costs, but declined to allow him the sum of $200, alleged to have been paid out by him in the prosecution of the present action. The defendants appeal from the judgment against them, and from the order denying them a new trial, and the plaintiff appeals from the judgment on the ground that the attorney's fees should have been included therein. The defendants contend that the indemnity bond sued on only indemnified the sheriff against loss or liability on account of his seizure of the property under the original execution; and that as no sale of the property was made under said execution, but under an alias execution issued subsequent to the giving of the bond, it was not applicable to any liability incurred by reason of such sale.

The bond recites that whereas, a judgment was recovered by the parties, naming them, against said McCue, and execution had issued to the plaintiff herein, as sheriff of Marin county, and said sheriff had levied upon a certain stallion known as "Copperhead," and then provides: "And whereas, upon the taking of said goods and chattels, by virtue of the said writ, the said James S. McCue claimed the said goods and chattels, viz., the said stallion, as exempt from execution under the laws of this state, and whereas, the said plaintiffs, hereby expressly waiving a trial by sheriff's jury of the right of property and the said claim of exemption, require of the said sheriff that he shall retain the said property under such levy and in his custody: Now, therefore, the condition of this obligation is such that if the said Charles Schroeder and Gustav Nixdorf, as principals, and the said Henry Tromer and Jacob G. Gundlach, as sureties, their said heirs, executors, and administrators, shall well and truly indemnify and save harmless him, the said sheriff, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, of and from all damages, expenses, costs, and charges, including all counsel fees, which he, said sheriff, his heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns, may incur in consequence of the legal enforcement of payment of the penalty of this bond, and against all loss and liability which he, the said sheriff, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, shall sustain, or in any wise be put to, for or by reason of the levy, taking, or retention by him, the said sheriff, in his custody, under said execution, of the property claimed as aforesaid, then the above obligation to be void; otherwise to remain in full force and virtue."

It clearly appears from the recitals and covenants in the bond that the sheriff had seized the property on execution before the bond was given, and that the execution defendant was demanding the release of the property as exempt from execution. In order to prevent such release, the bond in suit was given. By reason of this indemnity, and relying upon it, the sheriff refused to deliver up the property, by reason of which he was involved in litigation, which resulted in a judgment against him. It seems to us that the fact that, before the original could have been or was fully executed, an alias writ was necessary to be and was issued, in order to sell the property, was wholly immaterial, and could not affect the right of the sheriff to resort to the indemnity bond. His liability attached the moment he refused, on demand, to surrender the property to the execution debtor, and that liability was fixed and determined by the judgment of McCue against him. The same judgment fixed the liability of the defendants in this action to the plaintiff. McBeth v. McIntyre, 57 Cal. 49. It would have been different if the bond had only indemnified the sheriff against actual damages. In such case the sheriff could not recover until he had actually been compelled to pay the judgment recovered against him. Oaks v. Scheifferly, 74 Cal. 478, 16 Pac. Rep. 252. The bond in suit was security against liability on the part of the plaintiff, and not against actual damages only, and his liability attached under the original execution. Conceding, as contended by the defendants, that it was the duty of the sheriff to have sold the property under the first execution when the property was returned to him under the judgment of the court below, which was afterwards reversed, the fact that, instead of doing so, an alias execution was issued, and the sale made thereunder, could not have injured the defendants, or affected their liability. There is no merit in the appeal of the defendants.

The question raised by the appeal of the plaintiff as to his right to his attorney's fees, expended in this action, must turn upon the covenants in the bond. The bond provided that the principal and sureties thereof should "well and truly indemnify and save harmless him, the said sheriff, his heirs, administrators, executors, and assigns, of and from all damages, expenses, costs, and charges, including all counsel fees, which he, the sheriff, his heirs, administrators, executors, and assigns, may incur in consequence of the legal enforcement of the payment of the penalty of this bond." The court below found that the plaintiff had "expended and paid out in the prosecution of this action, as and for counsel fees, the sum of $200; the same being a reasonable amount therefor." These fees are clearly within the covenants of the bond and should have been allowed. Whether, but for this express agreement to pay them, they could have been recovered, is immaterial. It is enough that the defendants promised to pay them.

The judgment is affirmed as against the defendants, with 10 per cent. damages, and the court below is instructed to modify the judgment, by including therein the sum of $200, attorney's fees expended by the plaintiff. The plaintiff will also be entitled to a reasonable fee for his attorney's fees in this court, which the court below will ascertain and allow.

People v. Reed et al. (No. 11,769.)

Appeal—Review—Dedication—Evidence.

1. A finding by the trial court of an ultimate fact does not preclude the supreme court from reviewing on appeal the sufficiency of the facts found to show such ultimate fact, where the finding thereof recites that it appears "by the acts, facts, and matters above found."

2. The platting of land, and the sale of lots with reference thereto, by the owner, does not constitute a dedication of land as a street as to the public, where such land is never opened as a street, and the owner keeps it inclosed, and uses it for more than 20 years before an attempt to accept it by the public.

3. An ordinance by the city council declaring that the land "be, and the same is hereby, dedicated and set apart to public use as a public street," without referring to the owner or his alleged dedication, is not an acceptance thereof.

Thornton, J., dissenting.

In bank. On rehearing. For former report, see 20 Pac. Rep. 708.

William Matthews, for appellants. Geo. A. Johnson, Atty. Gen., and D. W. Herrington, for the People.

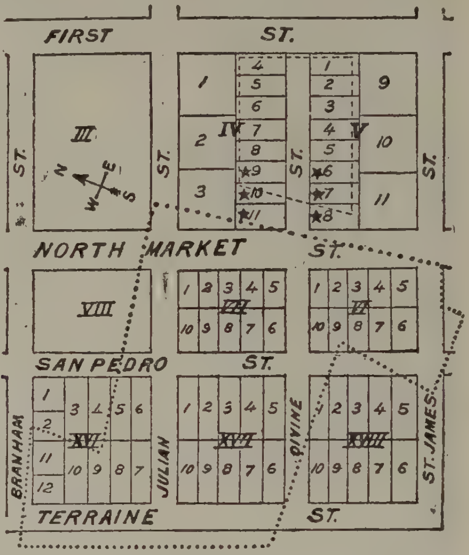
Works, J. This action was brought by the people, on the relation of the mayor of the city of San Jose against the appellants, to declare a certain strip of land to be a public street of said city, to compel the appellants to remove certain buildings therefrom, and to enjoin them from maintaining said obstructions, and from setting up any claim of right to maintain the same thereon. There was a judgment in favor of the plaintiff in the court below, and the defendants have appealed on the judgment roll.

The sole question in the case is whether this strip of land had or had not been dedicated by the defendants, or either of them, to the public as a highway, and this question we are called upon to determine from the facts as they appear in the findings. On this question the court finds: "(6) That in March, 1862, the defendant E. P. Reed was the owner in fee of the lands and the title thereto, designated by the red and blue lines shown on the map, marked 'Exhibit A,' city of San Jose, a copy of which is hereto attached, and made a part of these findings. (7) That in March of said year, 1862, said defendant E. P. Reed caused said lands within said red and blue lines to be surveyed by Charles T. Healey, who was then the city surveyor of said city of San Jose, and, with the other lands indicated upon said map, to be subdivided and plotted into streets, lots, and blocks, and a map thereof to be made upon a scale of 200 feet to the inch, and of which said exhibit thereto attached is a true copy. (8) That upon said survey and map the street designated 'Divine Street' thereon was laid down as a thoroughfare and street, marked thereon 'Divine Street,' extending from the west line of First street, as shown on said map, to the east line of Terraine street, extending in length from First street, westerly, a distance of about one thousand and fifty feet, and being sixty feet in breadth throughout." So much of the map as includes the lands referred to in said findings as being included within the red and blue lines is as follows:



Note. In the above diagram the red line is represented by dots and the blue line by short dashes.

The whole length of Divine street, as delineated on the map, appears on the part we have set out. The particular part of said street sought by this action to be opened lies between blocks VI. and VII. and extends from San Pedro to Market street, a distance of one block. The court further finds that said map was never recorded, but about 25 copies thereof were lithographed in said year 1862, and were by the appellant E. P. Reed exhibited to divers persons interested in the sale or purchase, or in some way connected with the transfers of lands and lots in said city, within the boundaries of the map, but gave instructions that the same should not be recorded. That the lands included in said map, outside of the red and blue lines, were the property of others than the said Reed, and their consent was not, and could not be, obtained to the subdivision and mapping of the same, and had not since been obtained, except that persons owning Divine street, east of Market and west of San Pedro street, threw the same open to public use according to said survey and map, and those interested in that portion of San Pedro street from Dams street southerly to San Augustine street, and that portion of Market street deeded to the city of San Jose, were thrown open to the public use as streets in conformity to the map, and have ever since been, and yet remain, public streets under the charge of said city. "That in the year 1863, with the consent of said E. P. Reed and others interested as owners in the lands, and by and with the consent of the mayor and common council of said city, the course and direction of said North Market street was changed from the direction indicated by the space lying between lands surrounded by the red lines and land surrounded by the blue lines on Exhibit A, to conform said Market street to said survey and map and plan of streets, lots, and blocks, as surveyed by said Healey, and the same has ever since continued to be the established route and direction of said Market street. "That First and Julian streets, as laid down on said map, were established, open public streets of said city for more than two years prior to said survey and mapping of said lands of defendant E. P. Reed. That all other streets shown upon said exhibit were for the first time designated as streets when said survey and map were made, as set forth in finding 11. That Market street was changed as to direction. That Julian street did not extend west of Market street." The court further finds that the appellant E. P. Reed, after the making of said map, made various conveyances and leases of property, describing the same by reference to said map, describing it. Some of these conveyances were by reference to lots and blocks, but most of them were by metes and bounds ignoring the lots, blocks, and streets. Some of them were by metes and bounds designating some of the streets as the boundary lines, and some of them conveyed parts of the streets as laid out in the map. Some, if not the most, of these conveyances seem to have been of property of which he had no title, but were included in the map. These conveyances included lots 9, 10, and 11 of block 4, and lot 8 of block 5, all of which fronted on the street in controversy in this action, but not on that part of the street sought to be opened. The court further finds that on the 24th day of December, 1867, the appellant E. P. Reed conveyed to his wife, Clarissa M. Reed, by metes and bounds, all of block 6 and 7, and that part of Divine street lying between said blocks, which is the portion of said street in controversy in this action. That thereafter certain other conveyances were made by Reed and wife by metes and bounds, mentioning certain of the streets on said map as boundary lines, one of which was for a part of said block 6, but not bordering on the street in controversy, the title to said portion of Divine street and the lands bordering thereon still remaining in Mrs. Reed until her death, and being by her will devised to her husband. The court further finds that on the 12th day of December, 1884, more than 20 years after said map was made, and after the portion of the alleged street in controversy had been conveyed to Mrs. Reed, and had been occupied by buildings and fences, the mayor and common council of said city of San Jose passed an ordinance declaring that the strip of land in controversy "be, and the same is hereby dedicated and set apart to public use as a public street forever," and instructing the street commissioner to demand possession thereof, and, if possession was given, to remove all obstructions therefrom and throw the same open to public use as a street of said city, and directing the city attorney, if possession were refused, to institute proceedings to recover the same for the city as a public street. It is also found that the owners of said strip of land claimed to be the owners thereof, free from any claim of the city or any of its inhabitants to use the same as a street. In conclusion the court below finds as follows: "(36) That by the acts, facts, and matters above found and recited, said premises above referred to and described were, by said several parties, dedicated as public streets of the city of San Jose, and were, by the proper authorities of the city of San Jose, accepted and received and used as public streets of the city of San Jose." From the findings of fact the court concluded that the property in controversy had been dedicated as, and was, a public street of said city, and entered judgment accordingly.

This action was heard by this court and decided in favor of the appellants, on the ground that the facts found by the court did not show a dedication. People v. Reed, 20 Pac. Rep. 708. A rehearing was granted. In their petition for a rehearing it was urged upon us that we had overlooked, or had not given sufficient weight to, the thirty-sixth finding, which they claimed was a finding of the ultimate fact of dedication, and concluded the case, on this appeal, against the appellants, the appeal being on the judgment roll, and they now attempt to forestall any inquiry into the question whether the specific facts found constituted a dedication of the property in controversy as a street by the same contention. But, conceding that the finding is one of fact, or, as counsel terms it, a "conclusion of fact," it is apparent that the court below did not intend to cut off the right of the appellants to test the sufficiency of the specific facts found to show such dedication, in the manner indicated. This finding is based upon the other facts found. It recites in terms that, "by the acts, facts, and matters above found, said premises were by said parties dedicated," etc. It may be that if this finding had stood alone, and had not been put in this argumentative form, it might have been upheld as a sufficient finding of an ultimate fact. But this cannot be so where the facts are fully found, and the general finding of a dedication is expressly drawn as a conclusion from such facts. Counsel say it does not appear that the court found all of the facts proved. But it does appear from the finding itself that it was based entirely upon the facts found, and not, in whole or in part, on facts proved but not found. Therefore, if the specific facts found do not support this one, which is a summing up of the others, the judgment should be reversed.

We pass, therefore, to a consideration of the question whether the facts found show a dedication. In doing so it must be borne in mind that the map made of the property was never recorded; that the part of the alleged street in controversy was never opened as a street, but for many years had been fenced and occupied by substantial and permanent buildings; that no sales of lots thereon were ever made; that there is no finding that any of the individuals who purchased property on other parts of the alleged street had ever seen the map of the property, or had any information, at the time they purchased, that a street was laid out at the place in controversy; and that no action was ever taken by the city for more than 20 years after the map was made and the property inclosed and permanently improved. In an early case this court said: "In dedication no particular formality is necessary. It is not affected by the statute of frauds. It may be made either with or without writing, by any act of the owner, such as throwing open his land to public travel, or platting it, and selling lots bounded by streets designated in the plat, thereby indicating a clear intention to dedicate; or an acquiescence in the use of his land for a highway, or his declared assent to such use, will be sufficient; the dedication being proved in most, if not all, of the cases, by matter in pais, and not by deed. The vital principle of the dedication is the intention to dedicate; and, whenever this is unequivocally manifested, the dedication, so far as the owner of the soil is concerned, has been made. Time, therefore, though often a very material ingredient in the evidence, is not an indispensable ingredient in the act of dedication. If accepted and used by the public in the manner intended, the dedication is complete, precluding the owner and all claiming in his right from asserting any ownership inconsistent with such use. Dedication, therefore, is a conclusion of fact, to be drawn by the jury from the circumstances of each particular case; the whole question, as against the owner of the soil, being, whether there is sufficient evidence of an intention on his part to dedicate the land to the public use as a highway." Harding v. Jasper, 14 Cal. 647.

It is well settled by the decisions of this court that the making and filing of a map, designating certain streets thereon, is only an offer to dedicate such streets to the public, and that the dedication does not become effectual and irrevocable until the same is accepted by the public. Hayward v. Manzer, 70 Cal. 476, 13 Pac. Rep. 141; Harding v. Jasper, 14 Cal. 647; San Francisco v. Calderwood, 31 Cal. 588; San Francisco v. Canavan, 42 Cal. 552; People v. Williams, 64 Cal. 502, 2 Pac. Rep. 393. But it is not the mere making of the map, or its delivery or exhibition to private individuals, that constitutes the offer of dedication to the public, but the filing; and, where the right to claim the street by the public rests upon the map alone, there is no offer to be accepted until the same is filed for record. It may be otherwise with private individuals who have purchased some of the property on the faith of the map, designating the streets, but this must be solely on the ground of estoppel, resting upon the representations made whereby parties have been induced to purchase on the faith of the implied statement that the designated streets were to be and remain open for public use. Such individual purchasers may, if it be shown that they acted on such representations, compel the opening of the streets, but if they do not the public has no ground of complaint. No dedication or offer of dedication has been made to the public, and it is not an interested party.

It is conceded by counsel for respondent that the portion of the street in controversy "has never been opened as a street," and that "on it the defendant had maintained a barn and shed, and kept it inclosed with substantial fences for more than twenty years before this suit." They take the position, however, that where the owner surveys and plats his property, and makes sales of lots with reference to such plat, the streets designated thereon are irrevocably dedicated to the public as streets. There are authorities sustaining this position. Bartlett v. Bangor, 67 Me. 464; Carter v. City of Portland, 4 Or. 339; Stone v. Brooks, 35 Cal. 494; Grogan v. Hayward, 6 Sawy. 498, 4 Fed. Rep. 161; Dill. Mun. Corp. (3d Ed.) § 640. But it is manifest that no such rule can prevail in this state, where it has been uniformly held that the owner may, at any time before his offer of dedication is accepted by the public, withdraw the same. As between him and the public, therefore, his act alone is not sufficient to constitute an irrevocable dedication. As we have said, it may be different as between him and private individuals to whom he has made sales of property with reference to the map. Much of the confusion in the decided cases has, in our judgment, grown out of the failure to distinguish between the right of the public authorities to claim a dedication, and the right of a purchaser to compel the opening of a street on the ground of estoppel. Holdane v. Trustees, etc., 21 N. Y. 474; Child v. Chappell, 9 N. Y. 257. In the case of Grogan v. Hayward, 6 Pac. Coast Law J. 351, relied upon by the respondent, which was an action by a private individual, this distinction is clearly made. If the purchaser of property asserts his rights the result may be the same, as to the mere keeping open of the street, as if a dedication is claimed by the public; but it does not follow that if he waives his right the public can assert it, nor can the purchaser, by asserting his right to an open way, impose on the public the duty of keeping a street in repair that has never been accepted. The case of San Leandro v. Le Breton, 72 Cal. 172, 13 Pac. Rep. 405, seems to overlook this plain distinction between the right of a purchaser and the public, but there it appeared that there was an acceptance by the public authorities, so that, so far as the opinion can be construed as militating against the rule above laid down, it is a mere dictum, and should have no weight. Therefore, conceding that a platting of property and sale of lots constitutes a dedication as between the owner and purchasers under him, of the streets delineated on the map, in order to constitute a dedication which can be taken advantage of by the public authorities of a city, the offer of dedication must have been accepted by such authorities, either by user or some formal act of acceptance. Harding v. Jasper, 14 Cal. 647; Hayward v. Manzer, 70 Cal. 476, 13 Pac. Rep. 141; San Francisco v. Calderwood, 31 Cal. 588; San Francisco v. Canavan, 42 Cal. 552; People v. Williams, 64 Cal. 502, 2 Pac. Rep. 393; City of Galveston v. Williams, 69 Tex. 449, 6 S. W. Rep. 860; State v. Trask, 27 Amer. Dec. 554, 563; Gilder v. City of Brenham, 67 Tex. 345, 3 S. W Rep. 309; Cook v. Harris, 61 N. Y. 448; Briel v. City of Natchez, 48 Miss. 423; Field v. Manchester, 32 Mich. 279; Hamilton v. Railroad Co., (Ill.) 15 N. E. Rep. 854, Fisk v. Town of Havana, 88 Ill. 208. Numerous other cases to the same effect might be cited. Such acceptance must be within a reasonable time after such offer of dedication, and if not accepted the owner may resume the possession of the property, and thereby revoke his offer. Hayward v. Manzer, 70 Cal. 476, 13 Pac. Rep. 141; State v. Trask, 27 Amer. Dec. 554, 566; Field v. Manchester, 32 Mich. 279; County of Wayne v. Miller, 31 Mich. 447.

In this case there was no user of the street, and no attempt to accept the dedication by formal act of the public authorities for more than 20 years. This was not within a reasonable time, as shown by the authorities cited above, and therefore came too late. But, if this were not so, we think the ordinance pased by the common council of the city was not in any sense an acceptance of the dedication It did not refer to the appellant or his alleged dedication of the street. As was well said in the former opinion, it appears more like an attempt to take private property for public use without compensation than an acceptance of the street. There was neither a dedication to, nor an acceptance by, the public in this case. Littler v. City of Lincoln, 106 Ill. 353; Kennedy v. Mayor, etc., 65 Md. 514, 9 Atl. Rep. 234.

Judgment reversed, with instruction to the court below to conform its conclusions of law to the views expressed in this opinion, and to render judgment on the findings in favor of the defendant.

PEOPLE v. BISHOP. (No. 20,515.)

CRIMINAL LAW—EVIDENCE OF OTHER CRIMES—CROSS-EXAMINATION.

1. On the trial of one indicted for an assault with intent to commit murder, it is error to permit the prosecution to ask defendant, on cross-examination, whether he had not assaulted certain other persons with a deadly weapon, as to which he had not been examined in chief, and an objection that such evidence is immaterial is sufficient.

2. Such questions are not admissible for the purpose of impeaching defendant's character, either generally or for truth and veracity.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Mendocino county; ROBERT MCGARVEY, Judge.

T. L. Carothers, for appellant. George A. Johnson, Atty. Gen., for the People.

SHARPSTEIN, J. Appellant was tried upon a charge of assault with intent to commit murder, and found guilty of an assault with a deadly weapon. He moved for a new trial, which was denied, and from the judgment and the order denying his motion for a new trial this appeal is taken. After the defendant had been examined in chief as a witness in his own behalf, he was cross-examined by the prosecution, and during such cross-examination the following questions were put to him, and the following proceedings: "Mr. Cooper (for the prosecution.) You were there that day, (the day of the alleged assault,) with a pistol on your person? A. Yes, sir. Q. What kind of a pistol? A Smith & Wesson, 38. Q. 38-caliber? How many times does it shoot? A. Five times. Q. Were you going to get sheep with that? A. No, sir. Q. What did you carry a pistol with you for, when you went up there to get your sheep? A. Well, there was a man about two or three weeks before that threatened to cut my heart out, so I packed this pistol. Q. A man threatened to cut your heart out? A. Yes, sir. Q. Who was that? A. It was William Clay, my brother-in-law. Q. Packed this pistol for your brother-in-law? A. No, I packed it to protect myself. Q. Is that the pistol you drew on Johnny Hall? Mr. Carothers. I object to that as not in cross-examination, and immaterial. The Court. Is it not competent for another reason? Mr. Carothers. I cannot imagine any reason it would be. The Court. It seems to me you ought to imagine. If a man is in the habit of assaulting men with a deadly weapon, it goes to the character of the witness. Mr. Carothers. They cannot attack his character. The Court. They can show that he is a man of bad reputation. Mr. Carothers. We except. The Court. Anything that would detract from the credibility, I suppose that it is competent for them to show. If he did assault Mr. Hall, it may be that he was perfectly justifiable. Go on. Mr. Carothers. We object as immaterial, incompetent, and not in cross-examination. The Court. It is not for the purpose of proving an assault on Hall. Mr. Cooper. For the purpose of showing the credibility of the witness; to show the character of the witness. The Court. I suppose it is competent. Go on. Mr. Carothers. We except. Mr. Cooper. Is that the pistol that you drew on Mr. Hall once? The Court. I do not think that question is exactly right. Mr. Cooper. Well, did you draw a pistol on J. W. Hall, the son of A. W. Hall, once? Mr. Carothers. I object as immaterial and not cross-examination. The Court. I overrule the objection. Mr. Carothers. We save an exception. Mr. Cooper. I will ask you if you did not, in the fall of 1886, draw a pistol on J. W. Hall. A. Well, Johnny and I had a little trouble. He pulled out a knife. Q. And you took out your six-shooter then? A. Yes, sir. Q. You did on that occasion draw a pistol? A. Yes, sir; to protect myself. Q. Do you know a man by the name of Benedict? A. Well, I have heard of him. Q. Did you ever draw a pistol on him? Mr. Carothers. I object as immaterial, and not cross-examination. The Court. I overrule the objection. Mr. Carothers. We except. Witness. That is another Johnny Hall case. Mr. Cooper. Benedict was working there? A. Yes, sir; I think he was. I had loaned Johnny Hall several hundred dollars. Q. I asked you if you drew a pistol on Benedict. A. Yes, sir; he came and took hold of my horses. Q. You drew a pistol on him? A. Yes, sir; to make him let go." The attorney general, in his brief, admits that the questions asked were incompetent for the purpose of affecting the credibility of the witness, but insists that "the grounds (of the objections) that the questions were immaterial were not sufficient, for, on cross-examination, it is not necessary that the questions be material to the issue."

We think the ground of the objection sufficient. Besides, the defendant's attorney stated as the grounds of one of his objections that the question was "immaterial, incompetent, and not in cross-examination." "A defendant in a criminal action or proceeding cannot be compelled to be a witness against himself; but if he offer himself as a witness he may be cross-examined by the counsel for the people as to all matters about which he was examined in chief." Pen. Code, § 1323. The defendant was not, nor is it claimed that he was, examined in chief as to the matters specified in the questions put to him on his cross-examination. He could not be impeached by the evidence sought to be elicited by those questions, nor would such evidence tend to prove that he committed the crime with which he was charged. Therefore the questions were immaterial. Being unauthorized and immaterial, the objections should have been sustained. The first rule governing in the production of evidence is that the evidence offered must correspond with the allegations, and be confined to the point in issue. Under this rule it is not competent for the prosecution to give evidence of facts tending to prove another distinct offense for the purpose of raising an inference that the person had committed the offense in question. The questions were asked, doubtless, with a view to create in the minds of the jury a prejudice against the defendant. They were not admissible for the purpose of impeaching the defendant's character, either generally or for truth and veracity. Code Civil Proc. § 2051. The rulings of the court upon the objections to the questions were clearly erroneous, and in our opinion affected the substantial rights of the defendant. That it was error for the court to say in its charge to the jury: "I have already remarked to you, gentlemen, that on a certain day this defendant was guilty of an assault with a deadly weapon, with intent to murder William Bonee,"—is too clear to admit of argument. If we were at liberty to go outside of the record we might easily be persuaded that it does not speak the truth. But the court has settled and certified to the correctness of a bill of exceptions, which shows that this clause was in the charge of the court, and we are compelled to pass upon it. The exceptions not noticed do not, in our opinion, require any consideration. For the errors which we have considered the judgment and order must be reversed. Judgment and order reversed.

We concur: BEATTY, C. J.; FOX, J.; MCFARLAND, J.; WORKS, J.; THORNTON, J.

ROBINSON v. NEVADA BANK. (No. 12,213.)

PRINCIPAL AND AGENT — AGENT'S AUTHORITY — PLEDGE—EVIDENCE.

1. In an action for the alleged conversion of wheat pledged to defendant to secure payment of a note signed by a third person, as "agent," it appeared that defendant knew that the wheat was plaintiff's; that the note did not purport to be in plaintiff's name; and that the signer had no actual authority from plaintiff to pledge the wheat, though he was agent for plaintiff in some respects. Defendant showed no evidence that the third person had ever signed plaintiff's name to an obligation, or pledged plaintiff's property to secure his own, without written authority. It appeared that the third person paid part of the money raised by the pledge to plaintiff, but it also appeared that he owed the latter, who did not know from whence the money came. Held, that a finding for plaintiff would not be disturbed, as it was doubtful whether the third person was ostensibly authorized to pledge the wheat.

2. A circular from the agent soliciting consignments of wheat, when shown to have been received and acted on by plaintiff, is admissible to show the relations between plaintiff and the agent, though it had not been brought to defendant's notice.

3. Evidence is admissible to show that an addition made to a letter to defendant, signed by plaintiff, which addition would have constituted an estoppel if acted on by defendant, or a ratification if made by plaintiff, was made without plaintiff's knowledge or consent, where it is not shown that defendant acted on it, and the person making it was not plaintiff's partner, nor had any authority as to the wheat.

4. Error in the exclusion of evidence is not prejudicial where substantially the same evidence is afterwards admitted.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JAMES G. MAGUIRE, Judge.

T. I. Bergin, for appellant. George A. Blanchard, Crittenden Thornton, and F. H. Merzbach, for respondent.

HAYNE, C. This was an action for damages for the conversion of 3,748 sacks of wheat. The defense was that the wheat had been pledged to the bank by the respondent's intestate, J. H. Byers, acting through one W. A. Mathews, who is claimed to have been his agent, to secure the payment of money advanced by the bank, which money had not been repaid. The general facts are as follows: Byers was a farmer in Colusa county, who was in the habit of sending his wheat to Mathews to be warehoused. Mathews was in the habit of storing the wheat in the Mission Rock warehouse in the name of Byers; and this particular lot of wheat was so stored. In November, 1884, Mathews gave a promissory note to the bank, signed "W. A. MATHEWS, Agent," and pledged the wheat to secure its payment. The question at the trial was whether Mathews had authority to pledge the wheat. The trial court gave judgment for the plaintiff; and the bank appeals from the judgment and from an order denying a new trial.

1. The appellant asserts, in general terms, that the evidence is insufficient to support the decision. The learned counsel, however, does not point out any evidence to show that the findings are erroneous, and in view of his well-known ability and industry we consider this equivalent to an acknowledgment that the evidence is at least conflicting. But, as the case is a hard one for the bank, which undoubtedly parted with its money in good faith to a person who, in some respects, at least, was agent for the owner of the wheat, we have examined the evidence to see whether it justified the findings. In the first place, it is to be observed that the bank cannot claim that it did not know that Byers was the owner of the wheat. The original warehouse receipt showed that he was. The receipt taken in the name of the bank in place of the original receipt showed the same thing, and the note itself showed it, and the bank makes no such claim: for the answer avers that the money was advanced to Byers, and that the wheat pledged was his wheat. In the next place, it is clear that this use of the wheat was without the knowledge or consent of Byers. He knew nothing of what had been done until an account was presented to him by Mathews, in March, 1885. Mathews, therefore, had no actual authority to pledge the wheat. The only possible question is whether he had ostensible authority. Upon this question it is to be observed that the note did not purport to be in the name of Byers. It was signed "W. A. MATHEWS, Agent." The officers of the bank seem to have accepted the statement of Mathews, and to have concluded that because he had been engaged in other transactions for Byers, therefore he had authority to act in this. But in what transactions? It was incumbent upon the bank to show that he had been authorized to act in similar transactions. It was incumbent upon it to show at least one specific instance in which Mathews had assumed to sign the name of Byers, or to pledge his property for obligations in Mathews' name, and in which such act had been authorized or recognized. Upon the defense made the defendant had the affirmative of the issue, and was therefore bound to produce a preponderance of evidence. And it is to be presumed that the bank kept proper records of its transactions, and could have proved such a specific instance if it had existed; but no such instance was shown. All the specific instances shown, except one, were of notes signed by Byers himself, although these were brought to the bank by Mathews. There was one note which was signed "W. A. MATHEWS," with the name "J. H. BYERS" written across its face; but this was not written by Byers, who knew nothing about it, and he is not shown to have authorized or recognized it. It was afterwards paid, presumably by Mathews himself. There were other notes signed by Mathews himself, and accompanied with notes signed by Byers. But we have not been able to find a single instance, authorized or recognized by Byers, where the latter's name was signed by Mathews to an obligation, or where his property was pledged to secure Mathews' own obligation, without a writing signed by Byers. This being the case, we cannot attach much importance to the general statements of some of the witnesses as to what was "always done." Mathews, in some parts of his testimony, seeks to convey the idea that the money went to Byers himself, and he did, undoubtedly, pay some of the money to Byers on several occasions; but he was always indebted to Byers. When he obtained the money by the pledge of this wheat he deposited it in the Grangers' Bank. At this time he was doing a large business with the Grangers' Bank, and his account was changing every day. His deposits there between September 3d and December 12th of the year in question amounted to $75,777.57, and he drew against this money for his own purposes, as occasion required, he being then, according to his own account, dealing in mining stocks, and engaged in the business of buying and selling wheat, insurance business, and making loans upon real estate, all on his own account, though with other people's money. Byers did not know that the sums he received had been raised on his wheat. He probably did not concern himself much about how Mathews got hold of the money, but accepted it because the man was indebted to him. We do not think that such payment operated to validate the otherwise invalid transaction. Mathews also states that with a part of the money raised by this pledge he paid some debts of Byers. But these were really Mathews' own debts, upon which Byers was accommodation indorser. Upon the whole case, although there is some testimony in favor of the appellant's position, the most that can possibly be said is that it is doubtful whether the decision was right upon the evidence, and under the well-settled rule the findings cannot be disturbed.

2. An objection was sustained to the question asked the witness Mathews, as to the party for whom he was acting in obtaining the loan. But the witness afterwards answered substantially the same question, and hence, if there was any error in sustaining the objection, it was without prejudice.

3. The plaintiff introduced in evidence a circular from Mathews to grain producers, soliciting the consignment of wheat to him, and offering to procure the same to be stored in warehouses, for the owners, and setting forth the desirability on various grounds of such a proceeding. The objection made to this was that there was no proof that the circular had been brought to the notice of the defendant. But, if the plaintiff received and acted upon this circular, we think that it was admissible upon the question as to the relations in fact existing between plaintiff and Mathews, and while, when the evidence was introduced, it had not been shown that the plaintiff had received and acted upon the circular, yet this was subsequently testified to. The error of receiving it without such testimony was therefore cured.

4. During the testimony of the witness Brander he stated that when Mathews came to the bank to get money he would "explain that Mr. Byers was interested with him in the matter." This was stricken out on motion of the plaintiff. The witness, however, almost immediately afterwards gave substantially the same testimony. He proceeded to say: "Mathews represented that he was a partner of J. H. Byers & Co., and he represented that he attended to the individual business of Byers that was not business of the firm." The question as to the representations of Mathews was afterwards directly put, and the court said: "I understand it has been answered that Mr. Mathews did make representations concerning his authorities. I will not allow that question, because the question has been asked and answered, and if there is anything to which it is preliminary, that thing may follow without asking the question again." Under these circumstances, if there was any error, it was cured.

5. Some time after the loan was made, Byers, when he found out what had been done, wrote a letter to the bank, in which he stated that "any future negotiations on the part of Mr. Mathews as affecting above lot of wheat will not be valid." This letter was in the handwriting of one Mogk, who was the partner of Byers, but was signed by the latter in his individual name. After signing it he left it with Mogk to be mailed; and the latter wrote upon the margin of the paper the following: "Mr. Mogk, of J. H. Byers & Co., will be down to see you about Friday, May 1st, and give you full particulars in regard to the original loan of $4,900 on above lot of wheat; also for the purpose of substituting my own note, to effect a complete transfer. Please acknowledge receipt of this and contents inclosed." The plaintiff was allowed to prove that this addition was written by Mogk, without plaintiff's knowledge or consent, and it is urged that this was error. If any action had been taken by the bank upon the faith of this letter, we are inclined to think that it would have constituted an estoppel; but it is not shown that any such action was taken. The contrary is to be inferred from the testimony of the witness Brander. If Byers had written it himself, or had authorized it, it might perhaps have constituted a ratification, so far as the pledge was concerned. But the evidence above referred to showed that the addition was without his consent or knowledge, and we think that it was admissible to show such want of consent or knowledge. Finally, if it had appeared that Mogk was the partner of Byers with respect to the wheat in question, it might be argued that the effect was the same as if the addition had been written by Byers himself; but this does not appear. The wheat did not belong to the firm of J. H. Byers & Co. It is admitted by the pleadings to have been the property of Byers himself. Mogk may have been the partner of Byers as to other matters, but in view of the admission of the pleadings it cannot be inferred that he had any authority to do anything with respect to this wheat except to post the letter as Byers signed it. If he had any such authority it was for the defendant to show it. We therefore advise that the judgment and order appealed from be affirmed.

We concur: GIBSON, C.; VAN CLIEF, C.

CARRAHER v. SAN FRANCISCO BRIDGE CO.

NEGLIGENCE—ACCIDENTS AT RAILROAD CROSSINGS—EVIDENCE—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. In an action for personal injuries, an allegation that the accident occurred at a place where defendant's railroad track crossed a certain street at its intersection with a sea-wall is sustained by evidence that it occurred where the track crossed the sea-wall at the foot of such street, if the street were extended so far, and a very short distance from that part of the street used as a public thoroughfare, and that the crossing was used by numerous teams hauling material for the sea-wall.

2. Evidence that defendant used a certain coal-house which obstructed plaintiff's view of the track, and shifted it when it shifted the track, supports a finding that such coal-house was erected and maintained by defendant.

3. An instruction that "it is also claimed that these erections" (the obstructions to plaintiff's view) "were placed there by the defendant" is not erroneous as assuming that such was the fact.

4. The injury was alleged to have been caused by plaintiff's team taking fright at defendant's engine near the crossing. Held, that an instruction that it was the duty of defendant's employes in charge of the engine, not only to give notice by bell or whistle, but to slow up and see that the crossing was clear, and that it was defendant's duty to station a flagman at the crossing, is erroneous, as invading the province of the jury to determine the proximate cause of the injury, and imposing too great a degree of care on defendant, and as being a direction to find for plaintiff if the injury would not have occurred had defendant stationed a flagman at the crossing.

Commissioner' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; E. B. MAHON, Judge.

The allegation of the complaint, referred to in the opinion, was that the injury sued for occurred at a point where defendant's railroad crossed Vallejo street at its intersection with the sea-wall.

R. Percy Wright, for appellant. Cary & Sullivan, for respondent.

FOOTE, C. This action was to recover damages for injuries alleged to have been suffered by Carraher, the plaintiff, through the negligence and carelessness of the defendant, in running a train of cars engaged in hauling sand and rock to fill in a section of the sea-wall, being then in process of construction on a portion of the water-front of the city of San Francisco. The plaintiff had a verdict of the jury trying the cause, awarding him the sum of $1,000. From the judgment thereupon rendered, and an order denying a new trial, the defendant appeals.

The appellant contends that the verdict is not warranted by the evidence, and that certain of the instructions given by the court to the jury, at the instance of the plaintiff, are misleading, and erroneous. Counsel argue that the evidence shows without conflict that the plaintiff caused his own injury by his inattention to the horse which he was driving, his mismanagement of the animal, and his carelessness in approaching the crossing of the railroad near to which the injury was inflicted. There is a sharp conflict between that to which the plaintiff swore and some of the evidence given for the defendant, but the jury found for the plaintiff, and we see no reason to reverse their verdict on the evidence. The plaintiff declared that he had driven his horse and cart to the point where he dumped the load of sand and rock which he was hauling, and was on his return to the place from which another load was to be taken; that when he approached very near to the crossing of the railroad of the defendant over the sea-wall (which lay at foot of Vallejo street, and across it along the water-front of the city of San Francisco, if the street were prolonged to and beyond the crossing) the defendant's train of cars coming suddenly along, very close to the head of the plaintiff's horse, frightened the animal, which, in his struggles, upset the cart in which the plaintiff was riding, threw it and him down the bank of the sea-wall, and broke his wrist, etc. His further statement is that there was no flagman at that point, or any other means of warning him of the coming of the train; that he heard no bell or whistle; and that he was prevented from seeing the approaching train by reason of the obstruction to his view caused by a coal-house, which stood near the track, and was used by the defendant for holding its supplies of coal for its engines. The defendant contends that there was no proof that the place where the plaintiff was injured was the same as that alleged in the complaint. It is very evident from an inspection of the whole record that the allegations of the complaint on the point are substantially sustained by the plaintiff's testimony. The sea-wall which the railroad crossed was extended over a space of ground, which necessarily lay at the foot of Vallejo street, if the same had been extended to the said sea-wall and water-front, was in a direct line with such extension if it had existed, and was only a very short distance from that part of the street used as a public thoroughfare. The crossing was used as a public way for numerous teams hauling material to construct the sea-wall, and we cannot see how the proof varied in any material degree from the allegations of the pleading.

It is further urged by the appellant that there was an entire want of evidence going to show that the defendant built or maintained the coal-house, claimed to have obstructed the plaintiff's viewing the approaching train, as he was proceeding to pass the crossing of the track. The appellant, in his brief, cites a small part of the answer of the plaintiff to a question propounded to him. The question was: "Do you know who built that coal-house?" The answer in full was: "I don't; but the San Francisco Bridge Company used it for their purposes. I couldn't tell who built it. When the track was moved the coal-house was moved." All that the defendant saw fit to quote to us of the answer are the words "I don't." The evidence is plain, without conflict, that the defendant did use that coal-house and shifted the track for its purposes, and there was no effort whatever proceeding from any source attempting to show that it did not erect and maintain the coal-house. From all the evidence and the circumstances attending the use of the house the jury correctly concluded that it was both erected and maintained by the defendant.

As to the matter of errors alleged to exist in the instructions granted for the plaintiff, it may be said that the words in the first instruction, "It is also claimed that these erections were placed there by the defendant," only informed the jury that the plaintiff claimed that the evidence showed that the obstructions to the view of the plaintiff had been placed there by the defendant, and does not assume that such was the fact; and the evidence tended to show the existence of what was thus claimed to exist. This instruction was therefore not misleading.

We do not perceive anything prejudicial to the defendant in any of the other instructions complained of, unless it be the seventh. In our opinion that portion of it is objectionable which reads as follows: "In such a case, when the view of the track and approaching trains is obstructed by the act of the defendant, it is no excuse for an action of damages to say that a bell was rung or a whistle sounded to warn persons about to cross the track. It was the duty of the employes in charge of the engine, not only to have given such notice by bell or whistle, but it was also their duty to have slowed up as it approached the crossing, and seen that all had acted on the notice, and that the track at the crossing was clear, and in order to have been so assured it was the duty of the defendant to have stationed a flagman or watchman at the crossing to warn persons about to cross the track at Vallejo street of an approaching train." This assumed the province of the jury to determine from all the facts and circumstances in evidence whether or not the defendant was guilty of negligence which was the proximate cause of the accident in not using reasonable care in operating its railroad and sand train, and was a virtual direction to find a verdict for the plaintiff, if they were satisfied that the injuries to the plaintiff would not have been sustained if a flagman or watchman had been stationed at the crossing, who would have caused the train to slow up, thus establishing the principle that in order to avoid responsibility for such accidents the defendant must in all cases provide against the consequences of all acts of carelessness on the part of persons in going into peril, and that to do this, and insure the person crossing the track against all possible injury, the company must provide every possible precaution, leaving none to be taken by the person in peril. This, we think, is not the law in such cases as this. We therefore advise that the judgment and order be reversed.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; VAN CLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are reversed.

PEOPLE v. FORNEY. (No. 20,559.)

ASSAULT—INFORMATION.

Pen. Code Cal. § 245, provides that "every person who commits an assault upon the person of another with a deadly weapon or instrument, or by any means or force likely to produce great bodily injury, is punishable," etc. An information charged that defendant, "with a deadly weapon, namely a knife, which he, the said F., in his hand then and there had and held, upon the person of one C., there being, did willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously commit an assault, contrary to the form, force, and effect of the statute." Held, that the information was not defective as failing to allege that defendant assaulted a human being, or as failing to allege intent or present ability to commit the assault.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; D. J. MURPHY, Judge.

Carroll Cook, for appellant. George A. Johnson, Atty. Gen., for the People.

FOOTE, C. The defendant was convicted of an assault with a deadly weapon. From the judgment rendered in the premises he has appealed. His contention is that the information filed against him charges no offense known to the law. This he claims on the grounds—First, that it is not alleged against him that he assaulted any human being; second, that the pleading in controversy contains no averment that he had any intent to commit, or that he had the "present ability" to commit, the assault of which he was accused. The language of the information material to be considered is this: "Harry Forney is accused by the district attorney by this information of the crime of an assault with a deadly weapon, committed as follows: The said Harry Forney on the 11th day of September, A. D. 1888, at the said city and county of San Francisco, with a deadly weapon, namely, a knife, which he, the said Harry Forney, in his hand then and there had and held, upon the person of one John Coffey, there being, did willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously commit an assault, contrary to the form, force, and effect of the statute," etc. After reading that the assault was committed "upon the person of one John Coffey," it is manifest that a human being was declared to have been assaulted. The information charges that the defendant, with a deadly weapon, (describing the weapon,) willfully and maliciously committed an assault upon the person of one John Coffey. The statute bearing upon the matter is: "Every person who commits an assault upon the person of another with a deadly weapon or instrument, or by any means or force likely to produce great bodily injury, is punishable," etc. Pen. Code, § 245. The intent to commit the assault, and the "present ability" to do so, must be proved; but the statute does not declare that the information shall state these probative facts; and the pleading is sufficient, having followed the language of the section of the Penal Code supra in charging the offense. People v. Turner, 65 Cal. 540–542, 4 Pac. Rep. 553. We therefore advise that the judgment be affirmed.

81 Cal. 142

Murder—Instructions—Dying Declarations.

1. In a murder trial, an instruction that, "if the death of the deceased was accelerated by the violence of the prisoner, his guilt is not extenuated because death might and probably would have been the result of any disease with which the deceased was afflicted at the time of the violence," is erroneous, where there is evidence that the only blows given to deceased by defendant were given with the fists, and in self-defense, and that deceased died of injuries received otherwise than at the hands of defendant; as the violence of the prisoner may not have been unlawful.

2. The jury were instructed as follow: "When the killing is proved beyond a reasonable doubt, the defendant must make out his case in mitigation to excuse or justify it by some stronger proof in some appreciable degree than the proof of the prosecution. The burden of proof changes, and the proof on the part of the defendant must be in some degree stronger than the proof on the other side." Held erroneous. Following People v. Bushton, ante, 127.

3. The court instructed the jury that, if they believed that defendant did knock, kick, and stamp deceased, as charged, and if they believed that, at the time of such kicking and stamping, deceased was, and for some time prior thereto had been, suffering with peritonitis, occasioned by bruises received 32 hours prior to his death, still, if the jury further believed that the death was hastened by the knocking and stamping, the fact that deceased was suffering from peritonitis at the time would not extenuate defendant's guilt. Held, that the instruction was not objectionable, as assuming defendant's guilt, and was correct.

4. Expressions of opinion by deceased as to the character of the injuries of which he was dying are inadmissible as dying declarations.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; William A. Cheney, Judge.

H. T. Gage and John Robarts, for appellant. George A. Johnson, Atty. Gen., for the People.

Fox, J. Information against the defendant, charging him with the crime of murder. Conviction of manslaughter. Motion for a new trial denied, and defendant appeals.

One of the charges of the court to the jury is copied from the charge in People v. Hong Ah Duck, 61 Cal. 394, and is the same charge which was repeated in People v. Bushton, ante, 127. There, after mature consideration, it was held to be erroneous. On the authority of that case the judgment and order appealed from in this case must be reversed. See, also, People v. Elliott, ante, 207.

As the case will go back for new trial, we are asked also to consider other points made on this appeal. The court, at the request of the prosecution, gave the following charge: "If the death of the deceased was accelerated by the violence of the prisoner, his guilt is not extenuated because death might, and probably would, have been the result of any disease with which the deceased was afflicted at the time of the violence." This charge is quoted from an approved text-writer, and in a proper case may be accepted as sound law. But in this case it was insisted, and there was evidence tending to show, that the only blows given to the deceased by the prisoner were given with the fists, and were given in self-defense; also that the deceased died of disease produced by injuries received otherwise than at the hands of defendant. It might therefore be that the "violence of the prisoner" was not unlawful. If it was not, then no guilt would flow from it, even if death had resulted from such violence. It follows, under these circumstances, that this charge may have been misleading to the jury, and from it they may have assumed the guilt of the defendant, when, with a proper modification, they would not have done so. Instructions should not, directly or indirectly, assume or hypothetically suggest the guilt of the defendant. People v. Williams, 17 Cal. 142; People v. Hurley, 57 Cal. 145.

The exception to the second charge given by the court to the jury at the request of the prosecution is not well taken. It is not open to the criticism of assuming the guilt of the defendant, as claimed by appellant, but simply holds that if the jury find certain facts, (of which they must be satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt,) from which the law presumes him to be guilty, then his guilt is not extenuated by reason of the existence of certain other designated facts; and it correctly states the law on that subject.

What is claimed to have been oral dying declarations of the deceased were given in evidence. Among the declarations of deceased so given in evidence were not only statements of fact as to what occurred between himself and the defendant, but also his opinion as to the character of the particular injuries of which he was dying. Objection was made to the evidence of this opinion of the deceased, and exception taken to the order overruling such objection. This exception is well taken. Matters of opinion in dying declarations are not admissible. People v. Taylor, 59 Cal. 650; People v. Wasson, 65 Cal. 538, 4 Pac. Rep. 555. A dying declaration can only be admitted after first showing that the person who makes it believes that he is about to die, and has no hope of recovery. It being shown that he entertains that belief, then, upon the assumption that he is likely to tell the truth under such circumstances, the statements which he makes in that connection, detailing the facts and circumstances under which he has received any injuries from which he may be suffering, and how, or at whose hands, they were received, are admissible in evidence, to be weighed by the jury like any other evidence in the case. But even then his opinion is not to be received as to whether he is dying of wounds or of disease; as to what particular injuries (if there be several of them) are causing his death. We perceive no other prejudicial error. Judgment and order reversed.

We concur: WORKS, J.; PATERSON, J.

GARDNER v. STROEVER. (No. 13,191.)

OBSTRUCTION OF HIGHWAY—PRELIMINARY INJUNCTION.

Plaintiff alleged that he was engaged in the butchering business, and that defendant had constructed a building on the public road, wholly obstructing the road, which was plaintiff's only means of going to and from his slaughter-house, and that his business would be thus entirely destroyed, to his damage $5,000. He did not allege that defendant was not responsible for such sum, or that there would be any impediment to recovery of such sum by an action at law. Held, that he was not entitled to a preliminary injunction enjoining defendant from maintaining any obstruction on such road.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Butte county; P. O. HUNDLEY, Judge.

Action by Leo B. Gardner against Fred Stroever for damages. A preliminary injunction was granted, and from an order denying a motion to dissolve it defendant appeals.

Reardan & Freer, for appellant. Gray & Sexton, for respondent.

VAN CLIEF, C. The complaint describes a public road, "extending from the Oroville and Miner's ranch public road north-easterly past the slaughter-house of defendant and the slaughter-house of plaintiff, to the residence of Nancy Cooper," about 70 rods in length, situate in Butte county, and alleges that plaintiff is in possession of a slaughter-house on the south side of the road described; "and that the only means of entrance and exit to and from said slaughter-house to said public highway leading from Oroville to Miner's ranch, or any other public highway, is over and along said highway leading to the residence of Nancy Cooper aforesaid. That the defendant on the 20th day of February, 1889, wrongfully, unlawfully, and fraudulently, and for the purpose of vexing, annoying, and preventing this plaintiff from reaching his said slaughter-house, entered upon said public highway leading from the Oroville and Miner's ranch road to the residence of Nancy Cooper aforesaid, at a point between plaintiff's slaughter-house and said Oroville and Miner's ranch road, and caused to be erected across said public highway an obstruction, to-wit, a building which completely obstructed said road for all uses of a road, and wholly prevented this plaintiff from reaching his said slaughter-house. That plaintiff has no other way, convenient or otherwise, by which he can reach his said slaughter-house. That plaintiff is engaged in the butchering business in the town of Oroville, and is compelled, in order to supply the wants of his customers, to slaughter a number of animals each day. That he has no other place for slaughtering said animals than the place heretofore described. That if defendant is permitted to maintain his said obstruction across the public road, as aforesaid, plaintiff's business will be entirely destroyed and broken up, to his damage in the sum of $5,000. That, by reason of the acts heretofore complained of, plaintiff has been damaged in the sum of $300. Wherefore plaintiff prays judgment against the said defendant for the sum of $300 and costs of suit; that defendant be enjoined and restrained from maintaining any obstruction in and across said road during the pendency of this action; and that upon the trial of this case said injunction be made perpetual; and for such other and further relief as may be equitable and just." Upon this complaint alone the superior judge granted an injunction until further order, commanding the defendant and his agents "to desist and refrain from obstructing, or in any way, manner, or form interfering with, the road leading from the Oroville and Miner's ranch road to the residence of Nancy Cooper." The defendant moved, on the complaint alone, to dissolve the injunction upon "the ground that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to warrant the issuance or continuance of an injunction." This motion was denied, and the appeal is from the order denying it.

I think the motion to dissolve the injunction should have been granted. It appears by the complaint that the building complained of as being an obstruction to plaintiff's use of the road had been erected before the commencement of the action, and it is not alleged that defendant has threatened to do any other or further act tending to obstruct the road, or otherwise to injure the plaintiff. There was therefore no foundation in the complaint for a merely preventive injunction; and mandatory preliminary injunctions are seldom granted, and only in a peculiar class of extreme cases, of which this case is not one. High, Inj. §§ 2, 4; Murdock's Case, 20 Amer. Dec. 381, and notes citing the principal English and American cases.

To say the least, there is nothing in our Code of Civil Procedure more favorable to mandatory injunctions than is to be found in the general current of English and American authority. Indeed, our Code definition of an injunction (Code Civil Proc. § 525) entirely omits the mandatory ingredient found in nearly all the definitions of the text-writers. High, Inj. § 1, and note. But, without regard to statutory provisions, it seems to be well settled that a very strong and urgent case is required to justify a mandatory preliminary injunction. A clear case of prospective injury for which the plaintiff will have no adequate remedy at law is indispensable. In this case it is only alleged that plaintiff will be damaged in the sum of $5,000; and there is no allegation that the defendant is not responsible for that sum, nor that there will be any extraordinary impediment in the way of recovering that sum by an action at law. Tomlinson v. Rubio, 16 Cal. 204; Foundry v. Ryall, 62 Cal. 418. Besides, it has been decided by this court that a preliminary injunction "will not be retained where it appears [by the answer, uncontradicted by affidavit,] that the acts, the performance of which is sought to be restrained, had been performed before the order for the injunction was made or served." Delger v. Johnson, 44 Cal. 182. A fortiori, where the fact of performance appears in the complaint, as in this case. I think the order denying the motion to dissolve the injunction should be reversed, with direction to grant the motion.

We concur: Hayne, C.; Gibson, C.

Per Curiam. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the order denying the motion to dissolve the injunction is reversed, with direction to grant the motion.

Bibb et al. v. Bancroft. (No. 12,253.)

Instructions—Evidence.

1. In an action for breach of a contract by which plaintiff was to remove debris for defendant, the evidence showed that plaintiff, when seeking the contract, was referred by defendant to one C., and was told that anything he would do with him would be all right. On the question of agency, the court instructed as to the law of ostensible agency. Held, that the instruction was not irrelevant on the ground that an express agency only was shown by the evidence.

2. The complaint stated that "the parties hereto entered into a contract," etc., and that "defendant agreed with said plaintiffs to pay them the prices stated," etc. Held, that evidence of either an express or ostensible agency in the person who made the contract with plaintiffs was admissible.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by D. H. Bibb and others against H. H. Bancroft for breach of contract. It appeared in evidence that plaintiffs, when seeking the contract, were referred by defendant to one Cook, and were told that anything they would do with him would be all right. The jury were instructed on the question of agency as follows: "Another instance is that of an agency known as an 'ostensible agency.' That exists in law where one either intentionally, or from want of ordinary care, induces another to believe that a third person is his agent, although he never in fact employed him. In other words, one may actually create another his agent, and one may, on the other hand, induce a third person to believe another his agent, and to act with him as such; in which event the principal would be liable for the acts of the agent." Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals.

Estee, Wilson & McCutchen, for appellant. C. H. Parker and Alex. G. Eells, for respondents.

Paterson, J. Plaintiffs alleged in their complaint that on the 14th day of May, 1886, they entered into an agreement with the defendant, by the terms of which they were to remove certain debris from a lot owned by the defendant in the city and county of San Francisco, and that they were to be paid a certain price for each load of materials so removed by them. The defendant denied in his answer that any contract had been made between him and the plaintiffs. This denial raised the principal issue presented at the trial. The testimony fully sustains the allegations of the complaint. The most that can be claimed fairly by the defendant is that there is a conflict in the evidence. Under the well-established rule, therefore, this court will not interfere with the verdict or the judgment. We see no error in the rulings of the court in admitting testimony. The fact of agency, actual and ostensible, was so clearly established by the evidence, direct and indirect, that the verdict could not well have been other than it was without the testimony objected to. There was no error in the instructions of the court. Under the pleadings, it was proper for the plaintiffs to introduce any evidence tending to show an agency, either express or ostensible. That there was in Cook an express agency of some kind concerning the subject-matter there can be no doubt whatever. The only question was as to its extent. The plaintiffs were not obliged under their complaint to rely upon evidence of actual agency in Cook. Judgment and order affirmed.

Orient Ins. Co. v. Reed et al. (No. 12,196.)

Interpleader.

1. When, after the filing of a complaint in interpleader, one of the defendants alleges that a greater sum is due than plaintiff admits, whereupon plaintiff amends his complaint to make the allegation as to the amount agree with defendants' answer, there is no controversy as to the amount due, and plaintiff is entitled to relief.

2. Though plaintiff had previously denied the right of one of the defendants' to the fund in question in an action brought by said defendant as assignee of the money against him, he can nevertheless maintain an action of interpleader, as it is only when plaintiff denies one of the defendants' claims in the action of interpleader itself that he can have no relief.

3. It is not essential that plaintiff should offer to pay the costs of the previous action.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JOHN F. FINN, Judge.

Action by the Orient Insurance Company against John Reed and Sol. Lewis, to require them to interplead concerning their claims to money in plaintiff's hands. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant Lewis appeals.

George Lezinsky, for appellant. Van Ness & Roche and Pillsbury & Blanding, for respondent.

MCFARLAND, J. The complaint avers that plaintiff insured Buffum & Co. against loss of, or damage to, certain property by fire; that the property was damaged by fire to the extent of $2,500, for which plaintiff is liable; that defendant Reed claims said money by virtue of an attachment served on plaintiff, and that defendant Lewis also claims said money by virtue of an assignment from said Buffum & Co., and that plaintiff has no claim on said money, and desires to pay it to the party defendant who is legally entitled to it, etc. The prayer is that defendants be required to interplead together concerning their claims to said money; that plaintiff be authorized to pay the same into court; and that thereupon it be discharged from liability therefor to either defendant. The defendants, after demurrers overruled, both answered, each setting up his respective claim, as stated in the complaint. Lewis averred that the amount due was not $2,500, but $2,587.88. Plaintiff then amended its complaint, acknowledging the latter amount as the correct sum due. The court found the facts substantially as stated in the complaint, and entered judgment decreeing that plaintiff forthwith pay said money, with interest, into court, (which was done;) that defendants interpleaded as prayed for; and that defendant be discharged from all liability, etc. From this judgment the defendant Lewis appeals.

The points made by appellant for a reversal are two: First, that there was a material dispute between plaintiff and defendants as to the amount due; and, second, that plaintiff denied the claim of defendant Lewis; and that either of those facts is sufficient to defeat the remedy of interpleader.

1. It is no doubt the general rule that an interpleader suit cannot be employed to determine disputed claims between the plaintiff and the defendants. The amount claimed by the defendants, or either of them, must be admitted, and the plaintiff must be a mere uninterested stakeholder. But, in the case at bar, while the answer of Lewis claimed a few dollars more than the amount stated in the original complaint, it was amended so as to acknowledge the amount claimed; thus obviating this objection of appellant.

2. It appears from the answer and findings that appellant Lewis had previously commenced an action against respondent to recover on the policy of insurance, and that respondent had filed an answer in that action in which it averred that it had no knowledge as to the alleged assignment from Buffum & Co. to appellant, and that, therefore, it denied such assignment; and upon this circumstance appellant invokes the rule that a bill for interpleader cannot be maintained which denies the claim of a defendant. But in the case at bar there is no denial in the complaint itself of appellant's claim; and the fact that it had made such denial on a previous occasion does not bring it within the rule.

Appellant also contends that respondent should have offered to pay the costs incurred in the said action brought against it by appellant. But, in the first place, there is no averment in the answer of any payment of such costs, or that any costs were incurred; and, in the second place, if there were any such costs, they are taxable in that action. The judgment is affirmed.

TAFFT v. PRESIDIO & FERRIES R. CO. (No. 11,988.)

TRANSFER OF STOCK.

1. If the attorney in fact of a stockholder presents the certificate of stock, together with a power of attorney from the stockholder giving him full authority to deal with the stock, and the corporation's officers are ignorant of any intention on the part of the attorney to misappropriate the stock, the corporation will not be guilty of conversion simply by issuing another certificate in the name of the attorney, who appropriates the stock wrongfully.

2. The fact that the attorney was also a director of the corporation does not warrant the presumption that the corporation had notice of his intention to convert the stock to his own use, as he assumed to act, not for the corporation, but for his principal.

3. The lack of the owner's indorsement on the certificate was not inconsistent with the right of the attorney to cause the stock to be transferred to himself.

4. The neglect of the officers to require an indorsement of the certificate is only non-feasance, and is no evidence of conversion.

5. It is not the duty of the officers of a corporation to inquire into the motives of an attorney in fact, having full power to transfer stock, for desiring it to be transferred to himself.

Department 2. Commissioners' decision. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; T. H. REARDEN, Judge.

Action by Adelia A. Tafft against the Presidio & Ferries Railroad Company, a corporation, for the conversion of stock, the property of plaintiff. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Jarboe, Harrison & Goodfellow and Lloyd & Wood, for appellant. Wilson & Wilson, for respondent.

VAN CLIEF, C. On the 23d day of October, 1874, the plaintiff executed to Arthur W. Bowman a power of attorney authorizing him to transact her business generally and particularly; "to invest all and singular such sums of money as may be in his hands belonging to me, in such securities and upon such terms as he may think fit and for my interest; to sell, dispose of, transfer, and deliver all or any of my interests in the capital stock of any association, bodies corporate or politic, and to represent me and vote for me at any and all meeting or meetings of stockholders of any and all corporations in which I now or may hereafter hold or own shares of capital stock; and to represent me and my shares of stock aforesaid in all matters and things touching the said shares, and the acts and doings of the said corporations; also to bargain and agree for, buy, sell, mortgage, hypothecate, and in any and every way and manner deal in and with, goods, wares, and merchandise, choses in action, and other property in possession or in action; and to make, do, and transact all and every kind of business, of whatever nature and kind soever; * * * giving and granting unto my said attorney full power and authority to do and perform all and every act and thing whatsoever requisite and necessary to be done in and about the premises, as fully, to all intents and purposes, as I might or could do if personally present." This power of attorney continued in force until October 18, 1884, when it was revoked. On and prior to the 23d day of May, 1882, the plaintiff was the owner of 200 shares of the capital stock of the defendant corporation, which stood in her name on the books of the corporation, and for which a certificate, numbered 31 had been issued to her. The defendant corporation was organized under the laws of this state for profit. Its by-laws, regulating transfers of stock, so far as relevant to this case, are as follows: "Sec. 2. Every transfer of stock, or of the certificates above provided to be issued, shall be entered in the transfer books, to be kept by the secretary, by an entry showing to and by whom transferred, the numbers and designations of the shares, and the date of the transfer, and duly attested by the secretary. No transfer shall be valid except as between the parties, unless made as in this section provided. Sec. 3. The stock shall be transferable as in the last preceding section specified, and upon the books of the corporation, upon proper assignment and delivery to the assignee of the certificates above provided for. * * * Sec. 4. The surrendered certificates shall in all cases be canceled by the secretary before issuing a new one in lieu thereof." On the 19th day of August, 1882, A. W. Bowman presented to the secretary of defendant the certificate of stock No. 31, issued to the plaintiff as aforesaid, but not indorsed by her, or by any other person for her; and at the same time presented to the secretary said power of attorney from the plaintiff, and demanded a transfer to himself, in his own name, of the 200 shares of stock represented by certificate No. 31, then standing in her name on the books of the company. The secretary then received from Bowman the certificate No. 31 without indorsement, canceled it, made the transfer on the books as requested, and, in lieu of certificate No. 31, issued to Bowman in his own name two certificates, for 100 shares each, numbered, respectively, 211 and 212. At the time of this transaction the plaintiff was absent from this state, and actually knew nothing of it, and had authorized it in no other way than by said power of attorney.

On said 19th day of August, 1882, Bowman was largely indebted to divers persons in this state, and was then, and ever since has been, insolvent. Thereafter, for a valuable consideration, Bowman assigned and transferred said certificates, numbered 211 and 212, to the California Safe-Deposit & Trust Company, a corporation, which took the assignment and transfer thereof in good faith, without notice of the rights of the plaintiff. Plaintiff had no notice of this transfer and assignment of certificates Nos. 211 and 212 until after they were made, and did not authorize the same, otherwise than by said power of attorney. Bowman was a director of the defendant corporation from January, 1882, until October, 1884. The defendant corporation never had any actual or presumptive notice that Bowman procured the transfer of said stock to himself for his own use, or that he intended to convert it to his own use, or to use it in any way prejudicial to the rights of the plaintiff, unless such notice may be presumed from the fact that he was one of the directors of the defendant corporation, as above stated. This action was brought by the plaintiff to recover from the defendant damages for an alleged conversion of said 200 shares of stock; and the court found: "Eighth, that said defendant did, prior to the commencement of this action, convert and appropriate the said 200 shares of stock of the defendant, so belonging to plaintiff, and has wholly refused to return the same, or any part thereof, to plaintiff; and that, at the time of such conversion, the same was of the value of $10,000." Judgment was accordingly rendered in favor of plaintiff for $10,000 and costs. Defendant moved for a new trial, on the ground, among others, of insufficiency of the evidence to justify the decision. From the order denying a new trial, and also from the judgment, the defendant appeals.

Whether or not the evidence justifies the finding that the defendant converted the stock, as expressed in the eighth finding above set out, is the principal question to be decided. If that finding is justified by the evidence, the judgment and order should be affirmed; otherwise a new trial should be granted. After a careful examination of the evidence I am of the opinion that it does not warrant the finding that defendant individually, or jointly with Bowman, converted the stock in question. There is no evidence bearing upon this issue except the facts and circumstances above stated, which, I think, neither constitute nor substantially tend to prove a conversion by the defendant.

1. The defendant never took or had possession of the stock, or of the certificate which represented the stock, in any other way or sense than it took and had possession of all stock which it transferred upon the corporation books at request of a party to the transfer.

2. The defendant neither exercised, nor assumed to exercise, any dominion or control over the stock or the certificate; but simply recorded the transfer, canceled the old certificate, (No. 31,) and issued new certificates, as requested by Bowman.

3. The defendant corporation had no notice that Bowman intended to convert the stock, or to use it otherwise than as authorized by the plaintiff. Under the circumstances of this case, the fact that Bowman was one of the directors of the defendant corporation at the time of the transfer of the stock to him does not warrant the presumption that the corporation had notice of his intention to convert the stock to his own use. A director of a corporation is not disqualified to deal in its stock on his private individual account, or as agent for others. And when, in the course of such dealing, he requests a transfer of stock on the corporation books, notice of his motives and intention in regard to such transfer is not to be imputed to the corporation, unless he also acts, or assumes to act, for the corporation in the same transaction. Mor. Priv. Corp. §§ 527, 540*b*, 540*c*; Bank v. Whitehead, 36 Amer. Dec. 186, and authorities there cited in note; Bank v. Gifford, 47 Iowa, 581; Blen v. Mining Co., 20 Cal. 614; Lothian v. Wood, 55 Cal. 161. Bowman did not act for, or assume to represent, the corporation in the matter of transferring plaintiff's stock, wherein it appears that the corporation was represented by its appropriate officers for that purpose,—its secretary and president,—to whom Bowman exhibited plenary authority to represent the plaintiff.

4. That the certificate (No. 31) was not indorsed by plaintiff was not inconsistent with the right of Bowman to have the stock transferred to himself. His possession of the certificate, with a power of attorney from plaintiff authorizing him to transfer the stock, was prima facie evidence that he was at least the equitable owner. Ang. & A. Corp. § 564; Low. Tr. Stocks, §§ 43, 44; Colt v. Ives, 31 Conn. 25; Trust Co. v. Able, 48 Mo. 136; Bank v. McElrath, 13 N. J. Eq. 26; Scripture v. Soapstone Co., 50 N. H. 571; Baldwin v. Canfield, 26 Minn., 43, 1 N. W. Rep. 261, 276; Bank v. Cox, 11 Rich. Eq. 347.

5. The neglect of the secretary and president to require an indorsement of the certificate before transferring the stock does not tend to prove that defendant converted the stock, or aided Bowman's conversion of it. Section 1 of the by-laws provides that "such certificates shall be transferable by indorsement and assignment," and that "no transfer shall be valid, except as between the parties, unless made as in this section provided." We have seen that delivery of the certificate, with written authority to transfer the stock, is evidence of an equitable assignment; no written assignment by indorsement or otherwise being necessary. Besides, it was enough to justify the transfer that the assignment appeared to be valid between the parties thereto. This satisfies the by-law requirement of an assignment, in the absence of notice to the corporation that an assignment was not intended. The by-law requirement that the certificate should be indorsed was for the benefit of the corporation, and was waived by the neglect of the corportaion to demand or request it. Black v. Zacharie, 3 How. 513; Bank v. Bank, 105 U. S. 217; Isham v. Buckingham, 49 N. Y. 222. If, however, the plaintiff had any right of protection by this by-law, I see no reason why her action, through Bowman, whom she had authorized to transfer the stock, did not amount to a waiver of the indorsement by her. Had she appeared in person, and procured the transfer without indorsing the certificate, it would seem clear that she thereby waived the indorsement. Was not Bowman authorized to do all that she could have done in that behalf if personally present? But, however this may be, the mere neglect of the defendant to demand or procure the indorsement of the certificate was only non-feasance, which of itself has never been admitted as evidence of conversion. 2 Greenl. Ev. § 642, and note. In this connection it should be observed that the gravamen of this action is conversion, and that negligence is neither alleged nor found. Doyle v. Callaghan, 67 Cal. 154, 7 Pac. Rep. 418.

6. It is true that defendant had notice of Bowman's relation to plaintiff as her agent, and also of his authority as such agent, so far as it appeared by the power of attorney. But such notice did not devolve upon the defendant the duty to seek, or inquire beyond what thus appeared, for the motives or intentions of Bowman, for the purpose of protecting the plaintiff from possible fraud or bad faith of her chosen and trusted agent, since it does not appear that defendant had any means of discovering Bowman's motives or intentions, other than to have inquired of him directly whether or not he intended, by the transfer, to defraud the plaintiff; which would have been, not only impertinent, but probably futile. The defendant was not a party to the transfer. Its function was simply ministerial, and its actions solely dependent upon the ostensible authority of Bowman to demand the transfer. Cook, Stocks, § 386; Helm v. Swiggett, 12 Ind. 195; Crocker v. Railroad Co., 137 Mass. 417; Brewster v. Sime, 42 Cal. 143. In Crocker v. Railroad Co., 137 Mass. 417, an executor had induced a corporation to transfer stock which belonged to the estate, and stood in the name of his testator, in fraud of the estate, by which the estate lost it; the corporation having notice of the representative character of the executor. The object of the action was to make the corporation responsible for negligence in transferring the stock under these circumstances. The court, by MORTON, C. J., said: "If it [the corporation] issues a new certificate upon a forged or an unauthorized transfer, the real owner retains his property in the stock, and the corporation may also be liable to a bona fide holder of the new certificate. But, when a transfer by one who has the full power to transfer is presented, the corporation has the right to act upon it, and it is not its duty to inquire into the purposes of the parties, or to investigate the question whether the transaction is in good faith or is fraudulent." In Field v. Schieffelin, 7 Johns. Ch. 150, the head-note correctly expressed the substance of the decision of the chancellor, as follows: "A guardian having the legal power to sell or dispose of the personal estate of his ward in any manner he may think most conducive to the purposes of his trust, a purchaser who deals fairly has a right to presume that he acts for the benefit of his ward, and is not bound to inquire into the state of the trust; nor is he responsible for the faithful application of the money, unless he knew, or had sufficient information, at the time, that the guardian contemplated a breach of trust, and intended to misapply the money, or was in fact, by the very transaction, applying it to his own private purpose." See, also, Albert v. Bank, 2 Md. 169; Hutchins v. Bank, 12 Metc. 421; Ashton v. Bank, 3 Allen, 222. In Bank v. Cox, 11 Rich. Eq. 344, it appears that Madam S., being the owner of 50 shares of stock in South Carolina State Bank registered in her name, and of which she held the certificate, delivered the certificate, without indorsement, to B., and at the same time executed to B. a power of attorney, authorizing him to transfer the stock. B. assigned the stock to Cox, and used the proceeds for his own purposes. Cox applied to the bank to have the stock transferred to him on the books of the bank, which was opposed by S. on the grounds that she had not indorsed the certificate; that B. had committed a breach of trust in assigning it, and converting the proceeds to his own use; and that B. was totally insolvent. The bank interpleaded the parties. Upon these facts, substantially, the chancellor decreed that the bank transfer the stock to Cox, and in doing so said: "Whatever may have been the motive for the delivery of the certificate of stock and the power of attorney to B., she (S.) invested him (B.) thereby with all the indicia of property and ownership as to said shares of stock, and, if he abused her confidence, she must bear the consequences. [Page 349.] * * * The evidence is plenary that, according to commercial usage, this possession of the certificate and a power of attorney in this form imported ownership. [Page 350.]" The court of appeals, in affirming this decree, said. "B. had been put in possession of this scrip, with an indefinite power of disposition, by S., and, if he was not the owner, (of which ownership there is much evidence,) she exhibited him in a light which enabled him to lay claim to the stock. Under such circumstances, equity would not permit her to avail herself of the dry skeleton of title, which yet stands formally in her name, to defeat him whom she has contributed to deceive. The transfer should have been formally made; and this court will not take notice of that as undone which ought to have been done." Id. page 391.

If, according to the authorities above cited, the defendant may have looked upon Bowman as the equitable owner of the stock, by reason of his possession of the certificate, and his power to transfer the stock, it would only follow that defendant had notice that, while Bowman was the authorized agent of the plaintiff to sell and transfer her stock, he had purchased the stock in question from his principal, as he unquestionably had a right to do, provided that he dealt with her fairly and honestly, (Civil Code, § 2230; Rubidoex v. Parks, 48 Cal. 215; Blockley v. Fowler, 21 Cal. 329; Golson v. Dunlap, 73 Cal. 157, 14 Pac. Rep. 576;) and it was not the duty of defendant to inquire whether or not he had defrauded, or intended to defraud, his principal, that being a matter in which the principal and agent alone were interested. It did not concern third persons having no interest in the matter of the assignment or transfer of the stock; and such was the relation of the defendant to the transaction. On the presumption that the defendant knew the law applicable to the transaction, it can only be charged with notice that plaintiff could avoid the assignment as against Bowman, unless he could prove that it was perfectly fair and honest; but such notice did not impose upon the defendant a duty to intervene between the parties, and object to the transfer, which, for aught that appears, may have been perfectly fair and honest. If this view of the transaction is correct, it follows that the defendant had no notice that Bowman, as agent for the plaintiff, assigned her stock to himself without her consent; and it is therefore unnecessary to decide what effect such notice, if given, would have had. "It is, however, of no consequence," says an author, "that the title of the purchaser is voidable, if it has not been, in fact, avoided; because, by the definition of the term 'voidable,' the title of the purchaser, in such a case, is valid until it is avoided." Low. Tr. Stocks, § 138.

I do not understand that it is contended by the learned counsel for respondent that the defendant converted plaintiff's stock otherwise than by aiding or assisting Bowman to convert it to his use alone; for it is not pretended that the defendant had or sought any use, profit, or advantage by the conversion; nor, as before remarked, does the evidence tend to prove that defendant had actual or constructive notice of Bowman's conversion, or of his intention to convert; and the only act by which it can be claimed that defendant, even unconsciously, aided or assisted Bowman to convert the stock, was the act of transferring it on the books of the company at Bowman's request; which request was ostensibly authorized by the plaintiff. I have found no authority for a constructive conversion upon facts similar to the facts of this case. Perhaps Dodge v. Meyer, 61 Cal. 405, may be regarded as furnishing a pattern of a cause of action for constructive conversion, with little, if anything, to spare. In that case, however, the defendant, Meyer, had actual notice of the intention to convert, and intentionally aided and assisted in the conversion for his own benefit. I think the plaintiff was the victim of her own trusted agent alone, and that the judgment and order should be reversed, and a new trial granted.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; FOOTE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order are reversed, and a new trial granted.

PEOPLE v. MCKENNA. (No. 20,537.)

FALSE PRETENSES—INFORMATION.

An information charging that defendant "knowingly and designedly, by false and fraudulent representations and pretenses, defrauded" one T. of certain property, describing it, but which alleges none of the facts constituting the fraud, is insufficient, as Pen. Code. Cal. § 952, subd. 3, provides that an indictment must be direct and certain as to "the particular circumstances of the offense charged, when they are necessary to constitute a complete offense."

2. Where the facts stated in an information do not constitute a public offense, objection to its sufficiency may be made at any time.

Wm. Shipsey, for appellant. George A. Johnson, Atty. Gen., for the People.

PATERSON, J. The defendant was tried and convicted on an information which charged that "on or about the 15th day of July, 1888, at the county of San Luis Obispo, state of California, [the defendant,] did unlawfully, knowingly, and designedly, by false and fraudulent representations and pretenses, defraud one David Taylor of personal property to-wit, twenty hogs, of the value of two hundred and three and forty one-hundredths dollars in lawful money of the United States, the personal property of the said David Taylor, contrary to the form, force," etc.

The most important question in the case is whether the facts stated are sufficient to support a conviction. There was no demurrer to the complaint, but there was a motion in arrest of judgment, and a motion for a new trial. It is claimed on behalf of the respondent that the information is sufficient, in the absence of a demurrer; that, if the defendant had desired the information to be made more specific, he should have demurred on the ground that it did not substantially conform to the requirements of sections 950-952 of the Penal Code. If, however, the facts stated in the information do not constitute a public offense, the objection to its sufficiency may be made at any time. In civil cases the rule is, as stated by Mr. Justice TEMPLE, that the plaintiff is not required "to allege with minuteness all the particulars and circumstances which constitute the evidence of the alleged fraud, but he must make the charge with sufficient distinctness to enable his adversary to come prepared with his evidence upon the general questions of fraud, which will be raised." Capuro v. Insurance Co., 39 Cal. 125. It matters not that no objection is made by demurrer. Objection may be made at any time, because it goes to the substance of the complaint or indictment. The question whether a thing has been done fraudulently is a matter of law, and an allegation of fraud in general terms presents no issuable facts. Meeker v. Harris, 19 Cal. 289, 290; Triscony v. Orr, 49 Cal. 617; Bank v. Hynes, 50 Cal. 202. Where no facts are averred, no facts are admitted. Payne v. Elliot, 54 Cal. 343; Johnson v. Kirby, 65 Cal. 487, 4 Pac. Rep. 458. It is said by Mr. Bishop that "to charge simply in the statutory words that the thing was obtained by 'false pretenses' is not adequate. What the particular pretenses were must be stated, both as notice to the defendant of what he has to answer to, and as enabling the court to discern their indictable quality. A pretense, as set out, must be adequate in law. For example, it must be of an existing fact; not a promise. And it must be stated in a form direct; not argumentative. Therefore an allegation which did not distinguish clearly whether it was promise or fact was adjudged ill." 2 Bish. Crim. Proc. §§ 165, 166. Mr. Wharton says an information charging simply that the defendant obtained goods by false pretenses "would be scouted out of court." 1 Whart. Crim. Law, § 192. As said in U. S. v. Watkins, 3 Cranch, C. C. 441: "Fraud is an inference of law from certain facts, and the indictment must aver all the facts which constitute the fraud. * * * To aver that an act was fraudulently done is therefore * * * to aver a matter of law, and not a matter of fact."

It is a sound principle that an indictment charging fraud of any kind should aver with particularity the facts relied upon to show fraud. Many of the niceties and technicalities which existed under former methods of pleading are not allowed to prevail under the provisions of our Code; but the rule still exists that an indictment must be certain and clear as to "the particular circumstances of the offense charged, when they are necessary to constitute a complete offense." Pen. Code, § 952, subd. 3. It is true that, as a general rule, an indictment is sufficient if it describes the offense in the words of the statute; but, as said by Mr. Justice HARLAN in U. S. v. Simmons, 96 U. S. 360: "To this general rule there is the qualification, fundamental in the law of criminal procedure, that the accused must be apprised by the indictment with reasonable certainty of the nature of the accusation against him, to the end that he may prepare his defense, and plead the judgment as a bar to any subsequent prosecution for the same offense." The conviction under the information before us, and the judgment entered thereon, could not be safely or successfully pleaded in bar of a second prosecution for the same offense. It is alleged simply that the defendant unlawfully, knowingly, and designedly, by false and fraudulent representations and pretenses, defrauded Taylor of his personal property. The particular fraud is in no way identified. In our opinion, the allegations of the information are not sufficient to apprise the defendant with that certainty which the law requires of the nature of the accusation against him, to enable him to prepare a defense, or to plead the judgment as a bar to any subsequent prosecution for the same offense, and therefore that the motion in arrest of judgment should have been granted, and that the information ought to have been dismissed. U. S. v. Goggin, 9 Biss. 269, 1 Fed. Rep. 49.

A distinction is made between pleadings inartificially drawn, where there is an attempt to plead the facts, and those entirely wanting in facts. In People v. Donaldson, 70 Cal. 116, 11 Pac. Rep. 681, relied upon by respondent, the indictment charged that the defendant obtained the property under false pretenses, "in that he did willfully, unlawfully, knowingly, and designedly obtain from one J. P. Spence certain hogs belonging to him, and in his possession, by falsely pretending to Spence that he (the defendant) had in the Commercial & Savings Bank of San Jose the sum of $196.70, and did, with intent to cheat and defraud said Spence, make, execute, sign, and deliver to him a check upon that bank for such amount. The indictment further alleged that Spence was induced to part with his property by reason of such representation, and that the defendant knew at the time that he had no money or credit in the bank, and had no reason to believe that the check would be honored or paid." The difference between that case and the one before us is made plain by comparing the allegations of the indictment with those of the information herein.

The instructions, taken together, correctly state the law. The instruction given by the court of its own motion, however, would be better and clearer if the word "fraudulently" were inserted before the word "represented." The judgment is reversed, with directions to the court below to dismiss the information. All concur.

MECHANICS' LIENS—MATERIAL-MEN.

1. Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1183, providing liens for contractors, laborers, and material-men, requires the construction contract to be in writing, and declares that where the amount exceeds $1,000, unless it is filed in the recorder's office of the county where the property is situated, it shall be void; "and in such case the labor done and materials furnished by all persons aforesaid shall be deemed to have been done and furnished at the personal instance of the owner, and they shall have a lien for the value thereof." Held that, as the contract is void when not recorded, the material-men are not limited in their right to a lien to the amount due the contractor on the contract, though they had actual notice that there was such a contract.

2. As there was no valid contract, the statutory notice of the material-men's claim was not necessary to reach the money due the contractor, the statute itself being notice to the owner.

3. The legislature had the power to provide that if the contract was not executed and filed in a certain manner the owner should become liable to the material-men and laborers for the value of of their materials and labor.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; WALTER VAN DYKE, Judge.

Haynes & Mitchell, for appellants. Davis & Taylor and W. H. Thomas, for Levi M. Kellogg and Maitre & Hansen. Adams & Rhodes and Johnston & Borden, for California Door Co. Johnston & Borden, for Willamette Steam-Mills Lumbering & Manuf'g Co. Reymert, Orfila & Reymert, for B. A. Breakey. Barclay, Wilson & Carpenter, for E. L. Tower. Scarborough & Waterman and Barclay, Wilson & Carpenter, for A. H. Parsons.

WORKS, J. This action was brought by the respondents, as material-men, laborers, and subcontractors, against the appellants, to enforce a lien for material furnished and for labor done in the construction of a dwelling-house. The appellant Howes was the owner of the real estate, and contracted with his co-defendant to construct the building, and the latter contracted with the respondents for the labor and material done and furnished by them. The contract price for constructing the building was more than $1,000, and the contract was not filed for record as required by section 1183 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The respondents had actual notice that there was a contract between the owner and his contractor, and gave no notice to the owner to withhold payments to such contractor. The owner paid the contractor the greater part of the contract price. The amounts for which the respondents claimed liens exceeded the amount due the contractor, and unpaid, assuming the contract to have been valid, but were less than the full contract price. The court below held the contract to be void, for the reason that it was not filed for record, and that the respondents were entitled to recover the value of the material furnished and labor done by them, without any reference to the amount remaining unpaid to the original contractor by the owner. The only question presented and argued on this appeal is whether or not a material-man or subcontractor can recover, beyond the amount unpaid by the owner to the original contractor, on the contract, where the same has not been recorded, and where no personal notice has been given by such material-man or subcontractor to the owner to withhold the payments due such contractor, the material-man and subcontractor having actual notice that there was such a contract.

Counsel for appellants contend, with much earnestness and ingenuity, and with marked ability, that the right of the material-man and subcontractor to enforce his lien is limited, where he has given no personal notice to the owner to the amount remaining unpaid by the owner to the original contractor. They contend, in substance, that, although the contract is void as between the parties to it, it is not void as to the owner and the material-men and subcontractors; that there is a distinction between an original contractor and a material-man or subcontractor, in that the former has a direct lien upon the real estate of the owner to the full extent of the amount due him, based upon the personal liability of the owner to him, while the latter have but a lien in the nature of an attachment against the money in the hands of the owners, and due the contractor, and that the legislature had no power to make the owner or his property liable to any greater extent. There is, perhaps, not a single one of these propositions that is not, to some extent, supported by some decision or dictum of this court. The question is, therefore, whether these decisions or dicta are applicable to the present provisions of the mechanic's lien law, and, if so, whether they are such as should control us in the interpretation of such provisions. The present Code, so far as it affects this question, provides: "In case of a contract for the work between the owner and his contractor, the lien shall extend to the entire contract price, and such contract shall operate as a lien in favor of all persons, except the contractor, to the extent of the whole contract price; and, after all such liens are satisfied, then as a lien for any balance of the contract price in favor of the contractor. All such contracts shall be in writing when the amount agreed to be paid thereunder exceeds one thousand dollars, and shall be subscribed by the parties thereto, and shall, before the work is commenced, be filed in the office of the county recorder of the county, or city and county, where the property is situated, who shall receive one dollar for such filing; otherwise they shall be wholly void, and no recovery shall be had thereon by either party thereto; and in such case the labor done and materials furnished by all persons aforesaid, except the contractor, shall be deemed to have been done and furnished at the personal instance of the owner, and they shall have a lien for the value thereof." Code Civil Proc. § 1183. Again: "No payment made prior to the time when the same is due, under the terms and conditions of the contract, shall be valid for the purpose of defeating, diminishing, or discharging any lien in favor of any person except the contractor; but, as to such liens, such payment shall be deemed as if not made, and shall be applicable to such liens, notwithstanding the contractor to whom it was paid may thereafter abandon his contract, or be or become indebted to the owner in any amount, for damages or otherwise, for nonperformance of his contract or otherwise. * * * All such contract and alterations thereof as do not conform substantially to the provisions of this section shall be wholly void, and no recovery shall be had thereon by either party thereto; and in such case the labor done and materials furnished by all persons, except the contractor, shall be deemed to have been done and furnished at the personal instance of the owner, and they shall have a lien for the value thereof. Any of the persons mentioned in section 1183, except the contractor, may, at any time, give to the owner a written notice that they have performed labor or furnished materials, or both, to the contractor, or other person acting by authority of the owner, or that they have agreed to do so, stating in general terms the kind of labor and materials, and the name of the person to or for whom the same was done or furnished, or both, and the amount in value, as near as may be, of that already done or furnished, or both, and of the whole agreed to be done or furnished, or both. * * * Upon such notice being given, it shall be the duty of the owner to, and he shall, withhold from his contractor, or from any other person acting under such owner, and to whom by said notice the said labor or materials, or both, have been furnished or agreed to be furnished, all money due or that may become due to such contractor, or other person, or sufficient of such money to answer such claim, and any lien that may be filed therefor for record, under this chapter, including costs and counsel fees provided for in this chapter, until such notice is by writing withdrawn; and all money paid thereafter by the owner to the contractor, or such other person, while such notice is in force, shall, for the purposes of all liens of all persons, except that of the contractor, be deemed a payment prior to the time the same was due, within the meaning of and subject to the provisions of this section." Id. § 1184.

It has been held in a number of cases under earlier statutes that a subcontractor or material-man could enforce his lien only to the extent of the contract price remaining unpaid, and that, too, under statutes providing that subcontractors should have a lien "regardless of the claim of the contractor against the owner," or that the lien should inure "to the extent of the contract price," and "whether done or furnished at the instance of the owner or his agent;" and "that the contractor should be deemed such agent, and that the lien should not be affected by the fact that no money was due the contractor." Counsel for appellant have industriously gathered up and cited these earlier statutes, and the cases decided under them. We cite them here more as showing the course of legislation and its judicial construction and interpretation on this subject than because of their bearing on the question now presented. St. 1850, p. 211; St. 1855, p. 156; St. 1856, p. 203; St. 1858, p. 225; St. 1862, p. 384; St. 1868, p. 589; Code Civil Proc. (1880) § 1183; Deering's Code Civil Proc. § 1183; St. 1887, p. 152; Cahoon v. Levy, 6 Cal. 295; Knowles v. Joost, 13 Cal. 620; McAlpin v. Duncan, 16 Cal. 126; Bowen v. Aubrey, 22 Cal. 566; Dore v. Sellers, 27 Cal. 588; Renton v. Conley, 49 Cal. 185; Latson v. Nelson, 11 Pac. C. Law J. 589; Whittier v. Hollister, 64 Cal. 283; O'Donnell v. Kramer, 65 Cal. 353, 4 Pac. Rep. 204; Wilson v. Barnard, 67 Cal. 422, 7 Pac. Rep. 845; Wiggins v. Bridge, 70 Cal. 437, 11 Pac. Rep. 754. It will be observed that all of these cases, so far as they hold that the lien of a subcontractor shall only extend to the money unpaid on the original contract, are cases in which the contract between the owner and subcontractor was valid, and each and all of them are based upon the theory, which we fully approve, that, where there is a valid contract between the owner and contractor, such contract is the measure of the owner's liability, and that, in the absence of notice from the subcontractor of his claim, a payment by the owner in conformity to the contract will relieve him to that extent from any claim or lien by the subcontractor. This is so under the present statute, and thus far the cases cited are applicable to the present statute, and no further.

Counsel insist that there is but one additional requirement under the present statute, viz., that the contract shall be filed in the recorder's office, and that such a requirement does not affect the principle laid down in the cases decided under former statutes, especially in this case, where it appears that the subcontractors had actual notice of the existence of the contract, which was in all respects in conformity to the statute. In this contention counsel overlook what we regard as the most material addition to the statute by the last amendment, viz., that if the contract is not executed as required by the statute, and filed in the recorder's office, it shall be void, and no recovery shall be had thereon by either party. In our judgment this provision of the statute takes away entirely the basis upon which it was held under earlier statutes that the subcontractor could not recover, viz., that the owner could not be compelled to pay more than he had contracted to pay, or, in other words, could not be compelled to pay twice for the same thing. This cannot be so under the present statute, where his contract is not recorded. The contract cannot be the measure of his liability, because there is no contract. He cannot pay the contractor, and thereby relieve himself from liability to the subcontractor, because, the contract being void as between him and the contractor, he is not liable to the latter, and has no right, as between him and the subcontractor, to pay such contractor. The statute is too plain on this point to need construction. It not only provides that the contract shall be wholly void, and that neither party shall recover thereon, which must have been provided wholly for the protection of subcontractors, laborers, etc., but in order to make this fact doubly plain it further provides that "the labor done and material furnished by all persons aforesaid, except the contractor, shall be deemed to have been done and furnished at the personal instance of the owner, and they shall have a lien for the value thereof." In other words, the subcontractors, laborers, and material-men shall have their lien precisely as if no contract had ever been made between the owner and contractor, and the material had been furnished and work done for the owner at his special instance and request.

But counsel say the legislature had no power to provide for any such liability on the part of the owner, and this court has so decided. We do not so understand it. It has been held, as we have said, and very properly, that where there is a valid contract the owner cannot be compelled to pay more than he has contracted to pay, unless he is notified of the claims of subcontractors before payment to the contractor. But that is not this case. Here there was no contract. If the legislature had the power to say to the owner, "If you pay the contractor, after notice from the subcontractor of his claim, you shall still be liable to the latter," it has the undoubted right to say to him, "If you do not execute your contract in a certain form, and file it in the recorder's office, you shall be liable to material-men and laborers for the value of their material and labor." There is no hardship or injustice in this provision. The owner is only compelled to pay once for what he receives and retains the benefit of. He is not bound, and has no right, as between him and subcontractors, to pay the contractor. If the contract is valid, then, under the present statute, notice must be given of his claim by a material-man or laborer, in order to reach the moneys due the contractor, and, if he fails to give such notice, the owner is protected by the statute, as held in the cases above cited, decided under former statutes. But, where there is no valid contract, this notice is unnecessary, because there are no payments to be stopped, and the statute itself is notice to the owner that he must not pay to the contractor.

It is urged upon us by counsel for appellant that the contract in this case was void only as between the parties to it, and not as between the owner and material-men and laborers, and that we have so decided in Powder Co. v. Flume Co., 20 Pac. Rep. 419. We did not so hold in the case referred to. It was held in that case that the contract between the subcontractor and contractor for material was valid, notwithstanding the original contract was void as between the parties to it. But the opinion in that case was so worded as to mislead in this respect, and it is broadly stated that the contract, though wholly void, was not void except as to the parties to it. This could not be so. A contract wholly void is void as to everybody whose rights would be affected by it if valid. And here it would be a strange construction of the statute to hold that the failure to file an instrument for record would render it void as to the parties to it, who necessarily have notice of its contents, and not affect the rights of the only persons sought to be protected by such filing, and who alone could be affected by such failure. The court meant nothing more in that case than to hold that the material-man was entitled to his lien notwithstanding the contract was not filed in the recorder's office. What was said as to the contract remaining to mark the extent of the recovery of the lienholders, etc., was outside of the real question presented in the case, and should be modified. The extent of the material-man's recovery is not measured by the terms of the contract. On the contrary, the statute provides in express terms that, where the contract is not recorded, the material-man shall have a lien for the value thereof. In case the contract is not recorded, the statute, and not the contract, measures the extent of his recovery; and so it was held in Lumber Co. v. Schmitt, 74 Cal. 625, 16 Pac. Rep. 516. The case of Latson v. Nelson, 11 Pac. C. Law J. 589, is greatly relied upon by the appellant. The reasoning of the opinion in that case was not concurred in by a majority of the court, and, so far as it may be construed as against the right and power of the legislature to enact the present statute, as we have construed it in this opinion, it does not meet with our approval. It is extremely difficult to determine what the views of the learned justice who wrote the opinion were, as announced in the opinion; but, as we construe his language, it amounted to nothing more than has been decided in earlier cases, that, where a valid contract existed between the owner and contractor, the former could not be made liable to subcontractors beyond the amount fixed therein, and that section 15, art. 20, of the present constitution had not changed that rule. So understood, the opinion is not in conflict with anything we have said in this opinion.

As to the contention that the fact that the respondents had actual notice of the existence of a contract was equivalent to the filing of the same in the recorder's office, this would be so if the question were one of notice. But it is not. The express provision of the statute is that, if the contract is not filed, it shall be void. This being so, there is in fact no contract of which the subcontractor is bound to take notice, and his knowledge that a contract was attempted to be made, but was not, cannot affect his rights.

The point made that there can be no recovery by a subcontractor as against the owner, independent of some contract between the owner and original contractor, is met by the express language of the statute that, for the purposes of his lien, he shall be deemed to have contracted directly with the owner, and shall have a lien for the value of his material. This brings him in direct contact with the owner as a contractor, and removes the distinction made under former statutes between those who contract directly with the owner and subcontractors. By the terms of the statute they become, for the purpose of their lien, original contractors with the owner, but cannot recover against him personally. Lumber Co. v. Schmitt, supra.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

I concur: Paterson, J.

Fox, J., (concurring.) I concur in the conclusion reached by Mr. Justice Works in the foregoing opinion, and generally in the line of reasoning by which that conclusion is reached. I have no doubt that the legislature has full power to provide that where, as was done in this case, an owner of real estate, without the intervention of a contract fixing the measure of his liability, proceeds personally, or through another acting with his knowledge, to make improvements thereon, he shall be liable to mechanics, laborers, and material-men for the value of their labor and material, and they shall have a lien therefor. In this case there was no contract, for the law itself declares that if not recorded the pretended contract is "wholly void." It is, therefore, as if it had never been made, and fixes no measure of liability for either party, or for any purpose. But after negotiating the terms of the contract with Lane, which was never completed, and never became a valid contract, Howes permitted him to procure material and erect the building· in other words, permitted Lane to act as his agent in the construction of the building upon which these liens were filed. The statute expressly declares that in such cases the subcontractor, the laborer, and material-man shall be deemed to have contracted directly with the owner, and shall have a lien for the value of his material or labor. There is no constitutional objection to such a provision. The obligation most frequently assumed by all men engaged in business, and most frequently enforced by the courts, is an implied one to do the same thing,—to pay the value of labor done or materials furnished at the request of the party receiving the benefit thereof; and it makes no difference whether the request was made by him in person, or through one whom he had held out to the world, or to the person furnishing the labor and material, as his agent in the premises. But it seems to me that the opinion of Mr. Justice Works is susceptible of a construction which would enable a stranger to go upon the land of an absent or non-resident owner, and, through laborers and material-men, improve him out of his real estate without his knowledge. The legislature has no power to authorize such a proceeding, and no precedent should be established which would sanction it. No person should be entitled to a lien or personal judgment against an owner in any case, unless he contracted the liability in person, or it be shown that he had actual notice in some form of the fact that his property was being improved in a manner which might create a liability or lien. A construction of the statute which would give it the effect of creating a lien, where the owner had no knowledge of the improvement, would render it unconstitutional. In this case there is no pretense of want of knowledge, and everything shows that the owner had actual knowledge of the improvement, and the law charges him with knowledge of the fact that there was no contract limiting his liability.

BEAN v. LORYEA. (No. 12,335.)

EVIDENCE—COPY OF FOREIGN RECORDS—INSOLVENCY.

1. The certificate attached to a copy of the record of a judgment rendered by the supreme court of New York, attached by the "presiding justice" of that court, is within Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1905, providing that a judicial record of a sister state may be proved by the attestation of the clerk, and the seal of the court annexed, if there be a clerk and seal, together with a certificate of the chief judge or presiding magistrate that the attestation is in due form.

2. A discharge in insolvency, granted by a state court, will not bar an action on a judgment rendered in another state, where the judgment creditor is a resident of such other state, and was not a party to the insolvency proceedings.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; T. K. WILSON, Judge.

Action by Cotton W. Bean against Abraham M. Loryea on a judgment. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals.

C. Wittram, for appellant. E. E. Haft, for respondent.

FOOTE, C. This action was upon a judgment rendered in the supreme court of the state of New York in and for the city and county of New York. Judgment was rendered as prayed for, and from it, and an order denying a new trial, the defendant appeals. He makes the point, in favor of his demand, that the certificate of the clerk of the court, authenticating the copy of the record of the judgment obtained in New York, is not sufficient, because it does not show that the clerk was the legal keeper, nor where the legal custody of such records belonged; and the certificate of the judge, as "presiding justice," is insufficient. Section 1905 of the Code of Civil Procedure, under which a judicial record such as that now in hand can be proved, provides that "a judicial record of this state or of the United States may be proved by the production of the original, or of a copy thereof, certified by the clerk or other person having the legal custody thereof. That of a sister state may be proved by the attestation of the clerk, and the seal of the court annexed, if there be a clerk and seal, together with a certificate of the chief judge or presiding magistrate that the attestation is in due form." Here, the clerk attested the copy of the judicial record, and annexed the seal of the court. Attached to the certificate is that of the "presiding justice" of the court, which is the equivalent of "chief judge" or "presiding magistrate" thereof, that the attestation is in due form. This is a full compliance with the law.

The proof of the judgment being sufficient, it remains to be considered whether the certificate of discharge in insolvency, obtained from the proper court in the state of California, was a bar to the recovery of the plaintiff, who is a resident of the state of New York. The supreme court of the United States held, in Baldwin v. Hale, 1 Wall. 234, that "insolvent laws of one state cannot discharge the contracts of citizens of other states, because they have no extraterritorial operation; and, consequently, the tribunal sitting under them, unless in cases where a citizen of such other state voluntarily becomes a party to the proceeding, has no jurisdiction in the case. Legal notice cannot be given, and consequently there can be no obligation to appear, and of course there can be no legal default." In the present case the plaintiff did not become a voluntary party to the insolvency proceedings. The appellate court of Vermont, in Bedell v. Scruton, 54 Vt. 493, has followed the rule laid down by the supreme court of the United States; and the appellate court of California takes the same view of the matter in Rhodes v. Bordon, 67 Cal. 7, 6 Pac. Rep. 850. The appellant seeks to avoid the force of these decisions by claiming that an action upon a judgment is not a suit based upon a contract, and that therefore these cases are not in point. In this position he is not supported, as it has been declared by the court of last resort in this state that suits upon judgments are actions upon contracts. Stuart v. Lander, 16 Cal. 375; Reed v. Eldredge, 27 Cal. 348; Wallace v. Eldredge, Id. 499. We do not understand the case of Larrabee v. Baldwin, 35 Cal. 168, to be in conflict with the decisions just referred to. It is there said: "The claim of the respondent that the judgment is itself a contract, creating a new debt within the meaning of the statute, [that is, an act authorizing the formation of mining corporations,] for which all who were stockholders at the date of the rendition of the judgment are personally liable, is too absurd to require argument to refute it. That a judgment is a contract of record, in a certain legal sense, may be conceded; but it creates no such new liability as the statute in question contemplates." It has also been held by the same tribunal that a judgment is a debt. McBride v. Fallon, 65 Cal. 303, 4 Pac. Rep. 17. Being a debt, the rights accruing to the plaintiff under it could not be taken away by a court which did not have jurisdiction over him. We therefore advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

I concur: BELCHER, C. C.

MUNICIPAL IMPROVEMENTS.

After the time for the completion of a contract for grading a street, under St. Cal. 1871-72, has expired, an attempt to extend the time is futile, and an assessment founded on such contract is void.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; H. LEVY, Judge.

W. T. Baggett, for appellant. W. H. L. Barnes, for respondent.

MCFARLAND, J. This is an action to enforce a street assessment for grading a part of Mason street, between California and Sacramento streets, in San Francisco.

Judgment went for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. The court finds that the contract was made on January 15, 1873; that the work was to be performed within 150 days from the making of the contract; and that the work was not performed within that time, or within any time extended for its performance. There were attempts to extend the time years after its expiration; but, as before held by this court, such attempts were futile. The contract was made under the statute of 1871–72; and the case is on all fours with the case of Dougherty v. Coffin, 69 Cal. 454, 10 Pac. Rep. 672. There is nothing in the point that the court failed to find on some minor issues. Having found against appellant as above stated, the other matters were entirely immaterial. It would make no difference which way they were found. Judgment and order denying a new trial affirmed.

Holloway v. McNear. (No. 12,269.)

Evidence—Parol to Vary Writing.

In an action against a charterer for breach of a charter party, which recites that "a commission of five per cent. on this charter shall be paid by the vessel, after completing the loading," to charterer, evidence of a custom of trade, by which the charterer was not entitled to the entire amount of the commissions specified in the charter-party, will not be admitted to vary the terms of the written contract as to the amount of commissions to which the charterer is entitled under it.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by William E. Holloway against G. W. McNear for damages for non-performance of a charter-party. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals.

T. I. Bergin, for appellant. Jarboe, Harrison & Goodfellow, for respondent.

Foote, C. This action was instituted by Holloway, who was the assignee of the rights and claims of Hughes & Co., a partnership; such rights and claims accruing under a certain charter-party executed for McNear by his agents, Iredale & Son, and by Hughes & Co. for themselves. Under that instrument the defendant chartered a certain ship, the Lord Cairns, to transport a cargo to Europe from San Francisco. When the ship was ready to receive her cargo, she was offered to the defendant, who refused to take her; and she was then chartered to other parties at a lower rate for freightage than the defendant contracted for. This action was brought to recover damages for the non-performance of the contract under the charter-party. The defendant, who is the appellant here, claimed, by way of defense, that his agents had no authority from him to make the contract as they did. He alleges that his telegram to them in cipher, conveying the terms upon which he was willing to enter into the agreement or charter-party, was not followed by his agents; that they stipulated for a less amount of commissions to him than he authorized. The language of the telegram was this, (received August 8, 1884:) "Lord Cairns you may charter if address, commissions 2½ per cent., and charter commissions here 5 per cent." The answer to that by his agents was: "Lord Cairns we have chartered for your account."

The clause in the charter-party relating to the matter of commissions is in this language: "Vessel to be consigned (inward only) at port of discharge to charterer's agent, to whom a commission of two and one-half (2½) per cent. on amount of freight is to be paid. * * * A commission of 5 per cent. on this charter-party shall be paid by the vessel after completing the loading, ship lost or not lost, at customary rate of exchange, in United States gold coin, to charterers." It is claimed that although this language on its face gives 2½ per cent. to the charterer's agents, and 5 per cent. to the charterer, that nevertheless, by custom and usage, the language of the last sentence of the contract above mentioned meant something else; that is, that although, by its terms, 5 per cent. as commissions was to go to the charterer, that in reality, interpreting the language in the light of custom and usage, it did not mean what it purported to mean. We are thus asked to construe the language of a written instrument contrary to its plain and manifest meaning, giving to the words their ordinary signification, and to read it according to a usage of trade solely. This the court below refused to do, and informed the jury that by the terms of the instrument the defendant and charterer was to receive the amount of commissions which his telegram called for, viz., 5 per cent. In this we think the court was correct. The instrument was not ambiguous or doubtful, and it was therefore for the court to construe it for the jury.

The evidence introduced upon the question of usage was not objected to, and the court afterwards instructed the jury to disregard it. We perceive no error in this. The evidence did not go to the question as to what the meaning of the language was in the light of usage. It was rather to the usage in respect to what the charterer was to do with the 5 per cent. commissions after he received it. What he should do with the money was not to be expressed in the contract. What he was to receive as charterer was to be placed therein; and this was done as he ordered it. Again, when it became evident to the court, after the evidence was introduced, that it was intended to vary a written instrument wherein there was no ambiguity whatever, it would not have been proper for the jury to consider it, as that would be to contradict the terms of a written instrument, which, being plain and intelligible, was for the court to construe, and not the jury. In his fourth point, the defendant expresses himself thus: "The exceptions to the charge of the court were well taken. The court erred in refusing to give instructions asked on the part of the defendant." To this extent only are we informed of the alleged errors of the trial court in the matter of the instructions referred to. We suggest, with all due respect to counsel, that while brevity is as has been heretofore stated, (Dale v. Purvis, 20 Pac. Rep. 296,) in such matters, much to be commended, it seems in the present instance to be so extreme as to indicate that the defendant has no real ground of objection, and we must therefore so treat it. Perceiving no prejudicial error, we advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: GIBSON, C.; VAN CLIEF, C.

NOUNNAN et al. v. SUTTER COUNTY LAND Co. (No. 12,227.)

FRAUDULENT REPRESENTATIONS.

Plaintiffs claimed damages for fraudulent representations, in that defendant induced them to undertake the construction of a certain levee by representing that the amount of earth necessary to construct the same was 350,000 cubic yards, and that the earth to be moved was light, sandy loam. They alleged that, upon the faith of these representations, they entered into a written contract to build a levee on defendant's lands by a given date, for which they were to be paid 12 cents per cubic yard of excavation; that in the performance of the work they had moved 400,000 cubic yards of earth, more than half of which was much harder than represented by defendant; and that by reason of the character of such earth it was impossible to complete the levee as they contracted to do. Held, that such representations were expressions of opinion as to matters equally in the power of both parties to ascertain, and the omission of any reference to them in the contract showed that plaintiffs did not regard the same as material; and plaintiffs' continuance of the work after discovering that such representations were false was a waiver of their right to contest the contract upon that ground.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. F. SULLIVAN, Judge.

Craig & Meredith, for appellants. James Wheeler, (W. W. Cope, of counsel,) for respondent.

WORKS, J. This is an action for damages for fraudulent representations alleged to have been made by the respondent to induce the appellants to enter into a contract to construct a levee upon the lands of the former. A demurrer to the complaint was sustained, and, the plaintiffs refusing to amend, judgment was entered in favor of the defendant. From this judgment the plaintiffs have appealed. Several grounds were stated in the demurrer, but the only one discussed here is that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The representations relied upon as fraudulent are thus stated in the complaint: "That on the 13th day of August, 1884, at said city and county, the defendant represented to the plaintiffs that the defendant wished the plaintiffs to construct a certain levee upon the lands of the defendant in the county of Sutter. The defendant, in order to induce the plaintiffs to do the said work, represented to them that the amount of earth measured in excavation, necessary to be placed upon said levee in order to construct the same, was 350,000 cubic yards. The defendant further represented to the plaintiffs that the character of the earth along the line of said levee was light, sandy loam, and that it was good scraper material. The plaintiffs then stated to the defendant that if the quantity exceeded 350,000 cubic yards, or, if the adjacent earth varied from that stated, they would not do the said work, and proposed to go upon the ground and examine the same. Thereupon the defendant dissuaded and prevented them from doing so, and said that the plaintiffs could entirely rely on the accuracy of said statements. The defendant stated to the plaintiffs that the defendant had made a careful survey and measurement of said work, and had fully informed itself of the character of the said material. Both and all of said representations were made with the intent to induce the plaintiffs to enter into the contract hereinafter mentioned. The plaintiffs relied upon the said representations, and were induced by them to abstain from examining the premises. The premises are about one hundred and fifty miles from San Francisco, and it would have required many days of examination, surveys, and measurements to have ascertained the truth or falsity of said representations." It is alleged that the plaintiffs relied, and had a right to rely, upon these representations, and that they were thereby induced to enter into the contract without investigating for themselves the matters about which the representations were made. The contract is set out in the complaint, and bound the plaintiffs to construct a certain levee on the lands of the defendant, for which they were to be paid 12 cents per cubic yard of excavation. The contract was executed August 15, 1884. Estimates were to be made at the end of each month, and 75 per cent. of the amount of the estimates to be paid on the 7th day of each month, the balance of 25 per cent. to be paid 10 days after the satisfactory completion of the contract and the engineers' approval of the work, and acceptance by the board of directors of the defendant, but if the work should not be completed by the 1st of the following December, the 25 per cent. was to be forfeited unless the contractors were prevented in the due prosecution of their work by either providential acts or causes beyond their control, in which case a proportional time was to be allowed for such stoppage. After setting out the contract the complaint further alleges: "Both of the said representations were material, and neither of them was a matter of opinion merely. The materiality of the first-mentioned representation consisted in this: that the said work could not be prosecuted during the rainy season, and the then approaching rainy season did not afford more, or but very little more, than sufficient time to construct a levee of 350,000 cubic yards. And if the said levee should be in an incomplete condition when the rain should set in, then, by reason of overflow of the land, the partially constructed levee would be destroyed. And, in addition to this, the plaintiffs only had a capital of about $6,000, and the same would be exhausted in constructing a levee exceeding 350,000 cubic yards. Second. That said representations were material, in this: that the materials of the character mentioned can be moved with less expense and labor, and with greater rapidity than any other kind. That both of said representations were untrue. The fact was that the cubic contents of the said levee were such that it required 500,000 cubic yards, as aforesaid, to construct it. And the character of said adjacent earth was, except very near the surface, stiff adobe, and to a great extent hard-pan, both of which are more difficult to remove than light, sandy loam. The defendant at said time had reasonable ground to believe, and did believe, that both of said representations were not true, and to believe, and did believe, the facts to be as herein above set forth. Thereupon the plaintiffs entered upon the performance of said work, and in so doing they removed 400,000 cubic yards of earth, and placed the same on said levee. But they did not know that they had removed so great a quantity, because they had not measured or surveyed the same, and the surveyor mentioned in said contract had not done so. That as said work proceeded, it was at first of the character represented, but the same became harder as the plaintiffs progressed, but the plaintiffs did not discover the said fact until they had placed about 200,000 cubic yards on said levee. And afterwards, although the material became harder and more of the character of adobe, plaintiffs continued to believe that the quantity of such hard material would be but small, relying upon the statement of the defendant. On or about the 10th day of December, 1884, the plaintiffs discovered, and the fact was, that nearly all of the earth still necessary to be removed in order to complete said levee was very stiff adobe and hard-pan. They had aleady been delayed by the occasional appearance of said material. It became and was impossible thus to complete said levee. There still remain 100,000 cubic yards unfinished, although this latter fact the plaintiffs did not discover until on or about the 16th day of December, 1884. On the said 16th day of December the plaintiffs, by reason of the matters aforesaid, quit work under said contract, abandoned the same, and declared to the defendant that they did abandon and repudiate the same, and have ever since done so, and they demanded of defendant the reasonable value of the work done. The reasonable value of the said work was $57,120, and the plaintiffs admit that they received from defendant, in the premises, $36,350. But the same was paid before the plaintiffs discovered any of the facts regarding quantity and quality. The capital of the plaintiffs was wholly exhausted in the performance of said work. The plaintiffs have been damaged in the premises in the sum of $20,700. And therefore the plaintiffs pray judgment against the defendant in the sum of $20,700 and costs."

It will be seen that there are two representations relied upon, viz., that the amount of earth in excavation necessary to construct the levee was 350,000 cubic yards, and that the character of earth along the line of said levee was light, sandy loam and good scraper material.

It is contended by the respondent, in support of the ruling of the court below, that neither of these were representations as to a material fact, but were matters of opinion, and were immaterial. If this be so the complaint was insufficient, unless there are other allegations sufficient to take this case out of the general rule that the statement of mere matters of opinion, although false or erroneous, are not sufficient ground for an action of damages. Civil Code, § 1710; Rendell v. Scott, 70 Cal. 514, 11 Pac. Rep. 779; Lawrence v. Gayetty, 20 Pac. Rep. 384. It is quite clear, we think, that both of these statements were mere expressions of opinion with reference to matters equally within the power of both of the parties to the contract to ascertain and determine for themselves. Clapham v. Shillito, 7 Beav. 146; Development Co. v. Silva, 125 U. S. 247, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 881; Watts v. Cummins, 59 Pa. St. 88.

It is evident from the contract itself that the plaintiffs did not regard either of these representations as material, and that they did not rely upon them. They could have protected themselves against both of the contingencies covered by the representations by their contract. They were by the terms of the agreement to have a fixed sum per cubic yard for the work. Therefore the amount of earth necessary to be moved in order to complete the work was immaterial, except that they were required to have the same completed within a certain time or forfeit a part of their compensation. They could easily have guarded against this by providing that if the work overran the quantity named a longer time should be allowed them. As to the representation that the material was of a kind that would be easily worked, they could have protected themselves by providing that for that class of work they should have 12 cents per cubic yard, and for more difficult or expensive material to handle a greater sum. To have inserted such provisions in the contract would have been but an act of common prudence. If they had regarded these matters as material and contracted with reference to them, they would no doubt have been inserted.

Treating these as a part of the negotiations leading up to and forming the basis of the contract, we must presume that the entire negotiations of the parties were included in the written contract as executed, and so presuming, we must hold that they were bound to move the earth contracted to be handled, and to do it within the time named, without reference to its quantity or quality. Civil Code, § 1625; Pickering v. Dowson, 4 Taunt, 779. This was their contract. Treating them as mere representations made to induce the making of the contract, the contract itself furnishes sufficient evidence of the fact that they were not relied upon, and were not regarded by the plaintiffs as material. Besides, so far as both the quantity and quality of the material were concerned, the complaint shows a waiver on the part of the plaintiffs of the right to contest the contract on that ground. They did not stop work when they found the material to have been different from the kind represented, but kept on with the work long after such discovery. Nor did they stop work when they had handled 350,000 cubic yards of earth. This shows that they must have been willing to handle the kind of material they found, and in a greater quantity than the defendant had represented to be necessary, at the price named in their contract. Having continued on, after they must have known that the alleged representations were fraudulent, we must presume that they were willing to and did waive the fraud, with the hope, we suppose, of again finding a soft spot of earth. Having taken this risk, and made the defendant liable for the work done, after they discovered the alleged fraud, at the contract price, it was then too late to recover on the ground that such representations had been fraudulently made. Blen v. Mining Co., 20 Cal. 602, 614; Railroad Co. v. Row, 24 Wend. 74; Masson v. Bovet, 1 Denio, 69. For these reasons the complaint was bad, and the demurrer to it was properly sustained. Judgment affirmed.

I concur: Fox, J.

PATERSON, J. I concur. It is clear that the plaintiffs did not rely upon any statement as to the number of cubic yards which would be required in the construction of the levee. The contract itself shows that the dimensions of the levee were subject to the direction of the engineer. It provides: "The levee will be formed in layers of such uniform depth, and the materials disposed of and distributed in such manner, as the engineer may direct. * * * The levee is to be built six feet wide on top, unless otherwise directed, with slopes of four horizontal to one vertical on the inside." The other subject is well disposed of by Mr. Justice WORKS in holding that, so far as the quality of the material was concerned, it is clear that the plaintiff cannot complain. The complaint charges that the defendant represented to plaintiffs that it had made a careful investigation, and fully informed itself of the character of said material; that this representation was made with the intent to induce plaintiffs to enter into the contract, and that they were induced by the representations to abstain from examining the premises. Under these circumstances, I think, the plaintiffs would have had a cause of action against the defendants if they had stopped work and rescinded the contract promptly when they found the material was different in kind from that which was represented. This they did not do, and they must be held to have been willing to excavate the kind of material they found in a greater quantity than the defendant had represented to be necessary. Having continued on, it must be conclusively presumed that they did so at their own risk.

TURNER v. REYNOLDS. (No. 12,151.)

VENDOR AND VENDEE—ACTION FOR MONEY PAID—DEDICATION—INTEREST.

1. In an action to recover money paid on a contract for land, the complaint alleged that the land had been dedicated to the public as a street by deed. Held, that the ultimate fact to be determined was whether there had been a valid dedication, and it was unnecessary to find that it had been by deed.

2. Plaintiff is entitled to interest on the money from the time its return was demanded after failure of defendant to deliver a valid deed, without regard to subsequent demands for a deed.

3. Money expended by plaintiff for an abstract and report on the title to the land was properly allowed as damages, within Civil Code Cal. § 3306, which provides that the damages for breach of a contract to convey land shall include "the expenses properly incurred in examining the title and preparing the necessary papers, with interest thereon."

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JOHN F. FINN, Judge.

Thos. F. Barry, for appellant. J. M. Wood, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. C. This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial. The judgment was rendered on the 14th day of June, 1886, the order denying a new trial was entered on the 2d day of December, 1886, and the notice of appeal was served and filed on the 10th day of February, 1887. On an appeal from a final judgment, an exception to the decision or verdict, on the ground that it is not supported by the evidence, cannot be reviewed, unless the appeal is taken within 60 days after the rendition of the judgment; and an appeal from an order denying a new trial can only be taken within 60 days after the order is entered. Code Civil Proc. § 939.

As the appeal in this case was taken more than 60 days after the rendition of the judgment, and after the order refusing a new trial was entered, the principal point urged by counsel for appellant, viz., that the findings of the court were not justified by the evidence, cannot be considered.

The other points, arising upon the judgment roll, are that the court failed to find upon two material issues, and that it erred in allowing the plaintiff $40 damages. The action was brought to recover the sum of $300, paid by plaintiff to defendant as a deposit to bind the purchase of a lot of land in the city of San Francisco, and also the further sum of $40, paid by plaintiff for an abstract and report on the title to the lot. The defendant gave plaintiff a written agreement for the sale of the lot, providing that 12 days should be allowed for an examination of the title, and that if the title should not prove to be valid the deposit should be returned. The complaint alleges that "defendant failed, within said twelve days, and for a great many days thereafter, to make or pass a valid title to said land to this plaintiff, and has so failed up to this day, though the same has been by plaintiff often demanded; that defendant could not make or pass a valid title to said land for the reason that the seller had not title to the westerly twenty feet thereof, which had been dedicated by deed, as disclosed by a search of the title thereto, as a public street, and the same, at the time of said contract to sell, was actually used as a public street, and is now so used;" and that "plaintiff expended $40 in and about said matter for an abstract and report on the title to said land." The answer to these allegations was a general denial.

The court, among other things, found: "(5) That on or about the twelfth day after the date of said contract plaintiff objected to said title for the reason that defendant had not title to the westerly twenty feet of said land, for that the same had been dedicated, and at the time of said contract to sell was actually used, as a public street, and thereupon demanded the return of said deposit. (6) That at said time said twenty feet of said land was used and dedicated as a public street. (7) That the defendant never tendered to plaintiff a good or a sufficient deed or deeds of conveyance, transferring or conveying to plaintiff a valid or perfect title to said land, and could not do so." "(9) That defendant has utterly failed hitherto to make, or pass, or render any valid title to said lands to said plaintiff, and could not have made or passed such title. (10) That plaintiff expended $40 in and about said matter * * * for an abstract and report on the title to said land."

It is claimed that there is no finding as to whether there was a dedication by deed of a public street through the land in controversy, and that this was a material issue. We think the finding sufficient.

The question to be determined was, had there been a valid dedication of a portion of the lot to the use of the public as a street? This was the ultimate fact, and, under our system, ultimate facts only need be alleged or found.

It is also claimed that there is no finding as to whether the plaintiff often demanded a conveyance after the 12 days provided in the contract had expired; and that this was a material issue, because it affected the time from which interest should be charged. We see nothing in this point. Under the facts found, plaintiff was evidently entitled to claim and receive interest on her deposit from the time she demanded, and defendant refused, its return.

It is objected that the findings do not support the judgment in so far as it awards the plaintiff $40 damages. This objection is met by section 3306 of the Civil Code, which fixes the rule of damages in cases like this, and, among other things, allows "the expenses properly incurred in examining the title and preparing the necessary papers, with interest thereon."

We advise that the appeal from the order denying a new trial be dismissed, and that the judgment be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNE, C.; FOOTE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the appeal from the order denying a new trial is dismissed, and the judgment is affirmed.

STAY OF EXECUTION—CERTIFICATE OF PROBABLE CAUSE.

Where, for the purpose of staying execution of a judgment of conviction pending an appeal, application is made to the judge of a lower court, as provided by Pen. Code Cal. § 1243, for a certificate that there is probable cause for the appeal, such certificate should be granted if the judge thinks that the case presented is debatable,—if it is a case in which there may be an honest difference of opinion,—and not simply a case that is vexatious and frivolous.

In bank. Application for a writ of probable cause for appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county; J. L. CAMPBELL, Judge.

Hargrave & Bledsoe and Harris & Gregg, for petitioner. H. Connor, Dist. Atty., for the People.

BEATTY, C. J. When this application was originally presented the following opinion and order were filed: "In the matter of Horace Adams. The petitioner, having been convicted in the superior court of manslaughter, has appealed, or is about to appeal, to the supreme court. The judge of the superior court refuses to certify that in his opinion there is probable cause for the appeal, and the defendant, for the purpose of obtaining a stay of proceedings upon the judgment pending his appeal, has applied to me for a certificate of probable cause, pursuant to the provisions of section 1243 of the Penal Code. The application is made without any previous notice to the district attorney, and is based upon a certified transcript of the short-hand reporter's notes of the trial, and copies, certified by the county clerk, of certain instructions said to have been given and refused by the superior judge. There is no rule, and, so far as I can learn, there has been no uniform practice, with reference to proceedings in cases arising under this section of the Code. Sometimes the justice to whom the application has been presented has required the petitioner to give notice of the hearing, and to produce a settled bill of exceptions in support of his petition, and sometimes these requirements have been dispensed with. I think it is better that there should be a settled and uniform practice in these cases, and that the safer course is to require notice to the district attorney, and the production of a settled bill of exceptions, or a properly authenticated copy, in order that the people may have an opportunity to be heard in opposition to the petition, and that the justice acting in the matter may have before him an authentic record of the case as it will be presented to the supreme court. The only inconvenience that could arise from these requirements is that in case of delay in the settlement of the bill of exceptions a defendant might be deprived of the benefit of the statute by being sent to the state-prison before his petition could be heard; but it is to be presumed that in such cases the superior court would, if the defendant exercised proper diligence in the presentation of his bill of exceptions, grant a sufficient temporary stay of proceedings. If that court failed or refused unreasonably to grant such stay, it might be granted by a justice of this court. The power to do so is clearly incidental to the power to act upon the petition, for otherwise the statute could not, in many instances, have the operation it was evidently intended to have, viz., to preserve defendants in criminal cases from the disgrace and ignominy of imprisonment among convicts so long as the legality of their conviction remains open to serious question. Upon these considerations I have concluded to make the following order in the present case: Monday, the 21st day of October, at 10 o'clock A. M., at the supreme court chambers at Los Angeles, is fixed as the time and place of hearing this application. The petitioner will give at least five days' notice to the district attorney of said hearing, and will produce thereat a settled bill of exceptions, or a properly certified copy. In the mean time, and until otherwise ordered, all proceedings against the petitioner under said judgment are stayed. W. H. BEATTY, Chief Justice, Supreme Court."

The petitioner having, in compliance with said order, given the required notice to the district attorney, and produced a record of his conviction, including a settled statement of his exceptions, the question is now to be decided whether he is entitled to a certificate that there is "probable cause" for his appeal. It is not required that in matters of this kind any formal statement in writing of the grounds of our decision should be made; but the frequency with which these applications are denied by the judges of the superior court, when they ought to be granted, and the serious interruption to the business of this court caused by their renewal here, seem to demand an expression of our views as to the proper construction of section 1243 of the Penal Code, and the proper practice under it. Section 1243 reads as follows: "An appeal to the supreme court from a judgment of conviction stays the execution of the judgment in all capital cases, and in all other cases, upon filing with the clerk of the court in which the conviction was had a certificate of the judge of such court, or of a justice of the supreme court, that, in his opinion, there is probable cause for the appeal, but not otherwise."

It would seem that, notwithstanding what has been said by this court respecting this and cognate provisions of the statute, the opinion must obtain to some extent that the expression "probable cause for the appeal" is the equivalent of "probable ground for reversal of the judgment," and consequently that the superior judge, who has overruled the defendant's motion in arrest of judgment, or for a new trial, cannot, without stultifying himself, grant a certificate of probable cause. If it were true that there is no probable cause for an appeal except in a case where the judgment is probably erroneous, it would necessarily involve self-stultification for a judge, who, by denying a new trial and pronouncing sentence, has solemnly affirmed his belief in the validity of the judgment, to make a certificate implying that in his opinion the judgment ought to be reversed. The palpable absurdity of such a proceeding sufficiently demonstrates that the legislature could never have intended to require it,—demonstrates, in other words, that the certificate which the superior judges are required to grant in proper cases cannot have the meaning supposed. What, then, is meant by the expression, "probable cause for the appeal?" We answer, as we have answered heretofore, it means only that there is presented a case that is debatable; a case that is not clearly and palpably frivolous and vexatious; a case upon which there may be an honest difference of opinion. People v. Valencia, 45 Cal. 305; Ex parte Hoge, 48 Cal. 6. This is all that is required. It matters not that the judge before whom the prisoner has been tried may be satisfied that his conviction is in every respect regular and valid, (which, indeed, must always be the case before there can arise any necessity for an appeal;) he is, nevertheless, bound to grant a certificate of probable cause, and stay the execution pending the appeal, unless the case is so clear as to admit of no rational doubt or serious discussion.

The Case of ex parte Hoge, above cited, was an application for admission to bail pending appeal, the giving of bail being, as the law then stood, the only mode of staying execution, except in capital cases, and all that was said by Chief Justice WALLACE in deciding that case is, in the changed condition of the law, fully applicable here. We quote, as expressive of our views, the following portion of his opinion: "The right to appeal to the supreme court is guarantied by the constitution to the prisoner, and is as sacred as the right of trial by jury. It is one of the means the law has provided to determine the question of his guilt or innocence. Upon such an appeal, the ultimate question is nearly always as to the validity of the judgment under which the prisoner is to suffer; and it is certainly not consonant to our ideas of justice, if it can be prevented by legal means, that, even while the question of guilt or innocence is yet being agitated in the form of an appeal, the prisoner should be undergoing the very punishment, and suffering the very infamy, which it was the lawful purpose of the appeal to avert. It would be somewhat akin to a practice of punishing the accused for his alleged offense while the jury was yet deliberating upon the verdict." This language furnishes a guide to every judge to whom an application like this is presented. He should give the prisoner the benefit of every doubt, exercising his discretion liberally in certifying to the probable cause for the appeal, whenever a case is presented upon which candid minds might rationally differ. This view is sustained, not only by considerations of justice, but also by those of convenience and economy. The only result of a stay of execution is that the defendant, during the short time that his appeal is pending, remains a prisoner in the county jail, instead of being transported to the penitentiary. If the judgment is affirmed, the time he has spent in jail is so much added to the term of his imprisonment, and this fact will have a tendency to prevent applications for a stay in plain cases. A criminal of hardened character, to whom the mere ignominy of imprisonment among convicts has no terrors, will generally prefer to go to the state-prison pending his appeal, in order that the time of his sentence may be running, and that he may have the advantage of it in case the judgment against him is affirmed; and the plainer the case against him the stronger will be the operation of this motive. In every case, therefore, in which a stay of proceedings is demanded, it may safely be assumed that the stigma of imprisonment in the state-prison, and the forced association with the class of criminals there confined, is in his estimation the worst part of the punishment to which the petitioner has been condemned. To such a person the privilege of a stay of proceedings, pending the exercise of his constitutional right of appeal, is of inestimable value, and it ought never to be denied, except in a case in which it is certain no error can be found. If a stay is granted, and the judgment afterwards affirmed, no wrong has been done, and nothing has been lost to the public beyond the trifling expense of keeping the prisoner for a few months in the county jail, while he, as we have seen, has had so much added to the term of his imprisonment. If, on the other hand, a stay of execution is denied, and the judgment is reversed, (as may well happen in any debatable case,) not only has the public been subjected to the useless expense of transporting the prisoner to and from the state-prison, but upon him has been inflicted a wrong which the state has no power to redress.

For all these reasons we hope that hereafter the superior judges to whom these applications are made will, before denying them, seriously consider, not merely the question whether, upon mature consideration and after argument on the part of the people, all their rulings ought to be affirmed in the supreme court, but whether the case is so clear that no judge could fail, on a mere inspection of the record, and without argument, to pronounce the appeal frivolous.

It is proper to add that the foregoing remarks have no peculiar application to this particular case. They have been called forth by the pendency of a number of such petitions to the justices of this court, and their increasing frequency, resulting, as we believe, from a misconception of the meaning of the statute. It only remains to add that in this case the petitioner's bill of exceptions presents several questions which I am not prepared to say, in advance of argument, are wholly without merit, and therefore I shall grant the certificate prayed for.

Criminal Law—Sentence.

Under an ordinance providing that any person carrying concealed weapons shall be fined or imprisoned in the city prison, or both fined and imprisoned, a judgment that an offender pay a fine, and, in case of its non-payment, be imprisoned in the county jail, is void as to the imprisonment, as the ordinance does not authorize imprisonment in the county jail.

McFarland, J. The petitioner, James Sylvester, was convicted in the police court of the city of Eureka of a violation of ordinance No. 55, ordained by the common council of that city, and sentenced to pay a fine of $50, and, in case the fine was not paid, to be imprisoned in the county jail of Humboldt county in the proportion of one day for each dollar of the fine; and he was, under the judgment, delivered to the custody of the sheriff. The said ordinance prohibits the carrying of concealed weapons within the city limits, and provides that any person violating it "shall be fined in a sum not to exceed $100, or imprisonment in the city prison not to exceed ten days, or by both such fine and imprisonment." Petitioner relies upon several grounds for his release, but it is necessary to notice only one. Whether or not, for a mere violation of a city ordinance, the common council could have legally provided for a judgment imprisoning petitioner in the county jail, an institution controlled by the supervisors, where additional penalties of hard labor, etc., were imposed, presents a question not necessary to be here determined. There was no attempt to exercise such power. The ordinance provided for imprisonment in the city prison, and it is clear that the judgment of imprisonment in the county jail was a nullity. The petitioner is discharged from custody.

Smith, Howard & Smith and Thos. L. Winder, for appellant. Barclay, Wilson & Carpenter, for respondent.

Works, J. This is an action of unlawful detainer. The court finds the facts tending to show under what claim of right the defendant was in possession as follows: "That in the month of February, A. D. 1886, the house and lot of the defendant having been washed away by the Los Angeles river, that plaintiff, then residing upon the south half of lot 1, block V, of the Alviso tract, in the city of Los Angeles, represented to the defendant that he (plaintiff) was solitary, old, and infirm, and was liable at any time to attacks of sickness, and proposed to defendant that he (defendant) should erect a dwelling-house on a part of said lot, and should reside with his family therein, and agreed with defendant that, in consideration of the erection of such building, and the payment of one-half the taxes (state, county, and municipal) that might thereafter, and during the continuance of said agreement, be levied and assessed upon said half of lot 1, and of one-half of the charge for water on said premises during said agreement, and in consideration that defendant should care for plaintiff in sickness, he (defendant) might occupy said house, erected by defendant on said premises, during the natural life of plaintiff; that said agreement was verbal, and never reduced to writing." The court also found that the defendant had complied with the terms of the contract on his part, and constructed a dwelling-house on the property, and was residing thereon. The plaintiff, in his complaint, treats the defendant as a tenant at will, and alleges that he had given him notice to quit, as required in such cases, and the court so finds. The defendant contends that by the contract, if in writing, he would have been entitled to a life-estate in the lands, and that by taking possession, and making the improvements, the verbal contract was taken out of the statute of frauds, and had the same effect. The court below found for the plaintiff, and gave judgment accordingly. The defendant appeals on the judgment roll.

There is no question as to the making of the contract and its performance. There is some ambiguity in one of the findings as to the care of the plaintiff by the defendant in times of the former's sickness, but we regard it as sufficient to show a compliance with the contract in that respect. The point made and relied upon is that the contract was void. As we understand the position of counsel for respondent, it is that the contract was a lease, and as such was void under sections 1091 and 1624 of the Civil Code, and sections 1971 and 1973 of the Code of Civil Procedure; that the part performance found could not take the case out of the statute of frauds; and that a specific performance could not be enforced because a part of the consideration on the part of the defendant was personal services to be rendered in the future. In our judgment neither of the last two questions arise in the case. This is in no sense a lease of the property, but a sale of a life-estate therein. There is no attempt to compel a specific performance of the contract, and therefore the question whether a contract, the consideration of which is personal services, could be specifically enforced, does not arise. It is sufficient to say that up to the present time the personal services have been fully rendered and performed. The contract, being in parol, was void, as counsel contend. But if this were an action to enforce the specific performance of an agreement to convey there could be no doubt that there was such a part performance as would entitle the plaintiff to such a remedy. Burlingame v. Rowland, 77 Cal. 315, 19 Pac. Rep. 526; McCarger v. Rood, 47 Cal. 138. And the fact that in this case there was no agreement for a future conveyance, but a present verbal contract, authorizing the defendant to take and hold possession, can make no difference, under the facts as found by the court. The same doctrine as to the effect of part performance which would entitle the defendant to a specific performance in a proper case, must, for the same reasons, and on like principles, protect him in his possession under the verbal contract so long as he complies with its terms. To hold otherwise would make the statute of frauds a means of perpetrating a plain and palpable wrong upon the defendant. The very object of the exception of the statute, that where the contract has been so far performed that the parties cannot be placed in statu quo,—for example, where the vendee has gone into possession under the contract, and if the contract is declared void would be a trespasser,—is to prevent such a result. In this case the defendant has done more than to take possession. He has made permanent improvements on the land which would fall to the plaintiff if he should recover. We think that the court erred in its conclusions of law from the facts found. The judgment is reversed, with instructions to the court below to conform its conclusions of law to this opinion, and render judgment on the findings in favor of the defendant.

HOMESTEAD—MORTGAGE—ABANDONMENT.

Civil Code Cal. § 1242, provides that the homestead of a married person cannot be conveyed or incumbered unless the instrument by which it is conveyed or incumbered is executed and acknowledged by both the husband and wife. Section 1243 provides that such homestead can be abandoned only by a declaration of abandonment, or a grant thereof executed and acknowledged by the husband and wife. Section 1244 provides that such declaration of abandonment is effectual only from the time it is filed in the office in which the homestead is recorded. Held, that a mortgage of a homestead executed by the husband alone is void from its inception, and it is of no avail that the homestead is afterwards abandoned.

Spencer & Raker, for appellants. Goodwin & Jenks, Ewing & Claflin, and J. J. May, for respondents.

GIBSON, C. Ejectment to recover certain lots in the town of Alturas, Modoc county. Trial before the court, without a jury. Judgment for defendants; from which, and an order denying a new trial, plaintiffs appeal. The court found and adjudged that the principal instrument, in the form of a deed absolute, relied upon herein for a recovery, was intended and accepted as a mortgage; and that the same, having been executed by the husband alone while the property in controversy was a homestead, was void, and of no effect. The defendant J. D. Spray, while the owner of and residing with his wife upon the property, on October 20, 1884, made, acknowledged, and caused to be recorded a declaration of homestead embracing the same property. And on April 7, 1885, while the homestead thus created was still subsisting, he (Spray) executed and delivered to George M. Gleason, one of the plaintiffs, a general warranty deed, absolute in form, embracing the homestead, with other real property. This deed the court found was intended as a mortgage. Thereafter, on May 25, 1885, the defendants, Spray and wife, by a joint declaration to that effect, duly filed in the proper office, abandoned the homestead. On May 26, 1886, George M. Gleason, by a deed of gift, conveyed to Julia, his wife, the same property described in Spray's deed to him.

The first question arising on these facts is as to whether the deed of Spray to Gleason was absolutely void, or only inoperative against the homestead while it existed as such. It does not clearly appear whether the property in question was the separate property of Spray or the community property of himself and wife; but, whatever its character may have been, it was, by the declaration of homestead, converted into the joint property of both. Civil Code, § 1265; Burkett v. Burkett, 20 Pac. Rep. 715. "The homestead of a married person cannot be conveyed or incumbered, unless the instrument by which it is conveyed or incumbered is executed and acknowledged by both husband and wife." Civil Code, § 1242. In the homestead act of 1860, as amended in 1862 (St. 1862, § 2, p. 519) a similar provision is found; it reads as follows:

"No alienation, sale, conveyance, mortgage, or other lien of or upon the homestead property, shall be valid or effectual for any purpose whatever, unless the same be executed by the owner thereof, and be executed and acknowledged by the wife if the owner be married, and the wife be a resident of this state, in the same manner as provided by law in case of the conveyance by her of her separate and real property." Under this provision it was held in Barber v. Babel, 36 Cal. 11, that a mortgage of the homestead property executed by the husband alone, for the purpose of reviving a prior mortgage on the same property executed before the homestead was selected, was void and of no effect. Although the wording of the code provision is different from that of the homestead act, above set forth, we think both provisions are the same in effect, and designed to protect the wife in the security of a home by preventing the alienation of the homestead in any mode other than that prescribed by law. Barber v. Babel, supra; Burkett v. Burkett, supra. When a statute says an act cannot be done unless performed in a certain mode, the inhibition against performing it in any other way would seem, in view of the word "cannot," meaning an absence of power, to be just as strong and complete as when the statute says that an act, unless done in a certain mode, shall not be valid for any purpose. An examination of the other two sections of the Civil Code bearing upon the alienation and abandonment of homesteads convinces us that the construction given in Barber v. Babel to the provisions of the homestead act is correct, and should be applied to section 1242 of the Civil Code. Thus, by the provisions of section 1243, "a homestead can be abandoned only by a declaration of abandonment, or a grant thereof executed and acknowledged (1) by the husband and wife, if the claimant is married; (2) by the claimant, if unmarried,"—and, by section 1244, "a declaration of abandonment is effectual only from the time it is filed in the office in which the homestead is recorded." These three sections are in pari materia, and must be read together, and effect given to each. Sections 1242 and 1243 prescribe how homesteads may be alienated or incumbered, and the last-mentioned section, in addition thereto, how they may be abandoned, and section 1244 the time from which the abandonment becomes effectual. This last section, it is to be observed, fixes the time when the homestead character of the property is extinguished by abandonment, and does not give the abandonment any retroactive operation. The provision relating to abandonment in the homestead act of 1860, as amended in 1862, was that the homestead would be deemed abandoned upon the declaration to that effect being filed. But in section 1244 the words "from the time" must have been used for some purpose, and with the intention of preventing an instrument made by the husband alone, during the existence of the homestead and designed to affect it, from taking effect upon the abandonment of the homestead. By so construing those words, the three sections, taken together, erect a complete barrier around the homestead, for the protection of it in favor of the wife, against the individual assaults of the husband upon it. If, however, an abandonment under section 1244 would, as contended for by the appellants in this case, relate back to the time when the homestead was created, so as to render effectual any attempt of the husband alone to alienate or incumber it while it was a homestead, then the restrictions in sections 1242 and 1243 would be rendered nugatory; and the husband would be enabled, if so disposed, to fraudulently destroy the homestead by first conveying it to a stranger, without the knowledge of his wife, and then give vitality to his deed by obtaining her joinder in a declaration of abandonment upon some false pretext. When Gleason took the deed embracing the homestead from Spray, the declaration of homestead, unaffected by any abandonment, stood of record. He was therefore charged with notice of the existence of the homestead. And, as he took the deed, embracing the homestead property, without the signature and acknowledgment of Spray's wife, the deed, as to such homestead property, was void. It is therefore unnecessary to inquire whether the instrument was intended as a deed or mortgage. The judgment and order appealed from should, therefore, be affirmed.

DORLAND v. HANSON. (No. 12,399.)

JUDGMENT—EXECUTION—ORDER OF SALE—VACATING ORDER.

1. A decree foreclosing a street assessment is a judgment, under the provisions of Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 681, authorizing the issuance of an execution thereon within five years after the decree is entered.

2. Where an order authorizing the issuance of an execution is made by one department of the court below, an order vacating the same may be made by another department of the same court.

3. Where the court below has, without authority, made an order authorizing the issuance of an execution, the same court may, on motion, vacate and set aside said execution or a sale made under it, though the order is appealable.

4. Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 681, requiring execution on a judgment to issue within five years after judgment is entered, applies also to an order of sale.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; T. K. WILSON, Judge.

J. M. Wood, (J. C. Bates, of counsel,) for appellant. Sullivan & Sullivan, for respondent.

WORKS, J. The only question in this case is whether or not an execution or order of sale can issue upon a decree foreclosing a street assessment, after five years. The court below held it could not, and set aside and vacated a former order authorizing such writ to issue, and vacating a sale made thereunder. From this order the appellant prosecutes this appeal. Section 681 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides: "The party in whose favor judgment is given may, at any time within five years after the entry thereof, have a writ of execution issued for its enforcement." And section 685 provides: "In all cases other than for the recovery of money the judgment may be enforced or carried into execution after the lapse of five years from the date of its entry, by leave of the court, upon motion, or by judgment for that purpose founded upon supplemental pleadings." The contention of the appellant is that the first of these sections applies solely to personal judgments for the recovery of money, and that a judgment for the foreclosure of a street assessment lien, where there can be no personal judgment, is not within that section, but is covered by section 685, and that, therefore, her execution or order of sale was properly issued by leave of court after five years. We do not so construe these sections. Section 681 must be held to apply to a judgment the object, purpose, and effect of which is to enforce the payment of money, whether the same be a personal judgment against the party indebted, or a decree foreclosing a lien for an amount due. Section 685 was evidently intended to and does apply to judgments requiring the party against whom it is rendered to do some specific act, as, for example, to deliver specific real or personal property. Taking this view of the two sections, we must hold that the order of the court below vacating the order authorizing the issuance of the writ after five years, and vacating the sale made under such writ, was right.

It was claimed in the opening brief of the appellant that the full five years had not run, because during a part of the time the powers of the administrator, whose power and duty it was to cause the writ to be issued, were suspended; but this contention is expressly abandoned in the closing brief, and it is admitted that the suspension of the powers of the administrator could not have the effect of suspending the running of the statute.

The order authorizing the issuance of the execution was made by one department of the court below, and the order vacating the same by another department of the same court, and it is contended that this was erroneous. We see no force in this position. It was the same court acting in each instance, and the fact that the orders were made in different departments is immaterial.

Again, it is said that the order authorizing the issuance of the writ was an appealable order, and could not be attacked in this way. Conceding the order to have been appealable, the execution issued was void, if the court had no authority to order its issuance, and might be attacked by a motion to vacate and set it aside, and the same may be said of the sale made under it. Therefore the only material question was whether the execution and sale should be set aside; and as to the power of the court below to set them aside, conceding the order authorizing the writ to issue to have been an appealable order, we have no doubt.

Counsel attempt to distinguish between an execution and an order of sale, and contend that section 681 is confined in terms to the former, and does not limit the time in which the latter may issue. We think, however, that the difference between the two writs is more in the name than anything else, so far as it affects the question before us, and that section 681 must be held to apply to both. The order appealed from is affirmed.

MOORE v. MOORE et al. (No. 13,205.)

ACTION TO RESCIND DEED.

In an action to cancel certain conveyances made by plaintiff to her four step-children, alleged to have been executed while mentally impaired and under undue influence, it was undisputed that the day after the funeral of plaintiff's husband, who had been shot and instantly killed, and while she was deeply shocked and agitated, T., a brother of deceased, who had professed great sympathy and solicitude for her, and several of his relatives, together with an attorney, who had been previously consulted and employed by him, visited her, and advised with her about these instruments; that at this time plaintiff was pregnant, which was known to T.; that she, not knowing that the attorney had been employed by him, had no adviser except these persons, who were all interested in securing all the property of deceased for the children; and that, without consideration, she then executed these instruments, conveying all her interest in her husband's property, worth $47,000. Held, that the conveyances should be set aside.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Santa Cruz county; PHIL. W. KEYSER, Judge.

Hall & Rodgers and Olney, Chickering & Thomas, for appellants. Charles B. Younger, for respondent.

MCFARLAND, J. This action was brought to cancel two deeds and a bill of sale made by plaintiff, on the ground of mental impairment, undue influence, etc., at the time of their execution. The findings and judgment were in favor of plaintiff, and defendants appeal from the judgment. Some exceptions were taken to rulings of the court about the admissibility of certain evidence; but these exceptions were afterwards withdrawn. The plea of the statute of limitations was practically disposed of when the case was here before on a demurrer to the complaint. Moore v. Moore, 56 Cal. 89. The complaint set up all the facts upon which the plea of the statute could be based, and this court held that the plea was not good; and, as the court found those facts, upon sufficient evidence, in favor of respondent, we must hold that the defense of the statute of limitations has not been maintained. There is, therefore, only one question—argued elaborately by appellants—to be disposed of, and that is, does the evidence justify the findings and judgment on the real merits of the case? The undisputed facts in the case are so strongly in favor of respondent that the evidence on the disputed facts would have to be very strong in favor of appellants, indeed, to warrant this court in overturning the judgment of the court below. These undisputed facts are as follows: Respondent was married to William H. Moore (now deceased) in the summer of 1871. They resided on a farm of deceased called the "Moore Ranch," situated a short distance from the town of Santa Cruz. At the time of their marriage the deceased was a widower, and had four minor children,—two boys, Frederick W. and Charles, and two girls, Alice and Stella,—who are defendants and appellants herein. Respondent and the deceased lived very happily together, and he was a kind and affectionate husband. She had been a school-teacher, and had no blood relations in that part of the country, and had only a slight acquaintance with any of the adult relatives of deceased. Down to the moment of his death deceased was a man of strong constitution and robust health. He almost daily visited the town of Santa Cruz, and respondent always looked for his return with pleasure. On the 30th day of October, 1871, he went to Santa Cruz, intending to return the same day, as usual. On the afternoon of that day he was shot and instantly killed; and his dead body was immediately brought home to respondent. There is no real attempt to dispute the fact that respondent was deeply shocked and agitated by this sudden and startling calamity although, as might well be expected, there is some conflicting testimony as to the extent of her mental prostration. On the day after the death of deceased, the appellant, Thomas W. Moore, a brother of deceased, visited respondent at her home, and professed great sympathy and solicitude for her in her distress. The body of the deceased was buried on November 1, 1871, and on the afternoon of that day the said Thomas W. Moore and his brother-in-law, J. N. Besse, visited an attorney, at his office in Santa Cruz, and the said Moore then and there advised with the said attorney as to how he could secure all the property of the deceased for his children by the former marriage. The next day after the funeral, or the second day,—that is, the 2d or 3d of November,—the said Thomas W. Moore, accompanied by a brother and two brothers-in-law, and the said attorney, visited respondent, and advised with her about the execution of the written instruments which are the subject of this action. At that time respondent was pregnant with a child begotten by said deceased,—which was afterwards born and is still living,—and this fact was known to all of said visiting parties. Respondent did not then know that said attorney had been employed by said Thomas W. for the purpose aforesaid. Respondent had no independent adviser, and no adviser at all, except said parties, who were all interested in securing all the property of deceased for his said children. Under these circumstances respondent executed the two deeds and the bill of sale set forth in the complaint, by which she conveyed and transferred to the said children, without consideration, all and every part of her right and interest—being one-third—in every dollar's worth of her deceased husband's estate, real and personal. The property was worth at that time $47,000. These facts are undisputed.

The disputed facts—all found by the court in favor of respondent—are mainly about the extent of respondent's prostration, and her ability to know what she was doing, and to act intelligently for herself. Her evidence was to the effect that she was shocked and terrified by the sudden death of her husband, and the manner of it,—the effect being deepened from her condition of pregnancy; that for two successive days and nights she watched and moaned by the side of the dead body, without sleep or nourishment; that for many days her mind was stupefied and disordered, so that she did not know what was right and proper to be done about her affairs; and that she did not read the said documents signed by her, and did not understand their purport or effect. Appellants, on the other hand, introduced testimony tending to show that her mental condition was not as bad as claimed by her, and that she was informed of and knew the character of the instruments signed by her, and that she signed them voluntarily. There was, also, some conflicting testimony about a certain will. The deceased had made a will, before his marriage with respondent, giving all his property to his said children, and respondent testified that she did not know that the subsequent marriage annulled the will, while appellants contend that she was informed and knew of that fact. There is also some conflict as to what was said about the effect which the proposed instruments would have on the interests of the expected child of respondent, although we do not see in the evidence any pretense of information to her that the instruments would convey away from the expected child all right to respondent's one-third of the estate. There was also a conflict of evidence about the purpose of a certain bond, given in relation to a certain life insurance policy. These were about all the material matters about which there are conflicts of evidence.

Considering all the undisputed facts, and particularly the unusual haste with which, and the extraordinary circumstances under which, the respondent was induced to forever give away such large and valuable property rights, we see no good reason to disturb the conclusions at which the lower court arrived.

The judgment is affirmed.

MONAGHAN v. PACIFIC ROLLING-MILL CO.

ACTION FOR PERSONAL INJURIES—PLEADING—INSTRUCTIONS—VERDICT—JURY.

1. In an action for personal injuries caused by the alleged careless maintenance of machinery, consisting of an iron rod, with a hook at each end by which it was attached to a chain, which at its lower end was connected with a lever, the whole hanging suspended from a beam, an averment in a complaint "that said machinery and apparatus were then and there unsafe, and the chain aforesaid was not securely fastened, and the hook aforesaid was defective and unfit for the purpose of holding and supporting said chain and lever, and by reason thereof the said chain fell from said hook and down upon the plaintiff," clearly includes a defect in the method by which the rod and chain were attached; the phrase "by reason thereof" not being referable solely to some defect in the texture or strength of the hook.

2. In such case, where the injury occurred while plaintiff, an employe of defendant, whose main work was in the yard outside the building, knowing nothing of the condition of the rod, chains, etc., was engaged, as directed, with one or two other employes, in moving a crane having an arm which projected about a foot and a half beyond the suspended rod and chain, and which it would strike unless the latter were moved out of the way, a verdict for plaintiff is not contrary to an instruction that, if the accident was caused by plaintiff or his co-employes "carelessly or negligently moving the arm of the crane against said suspended rod and chain, the plaintiff cannot recover;" the instruction, when considered in connection with the other instructions, meaning simply that if the machinery and apparatus were safe, and the accident was caused by the careless moving of the crane, the plaintiff cannot recover, and there being no evidence requiring the jury to find that the crane was moved carelessly or negligently.

3. The finding of the jury that the machinery was defective and unsafe is supported by evidence showing that the rod and chain were unfastened, loose jointed, and liable every day to be dislocated by a blow from the crane.

4. It is not such misconduct as will warrant the granting of a new trial for a juror to state to several of the other jurors, during the course of the trial, that if certain precautions had been taken the accident could not have happened, illustrating his meaning with the model used at the trial, as it was the statement of a self-evident fact, which could not have improperly influenced the verdict, and the defendant, knowing of the circumstance at the time of its occurrence, making no objection until after verdict.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JOHN HUNT, Judge.

T. Z. Blakeman, for appellant. W. S. Goodfellow and Henry Perry, for respondent.

MCFARLAND, J. This is an action to recover damages for a personal injury. The verdict and judgment were for plaintiff, and defendant appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying a new trial. The main facts of the case are these: The defendant was engaged in the business of rolling railroad iron, and used certain works, machinery, and apparatus for that purpose. Among other things so used was an iron rod, about an inch thick and 14 feet long, with a hook at each end, by which it was attached at each end to a chain, the whole hanging suspended from a beam in the building. The only means of securing the connection between the rod and the chains was the open hook at each end, placed in a ring in the chain. The hooks were not closed or fastened in any way. The lower end of the lower chain is connected with a lever, and the whole apparatus is used for handling heavy bars of railroad iron. Near this apparatus is a crane, consisting of a perpendicular shaft turning upon a pivot, with an arm or jib projecting from the shaft at right angles, and about 12 feet from the ground. The crane is used to change the rolls, dies, etc., and, as it swings around the arm, projects about a foot and a half beyond the said suspended rod and chain, and will strike the latter, unless it is swung out of the way. Plaintiff was an employe of defendant. His main work was in the yard outside of the building, and he knew nothing of the condition of the rod, chains, etc. On August 8, 1882, he was ordered to do some work inside of the building; and while he, with one or two other employes, were moving the crane, as directed to do, the outer end of the arm caught the suspended rod, and pushed it out of the upper ring, when it fell and injured plaintiff. The jury returned a verdict of $1,500. The gist of the action was the careless maintenance of the machinery, as above described.

1. Appellant contends that the proof does not sustain the cause of action alleged in the complaint, because, as he contends, the alleged cause of the injury was a defective hook, and the evidence does not show a defective hook. But we think that if the maintenance of the rod, hooks, and chains, as above described, was carelessness for which appellant was liable, then the complaint was sufficient to include that cause of action. The complaint, after describing the apparatus "consisting of a high frame, to which was fastened a hook, and from said hook a heavy chain," etc., avers "that said machinery and apparatus were then and there unsafe, and the chain aforesaid was not securely fastened, and the hook aforesaid was defective and unfit for the purpose of holding and supporting said chain and lever; and by reason thereof the said chain fell from said hook, and down upon the plaintiff." Appellant contends that the phrase "by reason thereof" should be referred solely to some defect in the texture or strength of the hook. We think, however, that the averment clearly includes a defect in the method by which the rod and chain were attached.

2. Appellant argues that the evidence was insufficient to prove that the machinery was defective or unsafe. But it would be going beyond the province of this court to hold that the jury erred in finding this unfastened, loose-jointed skeleton of rod and chain, liable every day to be dislocated by the blow of a long-armed crane, unsafe. It is argued that it had hung suspended there for some years without accident; but that circumstance is only a matter of wonderment, and is an instance of how good luck will sometimes protect carelessness for long periods.

3. The most grave point made by appellant is that the verdict was against the second instruction asked by appellant, and given by the court, to the effect that if the accident was caused by plaintiff, or his co-employes, "carelessly or negligently moving the arm of the crane against said suspended rod and chain, then plaintiff cannot recover in this action." But, in the first place, there was no evidence requiring the jury to find that the crane was moved "carelessly or negligently;" and, in the second place, the said instruction must be considered in connection with all the other instructions, and, considered thus together, they mean, simply, that if the machinery and apparatus were not unsafe, but the accident was caused by the careless moving of the crane, then plaintiff cannot recover.

4. There was no evidence calling upon the jury to find respondent guilty of contributory negligence.

5. There is a point made on the misconduct of the jury, the point being that during the course of the trial one of the jurors stated to several of the other jurors "that if the hook at the top of the suspended rod had been entirely closed or lashed the accident could not have happened," and "illustrated to them with the model used during the trial." It is, of course, improper for jurors to talk with each other about a case before it is finally submitted; but here all that was said is fully disclosed, and it is apparent that this statement of a self-evident fact could not have improperly influenced the verdict. Moreover, this circumstance was known to appellant at the time of its occurrence, and no objection was made; and he could not thus remain quiet and take the chance of a favorable verdict, and keep this point in reserve. 1 Hayne, New Trial & App. § 27, and cases there cited.

There are no other points requiring notice. Judgment and order affirmed.

Haggin & Dibble, for appellant. George A. Johnson, Atty. Gen., for the People.

BEATTY, C. J. The defendant appeals from a judgment convicting him of the crime of perjury. The indictment charged in substance that, one Maggie Farley having been arrested for a misdemeanor, and duly admitted to bail in the sum of $300, the defendant procured her discharge from custody by executing and delivering a bail-bond, to which was appended an affidavit, by which he made oath that he was a freeholder of the state of California, worth $300 over and above his debts and liabilities, exclusive of property exempt from execution, and that his property consisted of five lots in block 210, Alameda county; whereas he was not a freeholder, not worth $300, and not the owner of said lots.

The only evidence offered at the trial as to what the defendant did swear to in connection with said bail-bond was the affidavit itself, which reads as follows: "State of California, city and county of San Francisco—ss. J. A. Bartman, being duly sworn, deposes and says that he is a resident of the city and county of San Francisco, state of California, and a freeholder in said state of California, and that he is worth the sum of $300, exclusive of property exempt from execution, and over and above all debts and liabilities. Five lots in block 210, Alameda county. JOHN A. BARTMAN. Subscribed and sworn to," etc. No attempt was made to prove that the defendant was not a freeholder, or that he was not worth $300 at the date of said affidavit, but evidence was offered tending to show that he did not own any part of any block 210, in Alameda county. To the introduction of this evidence the defendant objected, upon the ground that it had not been shown that he ever swore that he owned any such property. His objection was overruled, and the evidence admitted. By this ruling, and by various other rulings in giving and refusing instructions, to all of which the defendant duly excepted, the court construed the affidavit above quoted as containing a sworn averment that the defendant was the owner of five lots in block 210, Alameda county. These rulings were, in our opinion, erroneous. The affidavit itself contains no such statement. The words, "five lots in block 210, Alameda county," by themselves assert nothing. They do not constitute a complete sentence, and they have no grammatical or logical connection with the rest of the affidavit. The mere surmise that the defendant, or the person who drew the affidavit, intended to have it understood that he owned said lots is not sufficient. The language used must sustain that construction, and this clearly does not. For the error indicated the judgment must be reversed. Other assignments of error, in this view, become immaterial. Judgment reversed, and cause remanded.

BURGLARY—INDICTMENT—RECORD ON APPEAL.

1. An information for burglary, omitting the word "feloniously," but charging the offense in the language of the statute, (Pen. Code Cal. § 459,) is sufficient.

2. Under Pen. Code Cal. § 459, providing that "every person who enters any house * * * with intent to commit * * * larceny * * * is guilty of burglary," a charge that defendant burglariously entered a store occupied by J. & H., with intent to commit larceny, is sufficient, without alleging that the occupants were partners, or that they owned the building and its contents.

3. Where there is no bill of exceptions, certain instructions asked by defendant, not shown by the transcript as either given or refused, and which are in no manner authenticated by the trial judge, do not form a part of the judgment roll, and will not be considered on appeal from the judgment.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Butte county; JOHN GALE, Judge.

The appellant, George Rogers, was convicted of the crime of burglary. Pen. Code Cal. § 459, provides: "Every person who enters any house * * * with intent to commit grand or petit larceny, or any felony, is guilty of burglary."

W. J. Herrin, for appellant. Lewis Freer and George A. Johnson, Atty. Gen., for the People.

FOX, J. Information and conviction of burglary. The appeal is from the judgment, and comes up on the judgment roll. The first point made by appellant is that the information failed to state facts constituting a public offense, and that the demurrer thereto should therefore have been sustained. The alleged defect consists in the omission of the word "feloniously." The information charges the offense in the language of the statute, and is sufficient. People v. Lewis, 61 Cal. 366.

The charge is that defendant burglariously entered the store occupied by Jones & Harding, with intent to commit larceny, etc. A point is made that it is not alleged that Jones & Harding were partners, or that they were the owners of the building or its contents. Under the Code definition of burglary, it was not necessary to allege the partnership, and the ownership of the building and its contents was sufficiently designated. People v. Henry, 77 Cal. 445, 19 Pac. Rep. 830.

It is claimed that the court erred in refusing to give certain instructions asked by defendant, which are set out in the transcript, numbered, respectively, 2, 3, and 5. The transcript does not show whether these instructions were given or refused. They are in no manner authenticated by the judge. There is no bill of exceptions, in or by which to make them a part of the record. They are, therefore, not a part of the judgment roll, (People v. January, 77 Cal. 179, 19 Pac. Rep. 258,) and cannot be considered by this court.

These are the only points made. Judgment affirmed.

We concur: PATERSON, J.; WORKS, J.

PEOPLE v. KEELEY. (No. 20,597.)

MALICIOUS MISCHIEF—INSTRUCTIONS—RECORD ON APPEAL.

1. Under Pen. Code Cal. § 596, providing that "every person who * * * maliciously exposes any poisonous substance, with intent that the same shall be taken or swallowed" by any animal, the property of another, shall be punished, an information need not state that the act was feloniously done, nor need it specify the poisonous substance, or state that it would kill.

2. An instruction that a malicious intent need not be proved by direct testimony, and that, if the jury found that the natural and probable results of an act would be to injure or destroy the property of another, no motive appearing from the evidence, malice may be implied, if the circumstances show a wicked, depraved, and wanton spirit, is not misleading, especially when followed by others, treating the subject fully and liberally.

3. Where an instruction found in the transcript is not brought up in a bill of exceptions, nor in any manner authenticated by the trial judge, nor indorsed as either given or refused, it forms no part of the record in the cause.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Yolo county; C. H. GAROUTTE, Judge.

Instructions 1 and 2, asked by the people, appear as follows in the transcript on appeal: "(1) The question as to the guilt of the defendant in this action involves two distinct propositions: First, was a poisonous substance, known as 'strychnine,' maliciously exposed in a watering trough belonging to the prosecuting witness, G. W. Oliver, with intent that it should be taken and swallowed by the horses of said Oliver? and, second, was such substance placed there by the defendant in this action? (2) In reference to the first proposition, if you find that such a substance was deposited in the watering trough of the witness Oliver, then it is not necessary that the intent shall be proved by the direct testimony of any witness. The jury have a right to infer the object and intent by all the circumstances of the case; and, if the jury find from the evidence that such an act was done by some one, and that the natural and probable results thereof would be to injure or destroy the property of another, and if no motive appears from the evidence, malice may be implied, if the circumstances of the commission of the act show a wicked, depraved, and wanton spirit. (Given as modified.) C. H. GAROUTTE, Judge."

Clark & Aram, for appellant. E. E. Gaddis, Dist. Atty., for the People.

FOX, J. The defendant was convicted of malicious mischief in putting a poisonous substance into a watering trough, with intent that the same should be taken and swallowed by the horses, etc. The appeal is from the judgment and the order denying a new trial. It is contended by the appellant that the information does not state that the crime was committed in Yolo county, the county in which the action was brought and tried. The making of such a point is trifling with the court, for the very first allegation of the information is that the offense charged was committed "on the twenty-fifth day of February, A. D. 1889, in the county of Yolo," etc.

The next point made is that the information does not charge a crime, in that it does not state that the act was feloniously done, and does not specifically name the poisonous subtance, or that it was a substance that would kill; and here we are treated to a long dissertation upon the fact that poison is found in a large number of substances used for food and for medicine, for both man and beast. But there can be no misunderstanding of what the statute (Pen. Code, § 596[1]) means when it uses the term "poisonous substance." The offense is charged in the language of the statute, and the charge is sufficient. People v. Lewis, 61 Cal. 366; People v. Henry, 77 Cal. 445, 19 Pac. Rep. 830; People v. Rogers, ante, 592, (filed November 18, 1889.) There is nothing in People v. Van Deleer, 53 Cal. 147, cited by appellant, in conflict with this conclusion. There the question was as to the sufficiency of the proof and the correctness of the charge.

Several exceptions are taken to instructions said to have been given at the request of the prosecution. A paper is found in the transcript headed "Instructions Asked by the People," containing paragraphs numbered from 1 to 11, inclusive. The first objection is to the paragraph marked 1, but that is not indorsed as either given or refused. It is in no manner authenticated by the judge, nor is it brought up in any bill of exceptions. Taken by itself, it cannot be considered by the court as part of the record in the cause. People v. January, 77 Cal. 179, 19 Pac. Rep. 258; People v. Rogers, supra. But paragraphs 1 and 2 must necessarily be read together, to make sense of them as an instruction. The latter is marked "given," and, reading them together, they make one complete instruction, not open to the objection made to either of them separately. Paragraph 2, even if taken by itself, as an independent instruction, is not open to the charge of being misleading, as claimed by appellant, especially when followed by the very full and liberal instructions given at the request of the defendant. Paragraph 3, to which exception is taken, is not authenticated as a part of the record, but even if given, was not erroneous. The same may be said of paragraph 6, to which exception is also taken.

[1] Pen. Code Cal. § 596, provides: "Every person who * * * maliciously exposes any poisonous substance, with the intent that the same shall be taken or swallowed" by any animal, the property of another, "is punishable by imprisonment in the state-prison not exceeding three years," etc.

It is also claimed that the evidence was insufficient to justify the verdict. Much of the evidence was circumstantial; but this, taken in connection with the direct evidence, made out a very strong case against the defendant. Circumstantial evidence was introduced tending to show that it was possible that the offense might have been committed by some other person; but it was for the jury to determine from all the evidence, and to be satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt, whether or not the defendant was the guilty party. They heard and saw all the witnesses, and were the sole judges of the credibility and weight to be given to each part of the evidence. We cannot say, from the evidence, that they were not fully justified in the conclusion which they reached.

There was no error in the rulings of the court in the admission of testimony, or in refusing to strike out portions that had been given. The objection now taken to the testimony of the committing magistrate was not taken in the court below, and cannot be taken in this court for the first time.

A point is also made upon the fact that the charge and conviction is for malicious mischief, and the judgment is one of imprisonment in the state prison. The judgment is fully authorized by section 596 of the Penal Code, under which the information is filed. Judgment and order affirmed.

Works, J. I concur in the judgment.

Paterson, J. I concur in the judgment on the ground that in the present condition of the record the questions raised by the appellant (except as to the sufficiency of the indictment, and there is no merit in that,) cannot be considered. There is no statement or bill authenticated by the judge.

Lee Chuck v. Quan Wo Chong Co. (No. 13,397.)

Writ of Possession—Appeal—Supersedeas—Bond—Record.

1. A writ of possession, obtained by plaintiff after judgment, for the possession of land and for treble rents for its detention, is not fully executed at the time of the making of an order staying execution of the writ and the giving of a bond by defendant, where it appears from the sheriff's return that he had only taken out of the building on the premises in question so much of the personal property levied on by him as was necessary to satisfy plaintiff's money judgment, and that he had been unable to remove the balance, as, while so engaged, the order staying execution had been served upon him, and where other evidence shows that the property remained in the possession and under the control of an employe of the sheriff, though the employe states in his affidavit that he holds by license of the plaintiff.

2. Under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1176, providing that in actions of forcible entry and unlawful detainer "an appeal taken by defendant shall not stay proceedings upon the judgment, unless the judge * * * before whom the same was rendered so directs," after the trial judge has directed a stay, and a bond has been given in the amount fixed by him, he cannot withdraw his direction, and discharge the order.

3. Under Code Civil Proc. Cal. §§ 941-945, providing for undertakings on appeal in certain cases, and section 946, providing that, whenever an appeal is perfected as provided in the foregoing sections, proceedings shall be stayed, the giving of a bond at the proper time and in due form will have that effect, without reference to the sufficiency or insufficiency of the sureties.

4. An order not contained in the transcript, but which, with leave of the supreme court, has been entered nunc pro tunc and certified up, forms part of the record.

Thornton, J., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; T. H. Rearden, Judge.

Defendant, the Quan Wo Chong Company appeals from an order discharging a rule on the sheriff ordering him to show cause why further proceedings under a writ of possession, obtained by plaintiff in judgment in his favor, under the landlord and tenant act, should not be stayed, and the property taken thereunder returned to defendant. Code Civil Proc. Cal. pt. 3, tit. 3, c. 4, in "Summary proceedings for obtaining possession of real estate in certain cases," after defining "forcible entry," (§ 1159,) "forcible detainer," (§ 1160,) and "unlawful detainer," (§ 1161,) provides, in § 1176: "An appeal taken by the defendant shall not stay proceedings upon the judgment, unless the judge or justice before whom the same was taken so directs."

Smith & Murasky and James F. Smith, for appellant. Chas. S. Wheeler, for respondent.

Works, J. This was an action to recover the possession of certain real estate in the city of San Francisco, under the landlord and tenant act, and for the recovery of treble rents for its detention. Trial was had, and judgment rendered in favor of the plaintiff; and a writ of possession was duly issued, and placed in the hands of the sheriff. The writ was partially executed when application was made by the defendant, asking that the judge of the court direct that proceedings be stayed on his filing the necessary undertaking. The order was made, and a bond was given, but the sheriff declined to stay proceedings, or to return the property that had been taken into possession by him to the defendant. The defendant then made application to the court for a rule upon the sheriff to show cause, why further proceedings should not be stayed, and the property returned and restored to the defendant. The order to show cause was duly issued; and, after a hearing, the court below discharged the rule, and declined to restore the defendant to possession. This appeal is from the last-named order, discharging the rule to show cause, and refusing to order the sheriff to restore the property to the defendant. It is claimed on the part of the defendant that, after the order directing a stay of proceedings upon the giving of a stay-bond, and the due execution of such bond, the court below had no further power or jurisdiction in the matter, and that the defendant was entitled upon the execution of such bond to the immediate restoration of the property. On the other hand, the plaintiff and respondent contends that at the time the first order, staying proceedings, was made, and the bond executed, the writ of restitution had been fully executed, and the plaintiff put in possession of the property, and that for that reason the order upon the sheriff was inoperative, and that he could not restore the property to the defendant.

The main question, therefore, is whether or not the writ of restitution had been fully executed at the time the first order for a stay of proceedings was given. In the answer of the plaintiff to the order to show cause why the proceedings should not be stayed, and the property be restored to the defendant, it was averred "that at the hour of 11 o'clock, or thereabouts, on said 22d day of December, 1888, the sheriff of the city and county of San Francisco fully executed said writ, so far as the same required the delivery of the possession of said premises, by formally delivering over the possession thereof to plaintiff's agents; and that this plaintiff, by his agents, has held the continual and exclusive possession thereof ever since said time, and that he has refused, and still refuses, to allow the defendant to enter thereon; that, after the sheriff had taken away from said premises a portion of the personal property levied upon, the order of this honorable court, staying further proceedings, was served upon said sheriff, or his deputy; and that thereafter, for the protection of said sheriff, and for the protection of said defendant, and for the protection of this plaintiff, this plaintiff granted permission to said sheriff to place one or more persons on said premises, whose business it should be to look after the personal property belonging to defendant thereon; that, under the license of this plaintiff, granted as aforesaid, said sheriff has had one or more persons upon such premises, in charge of said personal property, but that said persons claim no right whatever to the possession of the premises, and that this plaintiff is now, and ever since the delivery of the possession to him, as aforesaid has been, in the exclusive possession thereof; that plaintiff's agent in charge of said property is not now, nor has he been at any time mentioned herein, in the employ of the sheriff's office; that the writ of possession issued upon plaintiff's judgment was fully executed upon the part of the sheriff prior to any stay of execution herein; that plaintiff has obtained possession of said premises by virtue of his judgment herein, and in strict accordance with law, and if the defendant, through failure to obtain a stay of proceedings prior to the execution of plaintiff's writ, has suffered, it is not in the power of this court to relieve it from the consequences of its laches at the expense of plaintiff's rights." It further appears, from the affidavit of one John O'Shea that during all of the times mentioned he was in the employ of the sheriff of the city and county of San Francisco, and that he was in possession of the property, and was "then and there instructed by the sheriff that the possession of said premises had been surrendered to Lee Chuck, the plaintiff above named, and that said sheriff had no further right to the possession thereof; and that ever since said time he has been in charge of the personal property belonging to the defendant which is upon said premises; that he still continues to remain upon said premises, but that ever since the delivery thereof to plaintiff as aforesaid he has remained thereon by the license of said plaintiff; and that at no time since has he, nor has any other agent or employe of said sheriff, been in possession of said premises, but that the said Lee Chuck ever since said time has continued in possession thereof." The return of the sheriff, which was introduced in evidence, is as follows: "I hereby certify that, in obedience to the writ of possession issued in the case of Lee Chuck vs. Quan Wo Chong & Company, I did, on the 22d day of December, 1888, at 11 o'clock A. M., cause the therein named plaintiff to have quiet and peaceable possession of the premises therein described; that on the 21st day of December, 1888, under and by virtue of the said writ of possession, I levied upon certain personal property situate in said premises, and removed a portion of the same for safe-keeping to the warehouse of Davis, Heber & Company, auctioneers, San Francisco, where the same will be sold at public auction, at sheriff's sale, to satisfy the judgment recovered by the plaintiff in the said action. The other portion of the personal property so levied upon I have not been able to remove, as, while engaged in the act of removing, an order of this court, commanding me to release the property so levied upon, was served upon me, and I at once stayed all proceedings under said writ. This is a partial return only to the said writ, and is made under an order of court this day made and entered." It appears from these proceedings that the premises involved in this litigation were occupied and used by the defendant as a mercantile establishment, and the personal property therein was a stock of merchandise. The return of the sheriff, and other evidence, clearly shows that at the time the first order staying execution of the writ was made, and the stay-bond executed, the sheriff had only taken out of the building so much of the personal property as was necessary to satisfy the money judgment recovered by the plaintiff, and that the balance of the property still remained in the building. There was the utmost expedition on the part of the attorney for the plaintiff to procure his writ and obtain possession of the property, and this was done before the defendant or its attorney had notice that the judgment had been rendered, and before an opportunity to procure an order directing a stay of proceeding and give the necessary bond was given. The sheriff defied the first order of the court, or, to say the least, disregarded it, and, either before or after the order was made, turned over to the plaintiff, nominally, not only the possession of the real estate but of the defendant's stock of merchandise also. It is perfectly apparent, however, that this giving of possession was merely nominal, and with the hope of thereby showing a full execution of the writ. The misfortune of the showing is that it appears that the sheriff never had in fact turned over the possession to the plaintiff. On the contrary, the property remained in the possession and under the control of the employe of the sheriff. The fact relied upon, and stated in the affidavit of such employe, that he was there by the license of the plaintiff, does not seem to us to be a matter of any consequence.

In this class of cases an appeal taken by the defendant does not stay proceedings, unless the judge before whom the case is tried so directs. Code, Civil Proc. § 1176. In this case the direction was given and the undertaking executed in pursuance of the direction of the judge, and in the amount fixed by him. When this was done the proceedings were stayed precisely as in other cases. The judge of the court below having directed a stay, and the bond having been given, the court below had no further control over the matter. To allow the judge to give the necessary direction, and then, after the defendant had complied with his order, and the appeal and stay had been perfected, to permit him, without any statutory authority, to change his mind, and withdraw his direction or discharge such order, would lead to great uncertainty, inconvenience, and, in some cases, perhaps, to wrong and injustice.

In this case it is claimed by the respondent that two bonds were given; that the first was insufficient, the sureties not being good; that these proceedings took place before the second bond was given; and that, as at the time the proceedings took place no sufficient bond had been given, there was no stay of proceedings, and that none existed until the second one was given. We do not so understand the law. Sections 941, 942, 943, 944, and 945, of the Code of Civil Procedure provide for undertakings on appeal in certain cases. Section 946 provides that whenever an appeal is perfected as provided in the preceding sections proceedings shall be stayed. This must be so, without reference to the sufficiency or insufficiency of the sureties. It is only necessary, under these sections, that a bond be given at the proper time, and in due form. If the sureties are insufficient, pecuniarily, the opposite party has his remedy under section 948. He may, as provided in that section, except to the sureties at any time within 30 days after the filing of the undertaking; and, unless they, or other sureties, justify, as therein provided, within 20 days after the appellant has been served with notice of such exceptions, "execution of the judgment, order, or decree appealed from is no longer stayed." That is, the proceedings are stayed until the necessary exceptions are made, and time given for the sureties to justify, and no longer. It necessarily follows that if the same or other sureties do justify within the time allowed the stay continues, and the liability of the new sureties relates back to the time of the first stay. So the fact that two bonds were given is immaterial. Hill v. Finnigan, 54 Cal. 494, is not against this construction of the statute. There the sureties failed to justify, and the appellant claimed the right to file a new undertaking in this court.

It only remains to consider whether the writ was fully executed at the time the stay took effect. We think it was not. In order to constitute a full execution of the writ, the defendant and its property must have been removed from the premises, and the possession of the real estate given to the plaintiff, unless the removal of the personal property was in some way waived by the defendant. Crocker, Sher. § 554; Freem. Ex'ns, § 474; Smith v. White, 5 Dana, 376; Witbeck v. Van Rensselaer, 64 N. Y. 27. The case of Scott v. Richardson, 2 B. Mon. 507, is apparently in conflict with this well-settled rule; but in that case the goods were all removed from the dwelling-house, except a part of the household goods in the kitchen, which the sheriff intended to remove, but was prevented by an injunction. It was held that, the sheriff having turned all the previous occupants out of the house, and put the plaintiff into it, and given him possession by words as well as acts, and having removed the goods of the previous occupants out of the dwelling-house, he had done all that was essential to the full execution of the writ, and his return to that effect was proper. This was, as we understand the decision, to hold, in effect, that all of the household goods being removed, except a small part in the kitchen, was a substantial execution of the writ. In this case the sheriff never turned the possession of the property over to the plaintiff. His return says he did; but the facts stated by him in his return, and the affidavit of the party he left in charge of the property, show clearly that he did not. The stock of goods remained on the premises, and the sheriff remained there, in charge of them. It is true, it is claimed that the sheriff was not in possession of the real estate, but of the personal property; but the personal property being on the premises, and the sheriff there in possession and in charge of them, he was still, in contemplation of law, himself in possession, with his writ unexecuted.

It is claimed by the respondent that the record does not contain any such order as the one appealed from. But the appellant has, with leave of this court, had an order entered nunc pro tunc, certified up, which appears to be the proper order, and the fact that such an order was actually made is not controverted. We think this is sufficient. The order appealed from is reversed, with instructions to the court below to enter an order commanding the sheriff to restore the possession of the property in controversy to the defendant.

EJECTMENT—PARTIES—TERMINATION OF TENANCY—RECORD ON APPEAL.

1. In ejectment, where defendant relies on adverse possession, evidence that plaintiff's grantor claimed the property; that she had paid the taxes thereon; that defendant held an adjoining piece, as her tenant, with which the lot in controversy communicated; and that defendant had repeatedly admitted that he held the property in question as her tenant,—supports a verdict in plaintiff's favor.

2. Notice is not necessary to terminate a tenancy, where defendant in his answer denies plaintiff's title, and alleges ownership in himself.

3. Where land is purchased with the wife's earnings, the husband not making any claim thereto, and telling her that "everything you make is yours," it is the wife's separate property, and the husband need not be joined as plaintiff in ejectment for such land.

4. Affidavits, read on a motion for a new trial on the ground of newly-discovered evidence, which are not incorporated in the bill of exceptions, but merely marked by the clerk as having been used on the hearing, form no part of the record.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; T. K. WILSON, Judge.

Davis Louderback, for appellants. Joseph Kirk, for respondent.

HAYNE, C. Ejectment for a lot, 40x69½ feet, on the south-west corner of Filbert and Steiner streets, in the city of San Francisco. Verdict and judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. The defendants, who were husband and wife, had no paper title, but relied on adverse possession. The defendant J. C. Brennan says that one Hagan gave him possession in 1872, and told him to hold the lot for one Godfrin, known as "French Charlie," until his (Godfrin's) return; that no one had any right to it except Godfrin; and that "he didn't think the Frenchman would come back to claim it." Defendant Brennan then says: "I claimed it as mine from holding possession." But we think that the evidence shows he held the property as tenant of one Mrs. Weygant, who was the grantor of the plaintiff. He admits that he was her tenant as to adjoining property, but says that the tenancy did not apply to the lot in controversy. It is clear that Mrs. Weygant claimed the whole piece. It is covered by the decree of distribution of her husband's estate. One of defendant's own witnesses says, "I knew Mrs. Weygant always claimed this lot," and it was in evidence that Brennan told one Rushmore that Mrs. Weygant claimed it, and he acknowledges that she paid the taxes on it from 1872, which was the time he went into possession, up to 1883. And it is not likely that she would have allowed Brennan to hold the adjoining piece as her tenant from month to month for so long a period, if he had manifested any disposition to claim this lot as his own, when she was all the while claiming it as hers, and paying taxes on it. Both pieces were used as a "milk ranch." The lot in controversy was used as a calf corral, and for this purpose was separately inclosed. But it communicated with the other piece by bars, and there was no difference in the general use. Even in the absence of other evidence, we should regard his story of a difference in the way he held the two pieces as an exceedingly lame one. But there is other testimony. It is in evidence that he declared in 1883 to one Tilton, a real-estate broker, that the property belonged to Mrs. Weygant. "He said he was, and had been, holding possession of this lot for Mrs. Weygant. He was going to keep it until Mrs. Weygant says to give it up." And this conversation had reference to the lot in controversy. He told one Waterman, a police officer, on an occasion when he was tearing down a barn, that "he was taking it down for Mrs. Weygant. She couldn't do it herself,"—and that "this lot was Mrs. Weygant's." After he was arrested for tearing down the barn he repeated to the officer "that this property was Mrs. Weygant's, and that he tore down the barn for her; that he was there as her tenant." And when Rushmore was asserting some claim to the property he wrote to Mrs. Weygant the following letter: "San Francisco, May 15, 1883. Mrs. H. Weygant—Madam: The Lady Jane Rushmore, who is recorded as owner of the lot on the corner of Filbert and Steiner streets, was sent on last week to Stockton insane asylum. Her brother is negotiating with a man in the neighborhood to erect a building on the lot. I would like to have some authority or some legal standing, to be able to prevent him from doing so. If possible, I would like to see you. I do not like to leave from around the place night or day, for I hear this man Rushmore is bound to put some one to live on it, if not prevented. Hoping you and all the family are well, I remain, yours truly, J. C. BRENNAN. P. S. If you cannot come, please send me word what to do. J. C. BRENNAN." The lot in controversy is the lot "on the corner of Filbert and Steiner streets." The adjoining piece, owned by Mrs. Weygant, was not on the corner. And Brennan admits that he did "not know of any property about which there was a dispute between Mrs. Weygant and Rushmore, except it was this lot in litigation here." In view of all this testimony, we quite agree with the jury in the view they seem to have taken of the case.

The learned counsel insists, however, that if there was a tenancy it was not terminated by notice. "There was no evidence," he says, "of the termination of this alleged tenancy of this lot. * * * Even a tenancy at will requires a month's notice to terminate the same." But, in view of the denials in the answer of the ownership of the plaintiff, and the claim he sets up to be himself the owner, we hardly think that this position will avail him. Simpson v. Applegate, 75 Cal. 345, 17 Pac. Rep. 237.

It is argued for the appellants, however, that the plaintiff was a married woman, and that the property was community property; and that, therefore, their plea of nonjoinder of the husband as a party plaintiff should have been sustained. But the plaintiff testifies that her husband told her that "everything you make is yours;" and that she went into business for herself, and thereby earned the money with which she purchased the property. It does not appear that the husband makes any claim to the property. For all that appears to the contrary, he yields to the claim of his wife; and, under the circumstances, we think that the property must be considered to be the separate property of the plaintiff.

One of the grounds of the motion for new trial was newly-discovered evidence. Concerning this, it is sufficient to say the affidavits are not incorporated in a bill of exceptions, but are merely marked by the clerk as having been used on the hearing. But, if they could be considered, they are cumulative merely, and are not such as to render a different result probable, if a new trial were had; and, moreover, there is no sufficient showing of diligence. We therefore advise that the judgment and order appealed from be affirmed.

TYLER v. STONE et al. (No. 12,356.)

ASSUMPSIT—PROMISE TO PAY.

In an action to recover a sum of money alleged to have been loaned to defendants for 60 days, it appeared that a written contract had been entered into by the parties by which, in consideration of $1,200 advanced by plaintiff, he was to have 10,000 shares of stock, which were to be pooled for 60 days with 20,000 shares belonging to defendants, and sold by one of defendants for the mutual benefit of the parties, each receiving one-third of the proceeds. As the stock was sold, 50 cents per share was to be set aside as a fund, which, when it amounted to $1,200, was to be drawn by plaintiff, and charged to him as part of the money to be paid him; "he to be paid the $1,200 in any event." Held an unqualified promise to repay plaintiff the money advanced by him.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; F. W. LAWLER, Judge.

W. B. Tyler, for appellant. Craig & Meredith, for respondents.

FOOTE, C. This action was brought to recover the sum of $1,200, which Tyler claimed Smith and Stone had borrowed from and promised to repay him in 60 days from the date of the loan. Judgment passed for the defendants, from which, and an order denying a new trial, the plaintiff appeals. The written contract, which is made an exhibit to the complaint and offered in evidence, under the terms of which Tyler makes his claim, is: "Messrs. Stone and Smith are the owners of 100,000 shares of the Curtis Consolidated Mining Company's stock at Virginia. George W. Tyler advances $1,200 to Messrs. Stone and Smith, in consideration of which he is to have 10,000 shares of said stock, or its proceeds; 70,000 of said stock to be locked up absolutely, and not used; 30,000 shares to be put in a box, and to be drawn out by Stone, and sold for the mutual benefit of the three. When drawn out, 50 cents per share is to be placed in the box. When the box contains $1,200, same to be drawn by Tyler, and charged to him as part of the money to be paid him; he to be paid the $1,200 in any event. The pool to continue sixty days. Each of the three to receive one-third of the money for which the 30,000 shares are sold. At the end of sixty days, Stone and Smith to receive the 70,000 shares, and each to receive one-third of the 30,000 shares not sold. Settlement to be made on each Saturday afternoon at 2 o'clock. Witness our hands and seals, this 30th day of April, 1881. J. W. SMITH. [Seal.] H. S. STONE. [Seal.] GEO. W. TYLER. [Seal.]" According to its terms, it is plain that Tyler was at the end of 60 days to be repaid the $1,200 he had loaned, in any event, whether the pooling arrangement was successful or not. The evidence of Tyler and Smith, one of the defendants, corroborated the unambiguous language of the contract. Stone's testimony was contradictory to that evidence in some respects, although it did not attempt to deny the acknowledgment of indebtedness and promise on his part to repay the $1,200. There is no reason made apparent why the written contract should not be controlling in the matter. It is not susceptible of any other construction than that which the plaintiff puts upon it. It explains itself fully and clearly, and by it Tyler is entitled to recover all of the $1,200 which was to be repaid him, in any event, except what he may have already received. The inadmissible oral testimony tending to contradict the contract, and which is opposed to the evidence of Tyler and Smith, himself a defendant, should not be allowed to render nugatory the words of the written instrument. We therefore advise that the judgment and order be reversed.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; HAYNE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order are reversed.

THORNTON, J., (concurring.) I concur in reversing the judgment and order herein, on the ground that the decision of the court below is not justified by the evidence. Conceding that the evidence would have been excluded on objection that it was incompetent, for the reason that it tended to change the terms of a written agreement, yet, as it went in without objection, the court below was bound to consider it, and give it its due weight. I know of no rule of law which justifies any court in disregarding evidence of the character introduced in this case because, if objected to, it would have been ruled out. It was before the court on the trial of this case, and demanded consideration as much as the written agreement or any other matter testified to on the trial. Further, I am of the opinion that plaintiff was entitled to recover the $1,200 at the end of the 60 days. The $1,200 to be paid Tyler, under the express terms of the contract, "in any event," referred to the $1,200 mentioned first in the contract, which sum was advanced by plaintiff and was to be paid him "in any event,"—that is to say, whether or not the 30,000 shares were sold within the 60 days, and whether the 50 cents per share got into the box or not within the aforesaid period. If there was no sale, and no money got into the box, Tyler was still to have back the sum advanced when the 60 days had passed. This we think the fair and just construction of the contract, deducible from the words employed by the parties to express their meaning, and patent on the face of the contract. For the foregoing reasons given, I am of opinion that the judgment and order should be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

WADSWORTH v. WADSWORTH. (No. 12,445.)

DIVORCE—PLEADING—CROSS-COMPLAINT.

1. In an action to annul a marriage, a judgment for defendant, on his cross-complaint for divorce, obtained in absence of plaintiff's attorney, should be set aside on plaintiff's motion, made within six months, as a liberal rule should prevail in such cases.

2. Under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 442, providing that "whenever the defendant seeks affirmative relief against any party relating to or depending upon the contract * * * upon which the action is brought, * * * he may, in addition to his answer, file at the same time * * * a cross-complaint," the defendant in an action to procure the annulment of a marriage may have a cross-complaint for divorce, as such proceedings arise out of contract, within the meaning of this provision.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; F. W. LAWLER, Judge.

W. C. & I. G. Burnett, (Dorn & Dorn, of counsel,) for appellant. W. B. Tyler, for respondent.

HAYNE, C. This action was brought against William Wadsworth, Sr., for annulment of marriage, upon the ground that at the time of the marriage he had a wife living. William Wadsworth, Jr., was joined as a defendant, upon the alleged ground that the other defendant had transferred to him, without consideration, property purchased in part with funds of the plaintiff, and which would be community property if the marriage had been valid. William Wadsworth, Jr., made default. William Wadsworth, Sr., filed an answer, averring, in substance, the validity of the marriage. He filed with his answer a cross-complaint for a divorce from the plaintiff, on the ground of desertion. The plaintiff filed an answer to the cross-complaint, denying the desertion. By some inadvertence the attorney for the plaintiff did not appear at the trial, and she was not represented thereat. The court granted the defendant a divorce upon his cross-complaint. Within six months the plaintiff moved to have the judgment set aside, on the ground of excusable neglect. This motion was denied, and the plaintiff appeals from the order denying the motion. There is no bill of exceptions; but the stipulation made by the parties is, in our opinion, sufficient for the purposes of the appeal. Bonds v. Hickman, 29 Cal. 461; Solomon v. Reese, 34 Cal. 34.

1. So far as the divorce awarded to the defendant is concerned, the motion should have been granted, under the rule laid down in McBlain v. McBlain, 77 Cal. 509, 20 Pac. Rep. 61. In that case the court, per PATERSON, J., said: "The parties to the action are not the only people interested in the result thereof. The public has an interest in the result of every suit for divorce. The policy and the letter of the law concur in guarding against collusion and fraud; and it should be the aim of the court to afford the fullest possible hearing in such matters." In the present case there seems to have been an honest desire on the part of the plaintiff to present her side of the case; and while, in an ordinary action, the neglect shown might be sufficient to deprive her of a right to relief, yet in this kind of case a more liberal rule should prevail. And we think that the same reasons require the application of a liberal rule to proceedings for the annulment of marriage, and, therefore, that the judgment should have been set aside as to the whole case.

2. It is argued for the plaintiff that the defendant cannot have a cross-complaint in this kind of an action. And this question will necessarily arise when the case goes back to the trial court, and should be disposed of. It has long been the practice in this state for the trial courts to entertain cross-complaints in actions for divorce. Doubt was cast upon this practice by what was said in De Haley v. Haley, 74 Cal. 489, 16 Pac. Rep. 248. The point was not decided by that case, but MCKINSTRY, J. in the course of the opinion, said: "It may not be improper to remark that it is at least doubtful whether the Codes provide for a cross-complaint in actions for divorce,"—and he went on to explain why it was doubtful. The respect which we have for the opinion of that learned judge has induced us to make a careful examination of the subject. There can be no doubt that in the English ecclesiastical courts the defendant could have affirmative relief, not only upon a cross-demand, but even upon his answer, if the evidence showed that he was entitled to it. This was held in the case of Best v. Best, 1 Addams, Ecc. 411, 2 Eng. Ecc. R. 158. That was a suit for divorce a mensa et thoro, upon the ground of cruelty. The defendant set up the adultery of the plaintiff. No relief was granted to either party. But upon the authority of Sir George Saville's Case, (which began in 1740,) Dynely v. Dynely, decided in 1732, and Mathew v. Mathew, decided in 1769, the court laid down the rule above stated, and said: "That a cross-suit or separate citation is necessary, however, under such circumstances, has never been asserted that I am aware of, from that time to the present; and the practice of either, thus held to be optional, appears from that time to have been finally dispensed with." In Dysart v. Dysart, 1 Rob. Ecc. 106, in which the husband sued for a restitution of conjugal rights, and the wife sought a divorce on the ground of cruelty, Dr. LUSHINGTON said, with reference to the charge of cruelty: "If that charge be proved, it is clear that not only must the earl fail in obtaining the decree he prays for, but that the countess will be entitled to a decree of separation." But upon the evidence he held that the charge was not proved. In Clowes v. Jones, 3 Curt. Ecc. 185, it was held that in a suit by a husband for nullity of marriage it was competent for the wife, without taking out a cross-citation, to sue for a restitution of conjugal rights. In Anichini v. Anichini, 2 Curt. Ecc. 210, which was a suit for restitution of conjugal rights, (subsequently turned into a suit for a separation,) Dr. LUSHINGTON denied the plaintiff's prayer, and granted the defendant's application for a separation. In reference to this subject, Mr. Poynter, in his treatise on the Doctrine and Practice of Ecclesiastical Courts Relative to the Subject of Marriage and Divorce, (2d Ed. pp. 241, 242,) says: "To bar a suit for the restitution of conjugal rights, facts of cruelty or adultery may be counter-pleaded, as constituting lawful grounds for a separation; and, when so counter-pleaded, merely for the purpose of barring suit, evidence less circumstantial than what is required to warrant a sentence of divorce in an original suit may possibly be held to be sufficient. But, if the counter-plea of cruelty or adultery happen to be sufficiently proved, the defendant in the suit for restitution is not only entitled to be dismissed from that complaint, but the suit may in effect change its character, at the prayer of the complainant, who becomes entitled to a sentence of divorce, as if in a suit promoted for that specific object." And the learned author appends to the above text the following note: "Anciently, in all matrimonial suits wherein adultery was intended to be offered on behalf of the defendant, a cross-suit, or, at least, a citation of the plaintiff to answer to that charge, returnable in the original suit, was held to be requisite; but it was solemnly determined by the delegates in Sir George Saville's Case that, in a suit for the restitution of conjugal rights, adultery may not only be pleaded in bar, but a divorce may be had in consequence of it. Best v. Best, 1 Addams, Ecc. 412." And Mr. Bishop says, with reference to the practice: "The flexibility of the practice in the ecclesiastical courts has already been mentioned. In it parties were in effect both plaintiff and defendant at the same time. So that, for example, one proceeded against for divorce a mensa et thoro, or for nullity of the marriage, or for restitution of conjugal rights, not only could bring forward a competent wrong, done by the other party, in defense of the suit, but, if he succeeded in his proofs, he could have the proper sentence rendered in his favor as though he were the original plaintiff." 2 Bish. Mar. & Div. (6th Ed.) § 316. The matter has been regulated in England by statutes, among which may be mentioned 29 and 30 Vict. c. 32, § 2. And the subsequent practice has been accordingly. See, generally, Blackborne v. Blackborne, L. R. 1 Prob. & Div. 563; Brown v. Brown, L. R. 3 Prob. & Div. 202; D. v. D., L. R. 10 Prob. Div. 75; Moore v. Moore, L. R. 12 Prob. Div. 193.

The practice in the English ecclesiastical courts has not been adopted in America to its full extent; that is to say, the defendant cannot have affirmative relief upon his answer alone, unless it be in the states of Georgia and Nebraska. See Owen v. Owen, 54 Ga. 526; Shafer v. Shafer, 10 Neb. 468, 6 N. W. Rep. 768. But the practice of giving affirmative relief in a cross-complaint, or, as it is sometimes called, a "counter-claim," prevails in many of the states. In some of the states there is express provision of statute to this effect. See Stoner v. Stoner, 9 Ind. 505; Glasscock v. Glasscock, 94 Ind. 163; Ficke v. Ficke, 62 Mo. 337. Compare Hoffman v. Hoffman, 43 Mo. 547. In other states where the practice prevails, we have not been able to ascertain whether there is an express provision of statute or not. See Hoff v. Hoff, 48 Mich. 281, 12 N. W. Rep. 160; Sterl v. Sterl, 2 Ill. App. 223; Lee v. Lee, 1 Duv. 196. But in New York, where there is only a general statute as to counter-claims, the practice prevails. See Campbell v. Campbell, 12 Hun, 636; Bleck v. Bleck, 27 Hun, 296; McNamara v. McNamara, 2 Hilt. 548; Waltermire v. Waltermire, 110 N. Y. 183, 17 N. E. Rep. 739. And so in Iowa. See Wilson v. Wilson, 40 Iowa, 233. And the point has been expressly ruled in Oregon. There the general provision is as follows: "The counter-claim of the defendant shall be one upon which a suit might be maintained by the defendant against the plaintiff in the suit; and, in addition to the cases specified in the subdivisions of section 72, (of the Code,) it is sufficient if it be connected with the subject of the suit." This provision was held sufficient to warrant a cross-demand for divorce, and the court, per LORD, C. J., said: "To compel the defendant to bring a new suit, and go over the same evidence, which could be as well given in the existing action, would be vexatious, and, in fact, unnecessary. On the other hand, to allow such an answer, the rights of the parties could be adjusted in one suit, and much inconvenience and delay avoided. It is always desirable that there be as speedy a determination of litigation as is consistent with a proper examination and consideration of the case." Dodd v. Dodd, 14 Or. 338, 13 Pac. Rep. 509. With reference to the American practice, Mr. Bishop says: "The practice of bringing a cross-suit by the defendant against the plaintiff, to aid the defense and obtain affirmative relief, may be resorted to in divorce cases the same as in any other. It is permissible equally whether the proceeding is by bill in equity, by libel corresponding to the ecclesiastical libel, or by a statutory complaint. The subject needs no particular illustration. Even, it has been held, a defendant may maintain his cross-bill for divorce, though he has not the statutory residence in the state necessary in an original complaint." 2 Bish. Mar. & Div. (6th Ed.) § 318. The prevalence of the practice in other jurisdictions is very persuasive of its convenience and efficiency. And that it is convenient and safe would seem to result from general principles. Why should not all the marital difficulties of a couple be adjusted in a single suit? A suit for divorce, under our system, has been held to be a suit in equity. Lyons v. Lyons, 18 Cal. 448; Sharon v. Sharon, 67 Cal. 185, 7 Pac. Rep. 456, 635, 8 Pac. Rep. 709. Is there any principle of equity which favors litigation by piecemeal? In the majority of cases, if affirmative relief can be granted to the defendant at all, it can be granted upon the evidence introduced upon the issues raised upon the complaint; or, at all events, such evidence is pertinent and material upon the cross-demand. In such cases, what useful purpose would be subserved by compelling the defendant to face the expense and delay of another suit, in which substantially the same evidence is to be introduced? It has long been usual in this state to have such relief on cross-complaint; and in at least two cases the practice has been impliedly sanctioned by the supreme court. See Coulthurst v. Coulthurst, 58 Cal. 239; Bovo v. Bovo, 63 Cal. 77. And it is safe to say that the remarks in De Haley v. Haley took the profession by surprise.

Is the language of the statute broad enough to warrant this widely extended and useful practice? The provision is as follows: Sec. 442. "Whenever the defendant seeks affirmative relief against any party, relating to or depending upon the contract or transaction upon which the action is brought, or affecting the property to which the action relates, he may, in addition to his answer, file at the same time —or, by permission of the court, subsequently—a cross-complaint. The cross-complaint must be served upon the parties affected thereby, and such parties may demur or answer thereto as to the original complaint." It is said in De Haley v. Haley that "an action for divorce is not brought on the 'contract' of marriage, but upon certain violations of duties or obligations annexed to the status of matrimony." It is submitted, however, that to construe the phrase "contract * * * upon which the action is brought," either in the strict common-law sense in which an action is brought "upon" a contract, or so as to confine its operation to suits affirming the validity of the contract and seeking to enforce it, would be to take an extremely narrow view of the provision, and to materially restrict its operation. A suit to rescind a contract, for example, would not be "upon" the contract, in the above senses, and yet it cannot be doubted that the defendant in a suit to rescind a contract could maintain a cross-complaint for specific performance of the contract, if the facts of the case entitle him to specific performance. But a suit to rescind a contract is no more "upon" the contract, in the above senses, than is a suit for divorce. It may be conceded that the married state is a status. But it is a status which results from a contract. Civil Code, § 55. And when the status is dissolved the contract is certainly not left in force. If not left in force, it must be dissolved by the decree. And, if so, the suit is, at least in part, for the dissolution of a contract. This being so, may not the cross-demand be said to be one "relating to * * * the contract * * * upon which the action is brought," in the sense of the statute? In an Iowa case the court held that the relief was within the meaning of the statute of that state in relation to counter-claims, saying: "The plaintiff seeks to annul the marriage contract on account of an alleged violation of it by defendant. The defendant, upon the other hand, seeks to annul the same contract on account of violations of the same by the plaintiff. The matters alleged arise out of the contract set forth in the petition, and are connected with the subject of the action." Wilson v. Wilson, 40 Iowa, 233. We think, therefore, that upon principle as well as upon authority there may be a cross-complaint in an action for divorce. And the rule seems to us to apply in actions for annulment of marriage. The demurrer was to the effect that William Wadsworth, Jr., should not have been joined as a party defendant. Compare Way v. Way, 67 Wis. 662, 31 N. W. Rep. 15. But this question does not arise upon appeal by plaintiff on order refusing to set aside a judgment in favor of the defendant. We advise that the order appealed from be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial upon all the issues.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; VAN CLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the order appealed from is reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial upon all the issues.

SPERRY & Co. v. PERCIVAL MILLING Co.

(No. 12,064.)

TRADE-MARKS—INFRINGEMENT—EVIDENCE.

In an action to enjoin defendant from counterfeiting certain trade-marks and labels of plaintiff, it appeared that the packages used by plaintiff and defendant were of the same size, shape, and material, with labels of the same size, shape, and position, which were printed in the same colors, with the same alternations; that wherever on plaintiff's label there was a progressive increase of the size of letters, there was the same on defendant's label; that the sentences and pictures on the latter were very similar to those on the former, and in some instances were the same; that the word "germ," used by defendant, was similar in sound and appearance to the word "germea," coined by the plaintiff; that the words "Trade-Mark Registered," in similar colors, type, and position, were on both packages, though defendant had not registered any trade-mark at the time the action was brought, while plaintiff's labels were registered several years before the infringement complained of began. It further appeared that the person who prepared defendant's package and labels had those of plaintiff before him; and one witness testified that he dealt in both articles, keeping the packages side by side, and when asked for the plaintiff's article he had sold that of defendant. Held, that plaintiff was entitled to judgment.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Sonoma county; JOHN G. PRESSLEY, Judge.

Newlands, Allen & Herrin, for appellant. Wm. B. Haskell and T. J. Geary, for respondent.

MCFARLAND, J. Plaintiff and defendant are both corporations; and the action is to enjoin defendant from counterfeiting, etc., certain trade-marks, labels, etc., of plaintiff, and for damages. The court found certain facts, upon which it rendered judgment for defendant; and plaintiff appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying a new trial. The main contention of appellant is that the conclusions of law reached by the court below were erroneous, and that, upon the findings of fact, the judgment should have been for plaintiff.

From March, 1883, to the commencement of this action—February 4, 1886—plaintiff and its assignors were engaged in manufacturing, by the roller process, and selling, a certain meal, made from wheat and used for mush, etc., to which they gave the coined name "Germea." Down to within one month of the commencement of this action this commodity was exclusively put up by plaintiff in certain packages, with certain labels, etc., thereon, which were registered with the secretary of state as a trade-mark, in May, 1883. About a month before the commencement of the action, defendant began the manufacturing and selling of a meal made by the roller process from wheat, and put it up in packages, with labels thereon, which plaintiff avers to be an infringement of its said trade-mark. Defendant had not registered any trade-mark at the date of the commencement of the action, but did so four days afterwards. The findings consist, in addition to the above facts, mainly, of fac similes of the packages and labels of the two parties; or, rather, the actual labels are pasted into the findings, so that, by looking at the transcript, an observer can see the two packages just as they appeared to purchasers. As their significance depends greatly upon the various colors used, it would be difficult to reproduce them here, and we see no necessity of attempting it. And we will confine ourselves to a very brief statement of the similarity of, and difference between, the two packages.

1. The two packages were of exactly the same size, shape, weight, and color. They were each of cylindrical shape, eight inches long, and four inches in diameter, and were composed of paper bags of the same kind and color.

2. On the top of plaintiff's packages there was a small, square label, with the words "Sperry & Co.," and underneath the word "Germea." There were also a few other words on the label. On the top of defendant's package there was also a small, square, label, very similar to that of plaintiff, but having printed on it the words "Golden Eagle," and underneath the word, "Germ."

3. On one side of plaintiff's package is a label, on light-brown paper, about six inches long and three inches wide, with a small red border. On the upper side are the words, printed in blue, "Germea for Breakfast." Next below are the words, in blue, "Ask your grocer for." Immediately below this are the words, in blue also, and in a large type, "Sperry's New Process," and below that, in still larger type, and in blue, the words "Patent Flour." On the end of the label, and outside of the red border, are the words, in blue, "Trade-Mark Registered." On a similar side of defendant's package there is a label of a similar size and paper to that of plaintiff; having, also, a small, red border, and with all the words, also, printed in blue. On the upper side are the words "Golden Eagle Germ," and immediately below, "Breakfast Dish." Immediately below that are the words "Ask Your Grocer for;" then, next below, in large type, "Percival's New Process;" and last below, in still larger type, "Patent Flour." At the end, also, outside the red border, are the words, "Trade-Mark Registered."

4. On plaintiff's package, next to the above label, was another label, of similar size and paper. On the top of the label there is the word "Germea" printed in red letters; and immediately below this word is a picture of plaintiff's mill, in blue color. It represents a main building, five stories high, with a flag-staff and flag on top, and lower wings on either side. Below this are several sentences, commending the commodity as nutritious and agreeable food. All these sentences are printed in blue, except the word "Germea," which, whenever it is used, is printed in red. The name of plaintiff is then given in red, and the words "Trade-Mark Registered" at the bottom, in blue. At the same place on its package the defendant had a label of the same size and kind of paper. On the top were the words "Golden Eagle," in red; and immediately below these words there is also a picture, in blue, of a building almost exactly like the one of plaintiff's label. It represents a main building, five stories high, with a flag-staff and flag on top, and lower wings on either side. It is almost impossible to detect any material difference in the two pictures. It is not a picture of defendant's mill. Below the picture are the words, in red, "Germ. Breakfast Dish." Next come several sentences, in blue, in commendation of the article. Below that is the name of the proprietors, in red; and last, the words "Trade-Mark Registered," in blue.

5. On plaintiff's package there appears next a label, similar in size to the others, on the top of which is the word, in red, "Sperry's." Immediately below, in large, heavy, blue letters, is the word "Germea," and next below, in red, "For Breakfast." Then follows four sentences, in blue, containing directions for the use of the article. At the bottom, "Trade-Mark Registered," in blue. A similar label on defendant's package has at the top, in red, the word "Directions." Then, after the words "For using the," in small type, come the words "Golden Eagle Germ," in large, heavy, blue letters, and next below, in red, "Breakfast Dish." Then follow four sentences of directions for use,—all in blue, except three words,—and "Trade-Mark Registered," in blue.

6. Another, and the last, label of the plaintiff has at the top the word, in red, "Germea;" and immediately below it is a picture of a child eating mush out of a bowl, all in blue. Below the picture are the words, in red, "For Breakfast;" and next the words, in blue, "No soaking required." Below that are the words, in red, "Cooks thoroughly in a few minutes;" and then the figure and word, in blue, "4 Pounds." And then, after the names and place of business of the proprietor, come the words, in red, "For sale by all the grocers," with the final "Trade-Mark Registered," in blue. On a corresponding label of defendant there is at the top, in red, "Golden Eagle;" next, below, in red, "Germ;" and then, below, in red, "Breakfast Dish." Immediately below that is a picture, in blue, of two children eating mush out of a bowl. Next below are the words, in red, "Cooks thoroughly in a few minutes;" and below that, in blue, "4 Pounds." Then follows the name and place of business of the defendant; and next below, in red, "For sale by all the grocers;" followed by the inevitable "Trade-Mark Registered," in blue. And during all this time the defendant had no "Trade-Mark Registered."

The above descriptions do not create in the mind an entirely accurate notion of the similarity of appearance presented by the two packages. It sufficiently appears from them, however, that the two packages were of the same size and shape, and of the same kind of paper; that the labels were of the same size and shape, and placed on the packages in the same manner; that on the labels the same colors were used, and that the alternations of the colors were the same; that wherever there is a progressive increase of the size of letters and words in plaintiff's labels, there is a similar progressive increase in the labels of defendant; that the word "germ," used by defendant is very similar in appearance and sound to the word "germea," coined by plaintiff; that the sentences printed on defendant's labels are very similar to those on plaintiff's labels, and in many instances (see subdivision 6 of this opinion) exactly the same; that the words "Trade-Mark Registered" are on each package, in the same type and color, and at the same place,—outside the red border; that the two pictures of plaintiff (of the mill and the child) are copied by defendant, the one literally, and the other nearly so; and that the two packages, as above described, would produce on the eye of a purchaser a similar impression. And, when we view the two packages, shown as entireties in the transcript, their close similarity is unquestionable. In our opinion, upon the facts found, the judgment should have been for plaintiff.

The rule governing such cases is that if the imitation of a trade-mark is intentionally so close as to deceive an ordinary purchaser, the defendant is liable; and the fact that an attentive inspection will disclose differences in even many respects between the two articles will not shield him. In Lockwood v. Bostwick, 2 Daly, 521, the suit was for an injunction to restrain the defendants from using a label bearing the name "Bovina," on the ground that it was an imitation of a label used by plaintiffs, bearing the name "Boviline;" the labels having also, otherwise, a close resemblance to each other. Judgment for plaintiff was sustained, and the court, in its opinion, uses language which clearly expresses the correct rule, and is also directly applicable to the case at bar. The court, speaking of the two labels, says: "The design, evidently, was to depart from the other sufficiently to constitute a difference when the two were compared, and yet to do it so skillfully that the difference would not be detected by an ordinary purchaser, unless his attention was particularly called to it, and he had a very perfect recollection of the other label. The design was to deceive, and to obtain, in the manufacture and sale of the article, any benefit or advantage that might be gained by its being purchased for another article of the same description, which was known and distinguished by a particular trade-mark. There could be no other motive, and it was done with the shallow expectation that the law would not see through the motive, but pronounce that the two labels were not the same, by simply distinguishing the points of difference between them." In McLean v. Fleming, 96 U. S. 245, the supreme court of the United States says: "What degree of resemblance is necessary to constitute an infringement is incapable of exact definition, as applicable to all cases. All that courts of justice can do in that regard is to say that no trader can adopt a trade-mark so resembling that of another trader as that ordinary purchasers, buying with ordinary caution, are likely to be misled. * * * Much must depend, in every case, upon the appearance and special characteristics of the entire device; but it is safe to declare, as a general rule, that exact similitude is not required to constitute an infringement or to entitle the complaining party to protection. If the form, marks, contents, words, or the special arrangement of the same, or the general appearance of the alleged infringer's device, is such as to be likely to mislead one in the ordinary course of purchasing goods, and induce him to suppose that he was purchasing the genuine article, then the similitude is such as entitles the injured party to equitable protection." We have quoted from these two cases because the language employed in the opinions aptly expresses the true rule. There are numerous authorities to the same point. And it clearly appears that in the case at bar the defendant did the precise thing which the authorities declare an infringement. The testimony shows that the person who prepared the bags and labels of defendant had the bag and label of plaintiff before him; and the witness Siegelken,—the only witness who testified directly on the point,—after stating that he was a grocer, said: "I have sold, right along, 'Germea' and 'Germ,' and am familiar with both packages. I have had both brands, and sold them. When customers have asked for 'Germea,' I have handed them out 'Germ.' I have them side by side." But this testimony was not necessary to show either the intent or its fulfillment. Both clearly appear upon the face of the packages, as they are presented in the findings.

These views make it unnecessary to notice other points raised by appellant. It is proper to say, however, that there are no grounds for granting respondent's request to strike out the transcript or dismiss the appeal; and, as the appellant waives all claims for damages, and all relief asked for under paragraphs 2, 3, and 4 of the prayer of the complaint, there is no necessity of a new trial. The judgment and order are reversed, with directions to the court below to render a judgment for plaintiff, decreeing an injunction as prayed for in the first paragraph in the complaint, with costs, but without damages, or other relief prayed for.

In re MOORE'S ESTATE. (No. 13,139.)

EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS — NEGLECT OF DUTY.

The fact that an administration has not been completed, though 14 years have elapsed since the appointment of the administrator, is prima facie evidence of neglect of duty on his part, and, in the absence of satisfactory explanation of the delay, supports a finding that the administrator has wrongfully and willfully neglected the estate, and has unnecessarily, willfully, and wrongfully prolonged its administration, to its great detriment, and justifies his removal, and the revocation of his letters of administration.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Santa Clara County; PHIL W. KEYSER, Judge.

This proceeding to obtain the removal of Thomas W. Moore as administrator of the estate of William H. Moore, deceased, was instituted in the superior court of Santa Cruz county by W. H. Moore, a son and heir at law of the decedent, but was subsequently removed to the superior court of Santa Clara county.

Hall & Rodgers, (Warren Olney, of counsel,) for appellant. Charles B. Younger, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This appeal is from an order removing appellant, and revoking his letters of administration, as administrator of said estate. Said order is based upon a finding that "the said Thomas W. Moore has wrongfully and willfully neglected said estate, and has unnecessarily, willfully, and wrongfully prolonged the administration of said estate, and to the great detriment thereof." The question whether the finding is justified by the evidence is the only one which we shall now consider.

It clearly appears that appellant was appointed and entered upon the discharge of his duties as administrator of said estate in the early part of the year 1873, and the petition for his removal was filed July 14, 1887. Between the appointment and the filing of the petition more than 14 years had elapsed. This was prima facie evidence of neglect, and we fail to find any satisfactory explanation of this long delay consistent with the duty of the administrator to wind up the administration within a reasonable period. The power of removal for the cause specified is vested in the superior court; and "with the exercise of this power, so necessary to the protection and security of estates, an appellate court should not interfere, unless it be clearly shown that there had been a gross abuse of discretion by the probate court. The facts of this case, as disclosed by the record, establish no such abuse of discretion." Deck's Estate v. Gherke, 6 Cal. 666. Order affirmed.

CORPORATIONS—DIRECTORS—DUTY TO POST STATEMENTS.

1. Under St. Cal. 1880, p. 134, providing that on failure to make and post, on the first Monday of each month, an itemized account of all disbursements and receipts during the preceding month, the directors of a mining corporation shall be liable to any stockholder complaining thereof in the sum of $1,000 liquidated damages, negligence on the part of the directors appears on showing their failure to make and post the account on the first Monday in the month, though it is admitted that they did not have the necessary information to make it, and the burden is on the directors to show exculpatory circumstances.

2. The statute being mandatory as to the time when the account is to be made and posted, the penalty attaches on the failure to do so on the first Monday in the month; and a complaining stockholder may recover for the failure, though the account is made and posted before the beginning of the action.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JAMES G. MAGUIRE, Judge.

J. F. Cowdery, for appellants. E. F. Swortfiguer, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. C. The plaintiff commenced this action to recover judgment against the defendants for $1,000 liquidated damages, with costs of suit, under the provisions of an act of the legislature of this state, approved April 23, 1880, (St. 1880, p. 134.) The case was submitted in the court below upon an agreed statement of facts, and judgment was given for plaintiff as prayed for in his complaint. The appeal is from the judgment, and rests on the judgment roll. The facts of the case, as they were agreed to and found by the court, are as follows: In September, 1880, the Pittsburg Gold Mining Company was a corporation, organized under the laws of this state, for the purpose of mining, and having its office and principal place of business at the city and county of San Francisco. The capital stock was $10,000,000, divided into 100,000 shares; and of this stock during the said month of September, and until long after the commencement of this action, the plaintiff was the owner and holder of 230 shares. On the 18th day of September, 1880, the defendants were duly elected directors of the said corporation, and from thence until the time of the commencement of this action, and for a long time thereafter, were and remained the duly elected, qualified, and acting directors thereof. The corporation also had a president and secretary, who were duly elected, qualified, and acting as such. During the month of October, 1880, work was being prosecuted in the mine held and owned by the corporation, and ore was being extracted and taken from the mine, and sent to mill for reduction, and bullion was obtained therefrom. The corporation also received and disbursed during the month considerable sums of money, and incurred indebtedness and liabilities which were existing on the first Monday of November following. The defendants, as such directors, did not make or post, or cause to be made or posted, on the first Monday of November, 1880, or at any time prior to the 19th day of that month, the itemized account or balance-sheet, or any account or balance-sheet whatever, for the previous month of October, as required by the act of the legislature above referred to. The defendants, as such directors of the corporation, and the president and secretary thereof, did not, nor did either or any of them, obtain the information necessary to the making of the itemized account or balance-sheet for the month of October, 1880, required by the said act, prior to the 15th day of November, 1880; but on the 19th day of that month, and the day before the commencement of this action, an itemized account or balance-sheet for the previous month of October, in substance and form as required by the statute, was made, verified, and posted in a conspicuous place in the office of the corporation by the president and secretary thereof.

It is contended for appellants that the conclusion of law drawn by the court from the foregoing facts, that plaintiff was entitled to judgment, was not warranted, and that the judgment should therefore be reversed. The argument is that, while it does not appear why the defendants failed on the first Monday in November to have the information necessary to enable them to comply with the law, still all presumptions must be indulged in their favor. The presumptions invoked are declared in subdivisions 1, 15, 20, 28, 33, § 1963, Code Civil Proc., and are that a person is innocent of crime or wrong; that official duty has been regularly performed; that the ordinary course of business has been followed; that things have happened according to the ordinary course of nature, and the ordinary habits of life; that the law has been obeyed. It is said the law never exacts impossibilities; and, it being admitted that defendants did not have the necessary information before the 15th of November, the burden was cast upon the plaintiff to show negligence on their part. On the other hand, it is contended for respondent that the statute is arbitrary in its requirements; that if defendants had any cause or excuse for their failure to obtain the necessary information, other than their own negligence, the burden was upon them to show it; and that, in the absence of such showing, they were rightly held to have incurred the penalty imposed by the statute, and must bear the consequences.

The act of the legislature under which the respondent asserts his right to recover applies only to corporations formed under the laws of this state for the purpose of mining; and the portions of it necessary to be considered are found in sections 1 and 3, and are as follows: "Sec. 1. It shall be the duty of the directors, on the first Monday of each and every month, to cause to be made an itemized account or balance-sheet for the previous month, embracing a full and complete statement of all disbursements and receipts, showing from what sources such receipts were derived, and for what and to whom such disbursements or payments were made, and for what object or purpose the same were made; also all indebtedness or liabilities incurred or existing at the time, and for what the same were incurred, and the balance of money, if any, on hand. Such account or balance-sheet shall be verified under oath by the president and secretary, and posted in some conspicuous place in the office of the company." "Sec. 3. In case of the failure of the directors to have the reports and accounts current made and posted as in the first section of this act provided, they shall be liable, either severally or jointly, to an action by any stockholder in any court of competent jurisdiction complaining thereof, and, on proof of such refusal or failure, such complaining stockholder shall recover judgment for $1,000 liquidated damages, with costs of suit." The requirement of the statute is clear that the account or balance-sheet must be made and posted on the first Monday of the month. No exceptions are provided for. The appellants failed to comply with this requirement. This is alleged and admitted. The corporate powers, business, and property of the corporation were exercised, conducted, and controlled by the appellants. Section 305, Civil Code. They knew, or ought to have known, at all times, the condition of the business and property under their control; and what they ought to have known they must be presumed to have known, unless they were negligent in the discharge of their duties. Nothing was required to be set out in the account except what, as directors, they were expected to know. The admission, therefore, unexplained, that they lacked the information necessary to enable them to make and post the account in time, seems to present simply a case of neglect or disregard of duty. It may be that, under possible circumstances, the directors of a corporation, when they have failed to comply strictly with the law, should be held excused. For example, the president or secretary, or both of them, might be taken sick or die, rendering it impossible for the account to bc made, verified, and posted in time. But, i so, the facts must be within the knowledg of the directors, who are sued, and shoul be set forth and proved. Under the circumstances shown in this case, we fail to se how the presumptions invoked by appellants can be held applicable to the case They were not charged with a crimina wrong, but with neglect to perform a dut enjoined by statute; and it is evident that their official duty in this respect was not regularly performed, and that the law was not obeyed.

It is further claimed for appellants that they ought not to be made to pay the penalty imposed upon them, because the account required was in fact made and posted the day before the action was commenced. But we find nothing in the statute, or in the supposed reason for its passage, to warrant such a defense. The statute seems to be as mandatory in regard to time as it is in other respects; and the first Monday of the month, and not the commencement of the action, is the time after which the penalty attaches. If the theory of appellants is right, then, though the directors of a corporation should delay making out and posting the account for six months or a year, they could still escape the consequences of their negligence if they should succeed in getting in ahead of the complaining stockholder by a day, or even an hour. We do not think this theory can be maintained. In Loveland v. Garner, 71 Cal. 544, 12 Pac. Rep. 616, the court, speaking of the same statute, said: "The plaintiff is entitled to recover, if he has alleged and can prove the defendants to have been guilty of failure on the first Monday of any one month 'to have the reports and accounts current made and posted, as in the first section of this act provided.'" The cases cited for appellants do not meet the case. We find nothing in the record to justify a reversal of the judgment, and therefore advise that it be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNE, C.; VAN CLIEF, C.

WILLS—CONSTRUCTION—DECLARATIONS OF TESTATOR—HOMESTEAD.

1. A testator devised to his wife one-half "of all my property of which I may die possessed," and to his children the remaining half. Held, that as to community property the devise to the wife was of one-half of his moiety.

2. Evidence of what the testator said, just before his death, to his executor, as to what was intended by the will, and who wrote it, the declarations having been made five years after the making of the will, is inadmissible in a proceeding to construe the will.

3. After the homestead has been set apart to the widow, the court has no jurisdiction over it for the purpose of distribution.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; JOHN ELLSWORTH, Judge.

Appeal by certain legatees (children of Robert Gilmore, the deceased) from a decree of distribution giving to the widow of decedent three-fourths of an estate, under a will directing that she take one-half of all the property of which the testator should die possessed.

F. B. Ogden, for appellants. Nye & Richardson, for respondent.

VAN CLIEF, C. Appeal from decree of distribution under the following provisions of the will: "Thirdly. I give and bequeath to my wife, Elizabeth Gilmore, one-half of all my property, both real and personal, of which I shall be possessed at the time of my death, the same to be equitably divided by my executors, giving to her the privilege of taking her half of said real and personal property, if the same can be satisfactorily divided; if not, then the said executors shall sell the same, or such portion as cannot be so divided, and give to my said wife one-half the net proceeds of the same. Fourthly. I give and bequeath the remaining half of all my property, both real and personal, of which I may die possessed, to the following persons, to be divided by my executors equitably between them, and each of them, share and share alike." The persons named, who are to take under this fourth paragraph, are his daughter by a former marriage, and her children, and the children of a deceased daughter by the former marriage. All the property affected by the will was community property of the testator and his wife, Elizabeth; and the court below construed the will as giving to the widow, in addition to one-half of the community property to which she was entitled by law, an undivided one-half of the residue that was subject to the testamentary disposition of the husband. Was this in accordance with the expressed intention of the testator? is the principal question to be decided.

It will be observed that the will does not specifically describe any property, but simply gives to the wife "one-half of all my property, both real and personal, of which I shall be possessed at the time of my death." Conceding that the will is susceptible of two possible constructions,—one, that the testator intended to devise all property of which he should be possessed at the last moment of life, including the whole of the community property over which he had the power of disposition during life; and the other, that he intended to devise only his property then in his possession, over which alone he had the power of testamentary disposition, — still, well-settled rules of construction and presumptions of law require the adoption of the latter construction, which accords with the decree of the lower court. (1) The testator must be presumed to have known the law applicable to the disposition of property by will, and, therefore, to have known that he had no power to dispose by will, of his wife's interest in the community property, but only of his own interest therein. Civil Code, §§ 172, 1331, and 1402; Morrison v. Bowman, 29 Cal. 347; Estate of Frey, 52 Cal. 660. (2) He must also be presumed not to have intended to devise any property over which he had no power of testamentary disposition, and therefore the will should be read as applying only to his property within such power. King v. Lagrange, 50 Cal. 332; Estate of Silvey, 42 Cal. 213. In the latter case it was said: "The devise must be read as applying only to that moiety which was within his testamentary power. A purpose to attempt the disposition, by will, of property which, by statute, would pass to the wife, as survivor of the matrimonial community, immediately upon his death, is not to be readily inferred, especially where, as here, the words employed by the testator may have their fair and natural import by applying them only to that moiety of which he had, by law, the testamentary disposition." The devise in this case is "of all my property of which I may die possessed," and not of any specific property. The devise to the wife is not inconsistent with the other devises to the daughter and grandchildren. All the "words employed by the testator may have their fair and natural import by applying them only to that moiety of which he had, by law, the testamentary disposition;" and there is nothing in the circumstances under which the will was made, substantially tending to rebut the presumptions above stated. It is only where there is such a clear manifestation of intent to devise the whole community property as to overcome those presumptions that the wife can be put to her election either to take under the will, or to take what she is entitled to by law. Morrison v. Bowman, 29 Cal. 347; Noe v. Splivalo, 54 Cal. 207; Estate of Stewart, 74 Cal. 98, 15 Pac. Rep. 445. But, where there is no such manifest intent, the wife may claim and take both what the law gives her in the community property, and also what is given her by the will of her husband in that portion thereof subject to his testamentary disposition. Beard v. Knox, 5 Cal. 252; Payne v. Payne, 18 Cal. 301; Estate of Silvey, 42 Cal. 210; King v. Lagrange, 50 Cal. 331; Estate of Frey, 52 Cal. 658.

Under the circumstances of this case, the court did not err in excluding evidence of what the testator said, just before his death, to his executor, as to what was intended by his will, and who wrote it. Civil Code, § 1318. The declarations sought to be proved were made five years after the date of the will, and therefore constituted no part of the res gestæ. Nelson v. Mc Clanahan, 55 Cal. 308; Estate of Garraud 35 Cal. 336.

The order setting apart the homestead to the widow relieved it from administration, and excluded it from distribution, (Estate of Hardwick, 59 Cal. 292,) but it did not affect the title to the homestead, (Herrold v. Reen, 58 Cal. 443; Watson v. His Creditors, Id. 556; Estate of Burton, 63 Cal. 36.) Under the provisions of the Codes, it is only a homestead selected from the community property, during the existence of the community, to which the law of title by survivorship applies, (Civil Code, § 1265, and Code Civil Proc. § 1474;) and therefore, upon the death of the husband, in this case, the community property vested according to section 1402 of the Civil Code, regulating the succession to such community property, subject, however, to its temporary use as a homestead by the family of the widow, under an order of the probate court setting it apart for that purpose, (Code Civil Proc. § 1465.) But, after having been thus set apart, the court had no jurisdiction over it for any purpose of distribution; and therefore there is no apparent error in the decree in respect to the homestead. I think the decree should be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; FOOTE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the decree is affirmed.

APPEAL-BOND—RENDITION OF JUDGMENT.

1. Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 954, provides that, if an appellant fails to furnish the requisite papers, the appeal may be dismissed; but no appeal can be dismissed for insufficiency of the undertaking thereon, if a good and sufficient undertaking, approved by a justice of a supreme court, be filed in the supreme court before the hearing on motion to dismiss. On an appeal from a judgment and order denying a new trial, the appeal-bond specified the judgment alone. After the time allowed by statute for giving the bond in the court a quo, he filed in the supreme court a bond on appeal from the order, approved by the chief justice. Held, that the statute only authorizes a new bond when the one filed is insufficient, and that the appeal from the order should be dismissed. Following Associates v. Wilkins, 12 Pac. Rep. 799.

2. The rendition of a judgment is its announcement by the court, and not its entry in the judgment book, within Code Civil Proc. § 939, providing that "an exception to the decision or verdict on the ground that it is not supported by the evidence cannot be reviewed on an appeal from the judgment, unless the appeal is taken within sixty days after the rendition of the judgment."

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county, WILLIAM P. WADE, Judge.

Action by Joseph Schurtz against Max Romer and F. Kerkow. Judgment was for plaintiff; and from the judgment, and an order denying a new trial, defendant Kerkow appeals.

Gottschalk & Luckell, for appellant. Wells, Guthrie & Lee, for respondent.

WORKS, J. The appellant, Kerkow, gave notice of an appeal from the judgment, and from the order denying him a new trial. He gave an undertaking on appeal from the judgment alone. No reference was made in the undertaking to the order denying the new trial, or the appeal therefrom. After the time provided by law for giving the undertaking on appeal in the court below, the said appellant applied to the chief justice to approve an undertaking to be filed in this court. The undertaking was approved by the chief justice, and subsequently filed with the clerk of this court.

The respondent moves to dismiss the appeal on the ground that no bond was filed in time in the court below; and, no attempt having been made to file such bond, the one approved by the chief justice, and filed in this court, could not be effective. An appeal is taken by serving and filing a notice of appeal within the time prescribed by law. But the appeal is ineffectual for any purpose, unless within five days after service of the notice of appeal an undertaking be filed, or a deposit of money be made, or the undertaking be waived by the adverse party in writing. Code Civil Proc. § 940. The giving of the undertaking is necessary to confer jurisdiction on this court, and must be given within the time prescribed by the Code. But section 954 of the Code provides: "If the appellant fails to furnish the requisite papers, the appeal may be dismissed; but no appeal can be dismissed for insufficiency of the undertaking thereon, if a good and sufficient undertaking, approved by a justice of the supreme court, be filed in the supreme court before the hearing upon motion to dismiss the appeal." This section does not authorize the giving of an undertaking in this court in the first instance; but, when an insufficient one has been given in the court below, the defect may be remedied by filing a new undertaking here. The giving of the new bond is in the nature of an amendment to a defective proceeding. In this case no bond was given on the appeal from the order denying a new trial, nor was there any attempt to do so. For these reasons the bond approved and filed in this court was ineffectual for any purpose, and the appeal must be dismissed. No amendment of the undertaking could be allowed, because none had been given, and there was nothing to amend. The precise question has been decided by this court in a case in which leave was asked to file an undertaking here. The court said: "The section referred to [section 954] does not authorize it. It only authorizes a new undertaking when the one filed is insufficient. But in this case there has really been none filed. To allow new ones to be filed would be, in effect, to permit a new appeal to be perfected after the time fixed by law." Associates v. Wilkins, 71 Cal. 626, 12 Pac. Rep. 799. See, also, Berniaud v. Beecher, 74 Cal. 617, 16 Pac. Rep. 510; Wood v. Pendola, 77 Cal. 82, 19 Pac. Rep. 183.

The appellant contends that, as his appeal from the judgment was taken within 60 days after the entry of judgment, the statement on motion for a new trial may be looked to for the purpose of determining whether or not the decision is supported by the evidence. The Code provides: "But an exception to the decision or verdict on the ground that it is not supported by the evidence cannot be reviewed on an appeal from the judgment, unless the appeal is taken within sixty days after the rendition of the judgment." Code Civil Proc. § 939, subd. 1. It has been held by this court that there is a material difference between the rendition and the entry of a judgment. A judgment is rendered when it is announced by the court. It is entered when it is actually entered in the judgment book. Gray v. Palmer, 28 Cal. 416; McLaughlin v. Doherty, 54 Cal. 519; Estate of Cook, 77 Cal. 220, 17 Pac. Rep. 923, and 19 Pac. Rep. 431. This appeal was taken within 60 days after the entry of the judgment, but not within 60 days after its rendition. For that reason we are precluded, by the express language of the statute, from considering the question whether the decision is supported by the evidence. It is contended that, under the earlier statutory provisions limiting the time for taking appeals, the time commenced to run from the rendition of the judgment, and not from its entry, and that the Code has been so amended as to make the time commence to run at the latter date, and that, as the appeal cannot be taken until after the entry of the judgment, that part of the section we are considering should be so construed as to make it relate to the same time. But we know of no reason or any rule of law that would warrant us in changing one portion of the Code by judicial construction because the legislature has changed another by law. Besides, there is no apparent reason why the limitation of the right to use the statement for the purpose named should not be enforced under the present provisions of the Code, as well as under the former provision. The party appealing can secure the right to use the statement by prosecuting his appeal from the judgment within the time fixed. If he fails in this, he is not without his remedy. He still has his motion for a new trial, which, if properly prosecuted, furnishes him the same remedy. The evil of our system of practice is that it gives too many remedies; and attorneys, by hesitating which one to pursue, frequently lose them all. This is one of the many cases in which this has occurred. For the reasons stated we cannot look into the evidence to see whether or not it supports the decision.

The only other point urged in the appellant's brief is that the findings do not support the judgment. We have carefully examined the findings, and hold them to be entirely sufficient, and that they support the judgment rendered. Appeal from order denying new trial dismissed, and judgment affirmed.

We concur: PATERSON, J.; FOX, J.

HARRIGAN v. MOWRY. (No. 11,815.)

ACTION TO QUIET TITLE—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

1. Where plaintiff conveys land to defendant in trust for herself, which defendant is to reconvey at the end of five years, the fact that, at the expiration of that time, plaintiff is in possession of the land does not authorize a finding that the legal title is in her.

2. An action to quiet title does not lie under Code Civ. Proc. Cal. § 738, where defendant claims no adverse title to plaintiff.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JOHN F. FINN, Judge.

R. Percy Wright, for appellant. C. H. Parker, for respondent.

VAN CLIEF, C. Action to quiet title. The amended complaint, in two counts, and in the most general forms, (filed July 28, 1885,) alleges "that the plaintiff above named is now, and has been for a long time past, the owner of, and in the possession of, that certain piece or parcel of land situate, lying, and being in said city and county of San Francisco," (describing the lot.) "And the plaintiff further avers that the said defendant claims an interest therein adverse to the plaintiff, and that the claim of said defendant is without any right whatever, and that the said defendant has not any estate, right, title, or interest whatever in said land or premises, or any part thereof." The second count, for another lot in the city of San Francisco, is in the same form. The prayer, in substance, is that defendant be required to set forth the nature of her several claims; that all her adverse claims be determined; that it be adjudged that plaintiff is the owner of the lots, and that the defendant has no estate or interest therein; and that defendant be enjoined from asserting any claim thereto adverse to the plaintiff. This complaint, not being verified, was answered (1) by a denial of each and every allegation of both counts, and (2) by the affirmative allegations "that the defendant is the owner in fee of the real property described, as trustee of an express trust respecting the same, and that the plaintiff herein is the beneficiary of said trust." The court found, generally, that all the allegations in plaintiff's complaint are true, and that all the allegations in the defendant's answer are untrue; and specially found that the defendant was not, at the commencement of the action, the owner in fee of the lots, or any part thereof, as trustee of an express trust, or otherwise; and that the plaintiff is not, and has not been since the 13th day of January, 1884, the beneficiary of any trust concerning or relating to said property, or of any part thereof. As a conclusion of law, the court found that the plaintiff was entitled to judgment as prayed for in the complaint, and judgment was so rendered. Defendant appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying her motion for new trial, and relies wholly upon the point that the findings of fact are not justified by the evidence.

There was no substantial conflict in the evidence. It was proved by the plaintiff that on the 13th day of January, 1879, the estate of Eliza Haskell, deceased, was in process of administration in the probate court of the city and county of San Francisco, and consisted of real and personal property; that John L. Haskell—the stepfather of the plaintiff—was administrator of the estate; and that plaintiff, as the daughter and heir of the deceased, was entitled to an undivided one-third part of the estate. Under these circumstances, and on that day, (January 13, 1879,) the plaintiff executed a deed to John L. Haskell and the defendant, by which she granted and conveyed to them, for the consideration of one dollar, all her interest, it being an undivided one-third part, "of all the property, real, personal, and mixed, belonging to the estate of Eliza Haskell, deceased, and situated in said city and county," (and for a more particular description referring to county records, and to the papers on file in the probate court,) with all appurtenances, "together with all her claims, demands, and interest in and to the estate of Eliza Haskell, deceased;" "to have and to hold.

all and singular, the said hereinbefore described premises and property and estate, * * * for the uses and purposes hereinafter mentioned, for the benefit of the party of the first part, * * * namely, to take charge of, manage, lease, and preserve, and to take and receive the rents, issues, profits, increase, and income of, said estate, property, and premises, and out of the same to keep and preserve said property, premises, and estate in good order and repair, properly insured and preserved, and to pay all taxes, assessments, and liens imposed thereon, and to pay the residue of such rents, profits, increase, and revenue, as and for her separate estate, to the said party of the first part * * * for and during the term of five years, and at the end of said term to reconvey to said party of the first part * * * the property, premises, and estate herein granted. * * * The parties of the second part shall have no right to execute any conveyance or deed of, or to create any lien upon, the estate and interest of the said party of the first part without her written consent. * * * And it is further understood and agreed that said parties of the second part will pay over to the party of the first part the rents, issues, and profits due her monthly, so far as the same may be practicable. * * * That from time to time, and not less than once at the expiration of each and every term of three months from and after the acknowledgment of this agreement, a report in writing shall be made by said trustees to said party of the first part of the receipts, disbursements, and condition of said estate and interest, if demanded by the party of the first part. And said Volina E. Harrigan waives and releases all right or power to sell or dispose of or incumber the said property for and during said term of five years. [Usual testatum clause.] [Signed] VOLINA E. HARRIGAN. We, the undersigned, do hereby accept the above conveyance, upon the terms and conditions as above set forth. JOHN L. HASKELL. LAURA A. MOWRY."

The plaintiff further proved that on the 14th day of February, 1879, a decree of distribution was entered by the probate court giving to John L. Haskell and the defendant, as trustees of plaintiff under said deed, an undivided one-third part of the property of the estate of Eliza Haskell, deceased, consisting of both real and personal property, and including the two lots described in plaintiff's complaint. On May 13, 1880, by decree of the superior court, certain real property derived from said estate was partitioned. By this decree the two lots in question were set off to John L. Haskell and the defendant, as trustees of plaintiff under said deed of trust. The following testimony was given on behalf of the plaintiff but no evidence was introduced by the defendant:

Volina E. Harrigan, (the plaintiff,) on her behalf, said: "I am the plaintiff in this action, and am, and have been since the 13th of January, 1884, in the possession of the two pieces of real property described in the amended complaint in this action, and have been receiving the rents and profits thereof. Mr. Haskell and Mrs. Mowry were in possession of that property before that time. Question. What have you done in the way of exercising control over this property since the 13th of January, 1884? Answer. Oh, I have been in to see that the place was rented, and to see that repairs were made. My father would tell me that such and such repairs were to be made, and I would go and see if the work was really wanted. Cross-Examined. Q. What change was made on the 13th of January, 1884? Did you not receive the rents and profits before that? A. Well, I used to receive about so much a month before that time. Q. Who received the rents before the 13th of January, 1884? A. My father, that is, my stepfather, J. L. Haskell. Q. Did he receive the rents of the property after that time, and pay them over to you? A. He did for a while,—two or three months, or so. Q. Now, who actually collects the rents? A. Madison & Burke. Q. Didn't Madison & Burke always collect the rents before the 13th of January, 1884? A. Yes, sir. Q. Then no change was made on the 13th of January, 1884, except that you received the whole of the rents and profits? A. Yes, sir. By the Court. Have you made a demand on Mrs. Mowry for a deed? A. Yes, sir; I have. Cross-Examination Resumed. Q. Did you ever make any demand on Mrs. Mowry personally? A. No, sir; not personally. Q. At the 13th of January, 1884, did you receive any accumulated rents, or have any settlement of the account of rents? A. No, sir. Re-examined. Q. In what capacity did your father act when he collected the rents since the 13th of January, 1884? A. He was my agent. Q. Has he rendered you monthly statements since the 13th of January, 1884? A. He gave me one accounting for the full year last January. Q. How did he make out his accounts? A. To me. Q. As your agent? A. Yes, sir; as my agent."

Laura A. Mowry, called for plaintiff, said: "Question. What claim do you make to this property? What reason have you for not executing a quitclaim deed to it? Answer. I have not made any claim, except to have an accounting and settlement. By the Court. I understand you to say you make no claim, and assert no right, to the property; that the only question with you is the matter of the accounting and trust? A. For Mr. Haskell and myself to have an accounting with Mrs. Harrigan. Direct Examination Resumed. Q. Do you claim to hold any title to this property as a trustee? A. Only until there is an accounting. That is just what Mrs. Harrigan wished me to do. Q. You decline to make any conveyance until there is an accounting? A. And I am settled with. Q. Well, you claim that you have a right to hold this property until you are settled with? A. Yes, sir. Q. That is your claim? A. Yes, sir. Q. Do you consider that you have a lien upon that real estate until you are settled with for any claim which you may have? A. Well, I will tell you what I understand. I understand that I was put in there as a trustee. Q. You make no other claim than that you have stated? A. The only claim that I make is for Mr. Haskell and myself to make an accounting to our ward for exactly what we have received, and what we have paid out, and what there is on hand, and how we have delivered the profit to our ward. I do not wish to have it said afterwards that Mrs. Mowry had wronged her ward. I want an accounting. Q. Now, you have no claim except what grows out of this trusteeship? A. No, sir. Q. Was there a deed presented to you for signature? A. Yes, sir. Q. And you declined to execute it? A. No, sir. Q. You have never executed it? A. No sir; but I did not decline. I told Mr. Haskell that we should get together, and see exactly how we stood, and return to our ward exactly what was proper, and then I was ready and willing to sign. Q. Why did you insist on having an accounting before you executed the deed? A. Because I thought it was right, and I considered it my duty. Cross-Examined. Q. For whose benefit was the accounting you have sought? A. Mrs. Harrigan's, my ward, it was for her benefit. Q. Have you ever claimed, at any time, any interest adverse to her? A. No, sir; I have not; on the contrary, it is to assist and benefit her. Q. Have you not at all times been willing to do anything that would benefit her? A. Yes, sir; and have repeatedly asked Mr. Haskell to make an accounting. Q. Did you not demand it? A. I demanded it in writing of Mr. Haskell. Q. Will you state to the court if it is possible for you to prepare an account? A. It is an utter impossibility, because he refused me the books. I have no possible way of getting at it. Q. Who was the administrator of the estate of Eliza Haskell, deceased? A. J. L. Haskell. Q. Then your co-trustee was the person from whom you and he, as trustees, had to receive all the share of the personal property? A. Yes, sir. Q. Did you ever know positively that all or any considerable part of the personal property had been turned over by the administrator to the trustees? A. No; there is only $5,000 that I have any knowledge of. That was received by John L. Haskell and Laura A. Mowry, trustees, from John L. Haskell, administrator. It was turned over at once, when there was a partial distribution. Q. During all the period of five years, did you act in the matter? A. Always. Q. Some mention was made of Messrs. Sharp & McCeney having some claim against the trust-estate? A. Yes, sir. Q. Did you, or did you not, spend a large amount of time on behalf of Mrs. Harrigan in that matter? A. I did. Q. State about what you did as trustee. A. Sharp & McCeney were to get one-third of what they recovered for Mrs. Harrigan from Mrs. Haskell's estate as their fee. They claimed $25,000 originally as due to them. By reason of my exertions as trustee, that was reduced to $14,400, which they agreed to take, and relinquish all their interest in the estate. Q. Have you ever received any compensation for your services as trustee? A. I have not; nothing at all. Redirect Examination. Q. Now, as a matter of fact, Mrs. Mowry, you have not received any rents, issues, or profits of the estate of your ward, have you? A. Not directly. Q. Mr. Haskell did all the business, did he not? A. Yes, sir. Q. As between you and him? A. Yes, sir."

Charles G. Nagle, on behalf of plaintiff, said: "Question. Did you ever present Mrs. Mowry with a deed, and ask her to transfer this property? Answer. I did. Q. Was it accompanied by any release of claims or demands on the part of Mrs. Harrigan? A. I don't think it was at the particular time of the presentation; but afterwards, at the time of presenting the deed to Mrs. Mowry, she said she would take the deed, and go to her attorney with it, and would return the deed to me, and let me know whether she would execute it or not; and I asked her who her attorney was, and she would not inform me at the time, but afterwards she told me it was Mr. Mhoon, of Flournoy & Mhoon. I afterwards called upon her about the deed, and asked her several times, but got no definite answer. Afterwards it came about that I was to bring a release to Mrs. Mowry. The release was drawn up by you, and I copied it, and presented Mrs. Mowry with a copy of the release. She said that she believed that it was full enough. I believe I have a memorandum of it in my book."

Here the plaintiff rested, and no further evidence was offered on the part of the defendant.

1. The finding that the plaintiff was owner of the lots is not justified by the evidence. Conceding that plaintiff was in possession, and that possession is prima facie evidence of ownership, yet such prima facie evidence was rebutted and entirely overcome by the trust-deed, and other evidence introduced by the plaintiff showing that defendant and Haskell held the legal title. Sepulveda v. Sepulveda, 39 Cal. 17.

2. For the same reasons the finding that the "defendant has not any estate, right, title, or interest whatever in said land or premises, or any part thereof," is unsupported by the evidence. Nor is there any evidence that the defendant claimed any interest in the land adverse to the title of plaintiff. It appears that the defendant rightfully claimed that she and Haskell held the legal title as trustees for the plaintiff; but their legal title, as such trustees, was not adverse to the title of the plaintiff as sole beneficiary,—the only title proved in her.

3. But conceding, without deciding, that the plaintiff was entitled to a conveyance of the legal title, and that defendant wrongfully refused to convey it, an action to quiet title under section 738 of the Code of Civil Procedure was not appropriate, nor even permissible. Von Drachenfels v. Doolittle, 77 Cal. 295, 19 Pac. Rep. 518; Brewer v. Houston, 58 Cal. 345; Learned v. Welton, 40 Cal. 349; Frost v. Spitley, 121 U. S. 552, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1129. I think the judgment and order should be reversed, and the cause remanded.

We concur. BELCHER, C. C.; FOOTE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are reversed, and the cause remanded.

ASHTON v. DASHAWAY ASS'N et al. (No. 12,069.)

CORPORATIONS—MISAPPROPRIATION OF PROPERTY—ACTIONS BY MEMBERS.

1. A temperance society, owning improved land, was incorporated, without capital stock, "for the purpose of promoting the cause of temperance," under Hitt. Gen. Laws Cal. § 1024 et seq., providing for the incorporation of "religious, social, benevolent, and learned associations." Some years afterwards, the membership having greatly decreased, a resolution was passed that the trustees sell the property, pay off some outstanding indebtedness, and "purchase other cheaper property suitable for the uses and purposes of the association." A petition asking for leave to sell, and stating, among other things, that the corporation was "purely and solely for the benevolent and laudable purpose of aiding and promoting the cause of temperance, and not pecuniary profit," was accordingly filed in the superior court, which granted the prayer of the petition, reciting the resolution in its order of sale. The property was sold, and a portion of the proceeds divided among a part of the members, including the trustees, pursuant to a motion "that the association donate to each member in good standing the sum of $1,500 for past services, on signing a receipt for the same;" but it was admitted on the trial that no services had been rendered other than being good and efficient members of the organization. Held, a misappropriation of corporate funds, and that any member not a party thereto could maintain a suit to compel a restoration.

2. Where trustees misappropriate corporate funds, claiming the right so to do, a member may institute proceedings for their restoration without demand on the trustees to take action in the matter.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; T. H. Rearden, Judge.

S. Heydenfeldt, Jr., and Joseph P. Kelly, for appellant. Tilden & Tilden and David McClure, for respondents.

Sharpstein, J. This was a suit by Charles Ashton, a member of the Dashaway Association, against the corporation, its five trustees, and a majority of the other members, to compel the restoration of funds alleged to have been misappropriated. The trial court nonsuited the plaintiff, who appeals from an order denying his motion for a new trial. The original association was an unincorporated temperance society. It was formed in January, 1859, at the Howard Engine-House, by 17 public-spirited men, who took a pledge to abstain from all intoxicating drinks, except for medical purposes, the necessity of which was to be certified by a physician, and adopted a constitution and by-laws. The initiation fee was fixed at 25 cents, and the dues at 12½ cents a week. The preamble was as follows: "We, the undersigned, anxious to advance our own interests, and to promote a spirit of good feeling, not only amongst ourselves, but our friends, and being impressed with the importance of concentrated effort to accomplish the object, and desirous of forming ourselves into an association in which we may labor together for the end proposed, have framed the annexed constitution," etc. It was provided that "it shall be the duty of members to seek out their friends in the city and vicinity, and bring them to the meetings, and introduce them to the members," and "to assist those members who are in need to obtain employment, and aid and encourage the poor and needy, as far as lay in their power." The name adopted was the "Dashaway Association," the meaning of which is said to be that it was the object to encourage the members and their friends to "dash away" the intoxicating cup from their lips. In May, 1859, a more extended constitution was adopted. After reciting that the original plans were "to bring under our banner all inebriates, not only here, but in other parts of the state," it provided for the establishment of branch associations, and that all persons admitted as members should take the pledge. The substance of the previous constitution was adopted.

The enterprise seems to have received the approbation and assistance of the public. The press gave it encouragement; the Reverend Thomas Starr King consented to deliver a lecture for its benefit; and donations of books, of building materials, and of money were received. On one occasion the association received a "donation in money" of $157.50; on another, a subscription of $1,200; on another, $2,107.83; on another, $134.50; on another, $154.75,—and letters of sympathy were received from other states. In 1860 the association purchased a lot on Post street, near Dupont, for the sum of $6,250, and a building was erected upon it for the use of the association. This is the lot which was subsequently sold, as mentioned below. It was mortgaged for part of the purchase money, and subsequently other mortgages were placed upon it. In 1862 the association was incorporated. The articles were evidently framed under the provisions of the incorporation of "religious, social, benevolent, and learned associations." 1 Hitt. Gen. Laws, § 1024 et seq. There was no capital stock. The articles state that the organization was "a benevolent association, formed for the purpose of promoting the cause of temperance." A "home" for the care of inebriates was provided, under the auspices of the association; but for this purpose a separate corporation was formed.

The association had a numerous membership. "There were thirty one hundred and sixty-three names before the incorporation, and forty-nine hundred and sixty-four since the incorporation." In 1882, however, from some cause which is not explained by the record, the membership had dwindled to 59; and in the following year notice was given of a meeting of members to consider the question of selling the property above mentioned, in order to pay the indebtedness, "and to reinvest in other property suitable for the association." At this meeting a resolution was passed that the trustees be instructed to sell the property, pay the indebtedness, "and purchase other cheaper property suitable for the uses and purposes of the association." A petition for leave to sell the property was accordingly filed in the superior court, stating, among other things, that the association was incorporated "purely and solely for the benevolent and laudable purpose of aiding and promoting the cause of temperance, and not pecuniary profit;" and the court granted leave to sell, reciting in its order the above-mentioned resolution. The property was then sold for the sum of $156,000. Of this sum $45,000 was used in discharging indebtedness; $31,543.54 was placed in savings banks, where it is to be presumed that it now is; and $73,500 was divided among 49 members, including the trustees. The answers deny that the defendants "unlawfully or fraudulently" took or received any of the money, or that they took or received any money "that was held by said corporation in trust," but do not deny the taking or receiving, and the evidence of the taking is uncontradicted. At a meeting of the members held in December, 1883, the minute-book shows the following entry: "Brother Eagan then moved that the association donate to each member in good standing the sum of $1,500 for past services, on signing a receipt for the same. Carried unanimously." And this is followed by a receipt in the following form: "San Francisco, Dec. 31, 1883. We, the undersigned, members of the Dashaway Association, hereby acknowledge the receipt of $1,500, donated to us for past services by order of the association." This receipt was signed by 49 members, including the trustees; the sum of $1,500 being opposite each name. It was admitted at the trial "that there were no services rendered by the defendant members other than in the line of being good and efficient members of the organization, in accordance with the constitution and by-laws and general objects of the assocation, and that that is all any of the defendants rendered to the society." The by-laws provide that "no officer of this association shall receive compensation for his services, except the secretary and collector, who shall receive such compensation as may from time to time be fixed by the association." It is admitted by the pleadings that the association "still is" a corporation, and no proceedings for its voluntary dissolution are shown.

The argument for the respondents is that the organization was not a charity, in its legal sense, and that therefore it could do what it pleased with its property. "Take all the evidence," say the learned counsel, "search the record through and through, and not one word indicating a charity can be found." We do not find it necessary to decide this question, and, for the purposes of this opinion, shall assume that the association stands upon the same footing as any other private corporation. So regarding it, we think it clear that any member has the right to the aid of the courts in preventing or setting aside such a plain misappropriation of the corporate funds as is above shown. That any stockholder or member has this right in equity is well established. The rule is thus stated in a recent work: "Even the majority have no right to direct the affairs of a corporation except in accordance with the provisions of its charter, for the powers of the majority are derived wholly from the agreement of the stockholders, as set out in the charter; and every individual stockholder has the right to stand upon his contract, and forbid any departure from its terms. It may accordingly be stated as a rule that any departure from the chartered purposes of a corporation is an injury to every individual stockholder, for which equity will, under proper circumstances, provide a remedy." Mor. Priv. Corp. §403. Another learned writer says: "It is ultra vires and illegal for the board of directors to donate the funds of the corporation to charitable or public purposes, or to aid corporations of a similar character, however praiseworthy the purpose of the donation may be. Nor can the directors legally use the funds of the corporation to induce promoters to abandon a proposed rival company. A stockholder may enjoin the directors from making free of tolls a bridge from which a corporation derives its income. The directors may be held liable for allowing the president to use the corporate funds for lobbying purposes. An unreasonable use of the corporate profits of a leased railroad to build up and improve the lessor railroad, without reference to the rights of the former, has been held to be good cause of complaint on the part of a stockholder in the leased railroad company; and, in general, any misapplication or waste of the property of a corporation may be remedied by a member thereof." Cook, Stocks, § 674. The supreme court of Rhode Island, in reference to the misappropriation of corporate funds by a director, said: "The jurisdiction does not appear to be so firmly settled and defined in England as in this country; but we do not believe any English judge has ever decided that a president or director who fraudulently converts or embezzles corporate funds cannot be sued in equity by a stockholder, when the corporation willfully neglects or refuses to bring the suit. Indeed, to hold that a corporation could gratuitously condone or release such a fraud by anything short of unanimous consent would be monstrous; for it would be, in effect, to hold that a president or director who can control a majority vote in the corporation may rob or despoil it with impunity." Hazard v. Durant, 11 R. I. 206, 207.

In accordance with those principles, it has been held that a stockholder may restrain the directors from paying an unfounded claim of the secretary for extra services, (Butts v. Wood, 37 N. Y. 317,) and may compel the repayment of funds misappropriated by the directors, (Sears v. Hotchkiss, 25 Conn. 177,) and may recover from a trustee property of the corporation which he has converted to his own use, (Carpenter v. Roberts, 56 How. Pr. 216,) and may prevent corporate securities from being misapplied to the benefit of other corporations, (Chicago v. Cameron, 120 Ill. 447, 11 N. E. Rep. 899,) and may have annulled a lease made in excess of corporate powers, (Mills v. Railroad Co., 41 N. J. Eq. 1,)[1] and may prevent the collection of payment of a tax illegally levied, (Dodge v. Woolsey, 18 How. 331,) and may prevent the payment of dividends out of a fund which ought to have been appropriated to repairs of the company's works, (Dent v. Tramways Co., L. R. 16 Ch. Div. 344,) and may prevent the conversion of the corporate assets by the officers, (Real Estate Co. v. Bank, 75 Ga. 45,) and may have restrained acts which amount to a violation of trust, or a breach of the charter, (March v. Railroad Co., 40 N. H. 548; Wilcox v. Bickel, 11 Neb. 154, 8 N. W. Rep. 436; Teachout v. Railway Co., 75 Iowa, 727, 38 N. W. Rep. 145; Manderson v. Bank, 28 Pa. St. 379,) or which amount to a fraud upon the company, (Ryan v. Railroad Co., 21 Kan. 365,) or to a breach of its charter, (Cook, Stocks, § 672.) In California the rule was laid down in Wright v.

[1] Atl. Rep. 453.

Mining Co., 40 Cal. 20, in which case it was held that a stockholder could compel the company to refund the sum paid by him for the redemption of corporate property which the directors had allowed to be sold, and had wrongfully neglected to redeem, and WALLACE, J., delivering the opinion, said: "It is settled that courts of equity in this country will, at the instance of a stockholder, control a corporation and its officers, and restrain them from doing acts even within the scope of corporate authority, if such acts, when done, would, under the particular circumstances, amount to a breach of the very trust upon which, as we have seen, the authority itself has been conferred. Dodge v. Woolsey, 18 How. 341. And upon the same principle the court will, even after such an act has been done, relieve an injured stockholder from loss, if, in the mean time, no superior equity has intervened, nor the rights of innocent third parties attached." See, also, Neall v. Hill, 16 Cal. 145; Beach v. Cooper, 72 Cal. 99, 13 Pac. Rep. 161; Chicago v. Cameron, 120 Ill. 458, 11 N. E. Rep. 899. And the relief does not depend upon the existence of a fraudulent intent, although such intent very frequently exists.

Now, in the present case there was a plain misappropriation of corporate funds. The corporation was not dissolved, or, so far as appears, to be dissolved. It was a simple case of trustees who were in possession and in control of corporate funds, acting in pursuance of a vote of the majority of the members, "donating" the corporate funds to themselves and other members upon the pretext of "past services," although the fact was, as admitted at the trial, that no services had been rendered other than such as the parties were bound to render as members of the association. The answers deny that the association was not a corporation for profit. But it is too plain for discussion that this denial was untrue. The corporation was not for profit. Its articles define it as "a benevolent association, formed for the purpose of promoting the cause of temperance;" and it is evident, as stated in the petition for leave to sell the property, that the association "was incorporated purely and solely for the benevolent and laudable purpose of aiding and promoting the cause of temperance, and not pecuniary profit." This being so, the division of more than one-half of the corporate property among 49 members was a diversion of the same from the cause of temperature, which was the "benevolent and laudable" purpose of the institution, into the private pockets of said members. It was an attempt to make a profit out of an undertaking which was not for profit. It is not inconsistent with the conclusion that the preamble of the constitution of the unincorporated association stated that the object of the members was "to advance our own interests." It is perfectly clear, from the circumstances, that this meant their interests with respect to temperance and sobriety. But, aside from this, the old constitution was superseded by the articles of incorporation, which explicitly define the object of the association, as above stated. If such a transaction as appears here would be sanctioned, the majority of the members of any club, or social, religious, or benevolent society, could, without winding up the concern, divide up the funds whenever they felt in need of a little money. It does not appear that the plaintiff consented to the proceeding; he is not shown to have been present at the meeting at which the resolution above quoted was "unanimously carried;" his name does not appear on the receipt above set forth; the resolution offered by him at the meeting preliminary to the sale seems to us to have been perfectly proper; and his subsequent proceedings show, to his credit, that he was not a party to the transaction.

It is argued for the respondents, however, that a member or stockholder cannot have redress for any wrong or injury to the corporation "until after he has exhausted all the means within his reach to obtain redress of his grievances. He must make an earnest effort with the managing body of the corporation." This is undoubtedly the general rule. But the complaint alleges that the trustees of the corporation "control and manage its affairs, and were parties to the said unlawful and fraudulent acts, being aided and abetted by the said other defendants members; that it would be futile and useless to make a demand upon said corporation defendant, or upon its trustees or officers, to commence a suit to obtain the relief which the plaintiff seeks, or any relief whatever." The answers deny that the trustees "were ever parties to any unlawful or fraudulent transaction," but do not deny the remainder of the allegation; and from the whole case it is apparent that the defendants claimed the right to do what they did, and that the trustees were parties to the transaction. Under these circumstances, it was not necessary for the plaintiff to demand that they should take action. "The law does not require a useless act to be performed; and when it is claimed, from the answer, that, if a demand had been made, it would have been refused, it does not lie in the mouth of the defendant to object that no demand was made." Parrott v. Byers, 40 Cal. 622, 623. See, also, Heath v. Railroad Co., 8 Blatchf. 347; Mor. Priv. Corp. § 395; 3 Pom. Eq. Jur. 10. We see no material error in the admission of evidence; but, if there had been, it would not affect the result here. McCloud v. O'Neall, 16 Cal. 397. The order appealed from is reversed, and the cause is remanded for a new trial.

SHOWERS v. WADSWORTH. (Nos. 12,299, 12,300.)

SHERIFFS—INDEMNITY—MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

1. A judgment against a sheriff in an action brought by him in accordance with the wishes and directions of an attaching creditor, and under the control of the latter's attorneys, to settle the validity of the alleged preferred claims of certain laborers against the attached property, is conclusive of the sheriff's liability, in a subsequent action by him against the attaching creditor on a contract of indemnity for all loss and liability which the sheriff might incur by reason of such claims, though the sheriff, after the judgment was rendered, discharged the attorneys because they, on behalf of the attaching creditor, refused to give a stay-bond, thereby preventing an appeal.

2. A contract to furnish a bond of indemnity will be treated as a contract of indemnity, if the bond is not furnished.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. G. Maguire, Judge.

Geo. C. Gorham, Jr., (Haggin, Van Ness & Dibble, of counsel,) for appellant. P. Reddy, (W. H. Metson, of counsel,) for respondent.

Hayne, C. Action by a sheriff upon a contract to indemnify him against liability arising from the claims of certain parties upon property which was in his custody, and which he delivered to the defendant upon receiving said contract. Judgment passed for the plaintiff, and the defendant appeals. The general features of the case are as follows: An action was brought against two mining companies by the defendant, Wadsworth, who, it appears, was acting in the interest of Wells, Fargo & Co., which corporation was the real owner of the claims. A writ of attachment was issued in the case, and under it the sheriff took possession of certain personal property of the mining companies. Thereupon certain of the miners who had claims for labor, and who claimed to be preferred creditors, gave notice of their claims to the sheriff and to the attaching creditor, under section 1206 of the Code of Civil Procedure, as amended in 1874, which provides, in substance, that, if such claims are undisputed, the sheriff shall satisfy them out of the property in his hands; and that, if they are disputed, the claimants shall establish their validity by action, which must be brought within 10 days. Judgment was rendered in favor of Wadsworth, the attaching creditor, (defendant here,) and the property was sold to him. He did not pay the price bid for the property, but induced the sheriff to deliver it to him without payment, upon his agreement, which provided that he would furnish the sheriff "a good and sufficient bond indemnifying him against all loss and liability which he may incur by reason of delivering the bullion attached, * * * or which he may become responsible for by reason of the preferred claims in said cases filed with him." The agents who acted for Wadsworth in the matter had authority to make such a contract. It is admitted by the pleadings that Wadsworth never gave a bond of indemnity. At the trial he applied for leave to amend his answer in this respect, but the court denied the application. This ruling is not complained of in the briefs filed; and, if it had been, we could not say that, upon the showing made, there was any abuse of discretion. It is therefore an established fact that the defendant failed to perform his agreement to give a bond of indemnity. After the property had been delivered to him, one of the claimants commenced an action against the sheriff, and the others were about to do so; and in order to prevent a multiplicity of actions, and to settle the question of the validity of the various claims, two suits were brought in the name of the sheriff against the claimants. Judgment in these suits was rendered in favor of the defendants, and it was thereby adjudged that the claims against the sheriff were valid. These suits were brought in consequence of the request of the sheriff that his interests should be protected; and we think that the request was properly made. It was made to the attorneys who had acted for Wadsworth in his transactions with the sheriff. Mr. Gorham was the one who arranged the transaction for the delivery of the property and the making of the contract of indemnity. The defendant, Wadsworth, says, with reference to him: "Mr. Gorham was acting as agent to do anything that was done. He was the only one that had authority to do anything. I sent him there to attend to that business,—to do what was necessary." And he acted as the attorney of Wadsworth, and not as attorney of the sheriff, though at all times he was acting under the direction of other attorneys. Mr. Haggin was acting for those whom Wadsworth represented. These gentlemen were applied to by the sheriff because they were the only attorneys for Wadsworth whom he knew in the premises.

Upon these facts we think that the judgment in favor of the plaintiff was right. The contract was, in substance, a contract of indemnity. In form, it was to furnish a bond of indemnity. But, so far as the principal is concerned, we think that, inasmuch as the contract was not superseded by such promised bond, it must be treated as itself, in effect, a contract to indemnify. The indemnity was against liability, and hence there was a right of recovery upon the contract as soon as the liability was incurred. Civil Code, § 2778, subd. 1, Tunstead v. Nixdorf, ante, 472, (No. 12,158, filed Oct. 1, 1889;) McBeth v. McIntyre, 57 Cal. 50.

The arguments of the learned counsel for the appellant go, in effect, to the point that no liability was incurred by the sheriff. They say that section 1206 of the Code of Civil Procedure is unconstitutional because it does not provide for notice to the judgment debtor; that no notice of the claims of the miners was in fact given to the judgment debtor; and that the claims were disputed, etc. But we think that the sheriff's liability was conclusively established by the judgments in the suits mentioned. We do not regard the form which the litigation assumed as important. The suits in question were brought for the purpose of determining the validity of the claims asserted against the sheriff. They were merely to cut off and forestall the multiplicity of actions which would otherwise have been brought against him. They were substitutes for actions against him; and, so far as the defendant Wadsworth's relation to them is concerned, it is clear that he stands in the same position as if the suits against the sheriff had been allowed to go on. This being the case, the sheriff having made a proper request that the indemnifier should litigate the claims against him, it is immaterial whether the indemnifier did so or not. If he neglected to do so, the judgments would be conclusive against him. "If, after request, the person indemnifying neglects to defend the person indemnified, a recovery against the latter, suffered by him in good faith, is conclusive in his favor against the former." Civil Code, § 2778, subd. 5. If he took charge of the litigation, the judgments are equally conclusive. Civil Code, § 2778; Dutil v. Pacheco, 21 Cal. 442. We think it clear that the attorneys for Wadsworth did conduct the litigation on his behalf. The court finds that the suits were brought "in accordance with the wishes and directions of the defendant, Wadsworth," and that his attorneys "had full control" of the same; and the evidence, in our opinion, sustains these findings. The judgments are therefore conclusive of the sheriff's liability.

The only argument that can be made against this proposition is that the attorneys for Wadsworth were discharged by the sheriff after the judgments had been rendered, and were thereby prevented from taking appeals which might have resulted in the reversal of the judgments. The reason for which they were discharged was that they, on behalf of Wadsworth, refused to give a stay-bond upon the proposed appeals. We think that the refusal justified the sheriff in refusing to proceed further with the litigation. Wadsworth, through his attorneys, had control of the suits. It was for his interest ultimately that they should be prosecuted. Having been requested to take charge of the litigation, he was bound to do so, and his indemnity embraced the costs of the litigation. Civil Code, § 2778, subds. 3, 4. The word "costs," in this provision, is used in an extended sense, and includes all things which are necessary in order to make the litigation effectual. The sheriff was not bound to suffer his property to be seized for this liability, against which the defendant had agreed to hold him harmless; nor was he bound to put his property out of his hands for the purposes of concealment; nor was he bound to give a bond to answer the liability in case the judgment should be affirmed. The contract of indemnity bound Wadsworth to answer this liability; and we see no reason why he should be allowed to compel the sheriff to bind himself, or get others to bind themselves, to answer a liability which he (Wadsworth) had agreed to become responsible for. For these reasons we think that the discharge of Wadsworth's attorneys after judgment does not do away with the conclusiveness of the judgments as against him. In the view we have taken, it is unnecessary to consider the other questions argued. We therefore advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; VAN CLIEF, C.

ROBERTSON v. WILLIAMS. (No. 12,005.)

NEW TRIAL—EXCUSABLE NEGLECT.

Reliance on a verbal promise by plaintiff's attorney to notify defendant's attorney before taking up the case is excusable neglect, and authorizes the granting of a new trial, where no notice was given, and, the trial taking place in the absence of defendant and his attorney, judgment was rendered against him.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; M. A. EDMONDS, Judge.

J. N. E. Wilson and Jas. M. Troutt, for appellant. Taylor & Craig, for respondent.

HAYNE, C. This was an action for malicious prosecution. The trial took place in the absence of the defendant and his counsel, and resulted in a verdict for $1,500, for which judgment was entered. The defendant moved for a new trial on the ground of accident, surprise, etc., which motion was denied. The appeal is from the judgment, and the order denying a new trial. But the sole point made is that the trial court ought to have granted a new trial on the ground of surprise; and to this we agree. There were no opposing affidavits. It therefore stands admitted that the absence of the defendant and his attorney was caused by their reliance upon the promise of the plaintiff's attorney to notify the defendant's attorney before taking up the case, and the failure to comply with such promise. It is true that this promise is verbal, and therefore that it could not be enforced as such. But it seems to us that reliance upon the word of a reputable attorney is excusable neglect, for which relief may be given, so far as to set aside the advantage taken in violation of the promise. If the promise had been denied, then we think that, in view of the practical difficulty of investigations of that character, it would have been proper to refuse relief. But, the fact being admitted, we think that the motion should have been granted. The learned counsel for the respondent intimates in his brief that the promise was made so long before the trial that he had forgotten about it. But the affidavits do not show this; and, if they did, it is evident that the plaintiff's attorney had not forgotten the promise, but relied upon it. No objection is taken to the sufficiency of the record; and we assume, in consequence, that any objections which exist are waived. We therefore advise that the judgment and order appealed from be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; FOOTE, C.

GRAVES et al. v. MONO LAKE HYDRAULIC MIN. CO.

CORPORATIONS—DEBTS TO OFFICERS—MORTGAGES—RATIFICATION—EVIDENCE.

1. The superintendent of a mining company testified that the services rendered by the president and secretary of the company outside of the performance of their duty as such officers were worth a certain sum, but it appeared that he resided at the mine, was seldom at the offices of the company, and did not know what services were rendered by the president and secretary. The only evidence as to the value of his own services was the fact that he was superintendent. Held, that this evidence was insufficient to show that these officers had rendered services worth the sum stated, and that their charging the corporation therewith, by a resolution passed by their own votes, was fair and honest.[1]

2. Civil Code Cal. § 2230, provides that no trustee shall take part in any transaction concerning the trust in which he has any interest adverse to that of his beneficiary, except, inter alia, when the beneficiary, having capacity to contract, with full knowledge of the motives of the trustee, and of all the facts concerning the transaction which might affect his own decision, and without the use of any influence on the part of the trustee, permits him to do so. Section 2234 provides that every violation of said section is a fraud against the beneficiary of the trust. Section 2322 provides that an authority to an agent, expressed in general terms, however broad, does not authorize him to do any act that a trustee is forbidden to do by the section above quoted. Held, that where certain officers of a corporation have, in their capacity of directors and trustees of the stockholders, passed resolutions allowing and ordering to be paid an indebtedness to themselves, such resolutions are voidable by the corporation, or, upon its refusal, by a minority of the stockholders, whether the transaction was fair and honest or not.[1]

3. A note and mortgage to secure such indebtedness are likewise voidable where they are executed in pursuance of a resolution of the board of directors, at the instance of such officers, without passing upon the merits of the demand, and under a deception practiced by such officers, who informed them that the debts were fictitious, and that the mortgage, being for the purpose of preventing an attachment of the property of the corporation, would be canceled as soon as money could be raised to pay the other debts.

4. A finding that such mortgage was ratified by the holders of two-thirds of the stock is not warranted, where the evidence shows that certificates for a part of the stock necessary to make up the two-thirds had been canceled shortly after such attempted ratification, without showing that they remained in the hands of the person whose vote is alleged to have represented them until canceled.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Mono county; R. M. Briggs, Judge.

Action by Albert Packard and R. N. Graves against the Mono Lake Hydraulic Mining Company to foreclose a mortgage. There was judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals.

William F. Gibson and William O. Parker, for appellant. W. E. F. Deal and A. Packard, for respondents.

Vanclief, C. The defendant (appellant) is a mining corporation, organized in this state October 4, 1881, having its principal place of business in San Francisco, and its mining land and works in the county of Mono. Its capital stock is $1,000,000, divided into 100,000 shares, all of which was subscribed by and issued to the following persons: John D. Wilson, 24,950 shares; Daniel E. Jones, 24,950 shares; John Elbert, 24,950 shares; N. K. Grant, 24,950 shares; John F. Curtis, 100 shares; George Duncan, 100 shares. The directors during the first year, named in the articles of incorporation, were said Wilson, Jones, Elbert, Curtis, and Duncan. Wilson was elected president, Elbert secretary, and Jones superintendent of the mine. By article 7 of the by-laws, it is provided that "members of the board of directors shall receive no compensation for their services as such, nor shall the company be held liable for any services rendered, except it is so expressly provided; but members of the board shall be allowed their reasonable traveling expenses when actually engaged in the business of the company, to be audited and allowed as in other cases of demands against the company. The secretary and superintendent shall receive such compensation for their services as the board of directors shall determine." At a meeting of the board of directors held on the 21st day of October, 1882, at which only Wilson, Duncan, Jones, and Elbert were present, on motion of Duncan, seconded by Jones, the following resolution was passed: "Resolved, that the salaries of the president, secretary, and superintendent be, and are, fixed at $150 per month, to date from October 1, 1881; and the secretary be, and hereby is, instructed to pass to the credit of each of the above-named officers said amount, and to pay the same pro rata from the first funds available." Immediately thereafter, at the same meeting, the "secretary reported that the company was indebted to J. D. Wilson $10,185 26-100, to J. Elbert $10,185 26-100, and to D. E. Jones $8,871 8-100 for moneys advanced to pay the running expenses of the mine." "Whereupon, on motion of George Duncan, seconded by D. E. Jones, it was resolved that the claims of J. D. Wilson, J. Elbert, and D. E. Jones for moneys advanced this company, as above stated, be, and the same is hereby, approved, and the treasurer is hereby instructed to pay all, or any part, of said amounts pro rata out of the first funds available; and, should any assessment be levied upon the capital stock of this corporation before said accounts are paid, the secretary is instructed to apply any part of said indebtedness towards the payment of such assessment, should the parties so desire." On the same day—October 21, 1882—a stockholders' meeting was held, at which J. D. Wilson, J. Elbert, Charles H. Sinclair, George Duncan, and L. J. Wilson were elected directors, who appointed J. D. Wilson president, Charles H. Sinclair vice-president, J. Elbert secretary and treasurer, and D. E. Jones superintendent. At a special meeting of the last-named directors held on the 13th day of November, 1882, "C. H. Sinclair, vice-president, in the chair, George Duncan and L. J. Wilson present, L. J. Wilson was appointed secretary pro tem. The vice-president notified the board that Messrs. Jones, Wilson, and Elbert called for the money due them, and insisted on its being paid or secured." Thereupon the following resolutions were offered and adopted: "Whereas, this corporation, the Mono Lake Hydraulic Mining Company, is indebted to D. E. Jones in the sum of $8,871.-08, to J. D. Wilson in the sum of $10,185.26, and to John Elbert in the sum of $10,185.26 for moneys advanced, as appears by the books of the corporation, and which moneys are overdue, and the said Jones, Wilson, and Elbert demand to have paid; and whereas, the corporation is without funds to pay said indebtedness, or to pay other existing pressing liabilities and expenses necessary for the protection of its property, and the corporation is in need of the sum of $16,000 to meet said liabilities and expenses; and whereas, the said Jones, Wil son, and Elbert are willing to extend the time of payment of said moneys due them as aforesaid, and the said Wilson and Elbert are willing to advance to the corporation the said sum of $16,000 upon the corporation executing to them its note for the sum of $45,241.60, payable $8,871.08 to said Jones, $18,185.26 to said Wilson, and $18,185.26 to said Elbert, within six months from date, with interest thereon at the rate of 1 per cent. per month, which note shall be secured by a mortgage upon the real property and mining machinery of the corporation in Mono county: Now, therefore, it is resolved, that this corporation make, execute, and deliver to said Jones, Wilson, and Elbert its note for the sum of $45,241.60, payable six months after date, and in amounts following: $8,871.08 to Jones, $18,185.26 to Wilson, and $18,185.26 to Elbert,—and all payments made on said note, to be divided to and among said Jones, Wilson, and Elbert in the proportion of said amounts so due each as aforesaid, and also a mortgage to secure said note, duly signed, executed, and acknowledged, upon all the real property and mining machinery of the corporation in Mono county, California, and the vice-president of this corporation is hereby directed and authorized, in the name of and for the corporation, to make, execute, acknowledge, and deliver said note and mortgage to said Jones, Wilson, and Elbert, affixing to each the corporate name and seal of this corporation."

[1] See note at end of case.

On the same day—November 13, 1882—the note and mortgage were executed for the corporation by Charles H. Sinclair, the vice-president. The following is a copy of the note: "$45.241 60-100. San Francisco, Nov. 13, 1882. Six months after date, for value received, the Mono Lake Hydraulic Mining Company, corporation, promises to pay to D. E. Jones, J. D. Wilson, and John Elbert the sum of forty-five thousand two hundred and forty-one and sixty one-hundredths dollars, (being eight thousand eight hundred and seventy-one and eight one-hundredths dollars to D. E. Jones, eighteen thousand one hundred and eighty-five and twenty-six one-hundredths dollars to J. D. Wilson, and eighteen thousand one hundred and eighty-five and twenty-six one-hundredths dollars to John Elbert,) with interest thereon at the rate of one per cent. per month from date until paid. Any payments on this note are to be divided to and among the said Jones, Wilson, and Elbert in proportion to their respective amounts as aforesaid. MONO LAKE HYDRAULIC MINING COMPANY. By CHAS. H. SINCLAIR, Vice-President. [Corporate seal.]"

On the 3d day of March, 1883, J. D. Wilson applied to Albert Packard, one of the plaintiffs, for a loan of money, offering to assign to Packard his (Wilson's) interest in said note and mortgage as collateral security for the payment of the loan. As a condition of the loan on the security offered Packard required a ratification of the mortgage by the stockholders of the corporation; whereupon J. D. Wilson and John Elbert, as stockholders, executed an instrument in writing, which, after reciting the execution of the note and mortgage, proceeded as follows: "Now, therefore, we, J. D. Wilson, as owner and holder of twenty-five thousand shares of the capital stock of said company, and John Elbert, as owner and holder of forty-five thousand shares of the capital stock of said company, which consists in the aggregate of one hundred thousand shares, do hereby ratify and affirm said mortgage. In witness whereof we have hereunto set our hands this third day of March, 1883. J. D. WILSON. JOHN ELBERT."

After this ratification, and on the same day, Packard loaned Wilson $6,000, for which he took Wilson's note for $7,000, payable March 13, 1884, with interest at the rate of one per cent. per month; and, as collateral security, Wilson then assigned to Packard all his interest in the note and mortgage of the defendant corporation of November 13, 1882. On August 21, 1883, Packard held notes of the defendant corporation which had been made or assigned to him, amounting to $6,738.96, and which, at the request of J. D. Wilson, he surrendered to the corporation, and in lieu thereof took the note of J. D. Wilson and John Elbert for the amount, ($6,738.96;) and, as collateral thereto, Wilson and Elbert, "by way of mortgage," assigned to Packard all their interest in the note and mortgage of the defendant of November 13, 1882. Among the notes surrendered as aforesaid by Packard was one made to him for $2,500, bearing interest at 1 per cent. per month, the consideration for which was only $2,000, the additional $500 being a bonus to Packard. On the 20th day of February, 1883, John Elbert assigned all his interest in the note and mortgage of the defendant of November 13, 1882, to D. E. Jones, "by way of mortgage," to secure payment of his note to Jones for $9,185.26, payable May 13, 1884, with interest at 1 per cent. per month. On March 18, 1884, D. E. Jones, by an instrument in writing absolute upon its face, expressing a consideration of $12,000, assigned to the plaintiff, R. N. Graves, all his right, title, and interest in the note and mortgage of the defendant corporation dated November 13, 1882. This action is brought by Packard and Graves, as assignees of Wilson, Elbert, and Jones, to foreclose the mortgage of the defendant to them of November 13, 1882.

The answer of defendant denies the execution of the note and mortgage. Denies the ratification of the mortgage by two-thirds of the stockholders. Denies that the defendant was indebted to Wilson, Jones, or Elbert in any sum or sums exceeding $200 to Jones, $3,724.20 to Wilson, and $3,724.20 to Elbert; and alleges that neither of these sums was due or payable, or to become due or payable until, by assessments or proceeds of the mine, the defendant should have available funds in its treasury to pay the same. Alleges that on October 21, 1882, and for six months thereafter, Wilson, Jones, and Elbert were the acting officers and managing agents of the defendant, managing all its business and affairs, and occupying fiduciary relations to the defendant and to its stockholders, and controlling the board of directors of the corporation; that they conspired together to cheat and defraud the defendant and its stockholders by obtaining evidence of indebtedness that did not exist, and to which they knew they were not entitled; that, in pursuance of this conspiracy, they procured the passage of the resolutions of the board of directors of October 21 and November 13, 1882, and the execution of the note and mortgage in suit, without any consideration therefor; and that the plaintiffs took the assignments of the note and mortgage with notice of the facts above stated.

The trial court found for the plaintiffs on all the material issues, and ordered a sale of all the real property described in the complaint, to pay the principal and interest due on the note and mortgage, and plaintiffs' costs and attorney's fees, which are found by the court to amount to $59,354.69. The defendant appeals from the judgment, and also from an order denying its motion for a new trial, and relies mainly on the ground that material findings of fact, necessary to support the judgment, are not justified by the evidence.

The case seems to have been tried by plaintiffs' counsel on the theory that although Wilson, Elbert, and Jones were directors and managing agents of the corporation, and trustees of the stockholders, on October 21, 1882, when their several demands were audited and allowed, and also on November 13, 1882, when the vice-president, Sinclair, was authorized to execute, and did execute, the note and mortgage for the sum of those demands, and $16,000 in addition thereto, yet they did not represent or improperly influence their principal (the corporation) in those transactions, and that they dealt fairly and honestly with it, while it was properly represented by other agents who were not interested in the debts allowed and secured; and therefore that the note and mortgage were not voidable at the mere election of the defendant, without regard to the fairness and honesty of the transactions which induced their execution, but were enforceable, by proof on the part of the plaintiffs that they had been fairly and honestly obtained. And accordingly it appears that plaintiffs' counsel assumed the onus of proving, not only the execution of the note and mortgage, but also the fairness and honesty of all transactions leading to their execution or involved therein. Counsel for appellant contends that the judgment cannot stand, even upon the theory of respondents' counsel above indicated, for the reason that the findings of fact supporting that theory are not justified by the evidence. They further contend that in passing the resolutions of October 21 and November 13, 1882, admitting and allowing the demands for which the note of the latter date was given, and in authorizing the execution of the note and mortgage, Wilson, Elbert, and Jones really and substantially represented and controlled the defendant; and therefore that the defendant has properly elected to avoid and repudiate the note and mortgage, regardless of the honesty or dishonesty of the transactions which led to their execution. And they further contend that the mortgage was not ratified by the holders of two-thirds of the stock of the corporation, and is therefore void.

As to the fairness and honesty of the resolution of October 21, 1882, by which it was made to appear that the corporation acknowledged itself indebted to Wilson, Elbert, and Jones in the sum of $29,241.60 "for moneys advanced to pay the running expenses of the mine," it is to be observed that the allowance of one year's back salaries to Wilson, Elbert, and Jones, amounting to $5,400, and constituting a part of the indebtedness, was not shown to have been warranted by the by-law above set out, nor to have been just or equitable. The plaintiffs, as they were bound to do, attempted to prove the services, and the value thereof, for which these salaries had been allowed; and for this purpose called Mr. Jones, the superintendent, who resided in Mono county, and was seldom in San Francisco, where the office of the company was kept, and where Mr. Wilson and Mr. Elbert must have rendered the greater portion of those services. Being asked if Mr. Wilson rendered any services outside of the performance of his duty as president and director, Mr. Jones answered: "Yes, sir. Question. How much of his time was occupied outside of his duties? Answer. I think he put in his whole time visiting the mine, etc., and helped every way he could to make it a success. Q. Do you know the reasonable value of those services? A. I do. I think about $150 a month. I was interested, and thought he earned it." Being asked what was the value of Mr. Elbert's services "outside of his duties as secretary and treasurer," he answered: "Outside, and with secretary, $150 per month. * * * Well, he was busy all the time. He put in all his time, and we were certainly willing to allow him $150 a month." On cross-examination, being asked what any of the directors did in the management of the business of the corporation, he answered: "I don't know. I was up in the mountains. The books will show. I ain't keeping any books." There was no other evidence tending to prove what services were rendered by Messrs. Wilson and Elbert, and no evidence whatever to prove the services, or value of services, rendered by Mr. Jones, except that he was superintendent. Mr. Elbert was not called as a witness for any purpose; and, although Mr. Wilson testified at the trial as to other matters, he was not asked, and did not testify, as to his services, or the services of Elbert or Jones. Under the peculiar circumstances of this case, the evidence was unsatisfactory, and insufficient to prove that these officers of the corporation had performed services in one year, over and above their duties as directors, of the value of $5,400, and that they, as such officers, had fairly and honestly charged the corporation with that sum by the resolution of October 21, 1882, passed by their own votes.

Another item which constituted a part of the indebtedness was $12,633, proceeds of sales of the "Grant Stock," which had been applied to the use of the corporation. By the resolution of October 21, 1882, this sum was charged to the corporation, and credited to Wilson, Elbert, and Jones,—one-third of it to each. This stock (called the "Grant Stock," about 20,000 shares) was purchased in the fall of 1881 from N. R. Grant (to whom it had been issued as one of the incorporators) by Wilson, nominally, and paid for with money realized from sales of a portion of the same stock. This stock was delivered to the secretary, Elbert, and sold by him in small lots to different persons prior to February, 1882. The appellant contends that prior to the sale of this stock by the secretary, and while Wilson, Elbert, and Jones owned all the stock, except 200 shares held by the other two trustees, they agreed with each other to set it aside as working capital of the corporation, and to apply the proceeds of the sale thereof to the payment of the expenses of opening and improving the mine until it should become self-sustaining, and then, if there should be any residue, to divide it equally between them; and that the purchasers of the "Grant Stock" were informed of this agreement, and promised by Elbert and Wilson, at the times of their several purchases, that there should be no assessment on stock until after the proceeds of the "Grant Stock" should be exhausted. J. D. Wilson testified that such was the understanding between Elbert, Jones, and himself; and his testimony as to this was strongly corroborated by the following-named witnesses, most of whom had purchased portions of the "Grant Stock:" J. C. Winans, secretary of the company for a time; Charles H. Sinclair, director and vice-president; Thomas S. Russell, director until after October 21, 1882; E. S. Paddock; George Bill; and Joseph Wilson. An account of the receipts from the sales of the "Grant Stock" was entered in the cash-book,—the only book of accounts kept by the company; but neither Wilson, Elbert, nor Jones was credited with any part of the receipts from such sales before October 21, 1882. Jones, however, testified positively that no agreement or understanding ever existed to the effect that any part of the "Grant Stock" should be set aside or used as working capital of the company, but that such stock was the private property of Wilson, Elbert, and himself. It seems, from the record, that there was a decided preponderance of evidence in favor of the defendant; yet the court found for plaintiffs on this issue.

Another item which entered into and constituted a part of the indebtedness for which the note and mortgage were executed was $16,000, which was to be advanced to the defendant "to pay pressing liabilities and expenses necessary for the protection of its [corporation's] property," as expressed in the preamble of the resolution of November 13, 1882. Although this resolution must be understood to mean that Wilson and Elbert were to advance the $16,000, immediately after the execution of the note and mortgage, "to pay the pressing liabilities," there is no pretense that they advanced a dollar for any purpose before the 3d day of March, 1883,—three and a half months after the execution of the note and mortgage,—when it is claimed that Wilson borrowed $6,000 from Packard, and applied it to the payment of the debts of defendant; but it does not appear what debts he paid, and there is no evidence that he applied any part of the $6,000 to the payment of such debts, or to any use of the defendant, except the testimony of Packard, who says, only, that he was informed by Wilson, Elbert, and Levison, attorney for defendant, that the $6,000 had been applied to the payment of the debts of the defendant.

It further appears that, nine months after the execution of the note and mortgage, (August 21, 1883,) Packard, at request of Wilson, delivered to defendant, through Mr. Levison, notes of the defendant, made to Packard and others, amounting to $6,738.96, and in lieu thereof took the note of Wilson and Elbert for that amount, collaterally secured by an assignment of their interest in the note and mortgage in suit. There was no evidence or pretense of any other advance to defendant, or payment of its debts, by Wilson or Elbert, after the execution of the note and mortgage of November 13, 1882.

The sixteenth finding (not excepted to) is that "all the moneys loaned by said Packard to said J. D. Wilson and to said John Elbert, represented by said notes of $7,000 and $6,738.96, were paid to defendant, and were used to pay defendant's debts contracted in carrying on its business and working its mines." This finding must be taken as true, but there is no evidence of any loan of money to Wilson or Elbert, except the $6,000, for which Wilson gave his note of $7,000, on March 3, 1883. But if we consider the note of defendant, amounting to $6,738, surrendered by Packard, (August 23, 1883,) as a loan to Wilson and Elbert, the whole amount loaned to them by Packard would be only $12,738. Deducting from this the interest which the defendant was paying upon its debts (1 per cent. per month) from November 13, 1882, when the $16,000 should have been advanced, until the debts are alleged to have been paid by Wilson and Elbert, ($6,000, March 3, and $6,738, August 21, 1883,) amounting to about $750, it will appear that Wilson and Elbert only advanced, by paying debts, what was equivalent to an advance of less than $12,000, on the date of the note and mortgage, when, according to the resolution of that date, the $16,000 should have been advanced. Therefore, besides the difference between advancing $16,000 at the date of the note and mortgage, and the purchasing of demands against the defendant to that amount three and a half to nine months afterwards, we find a deficiency of $4,000 in the amount of the demands claimed to have been paid, and, consequently, an admitted failure of the consideration of the note and mortgage to that extent, at least. But the defendant was not bound to accept the alleged payment of its debts by Wilson and Elbert in lieu of the money that they agreed to advance upon the execution of the note and mortgage. Davis v. Mining Co., 55 Cal. 360; Koehler v. Iron Co., 2 Black, 715; 1 Mor. Priv. Corp. § 522.

The fairness, honesty, and good faith of the transactions under consideration are further impeached by the testimony of Charles H. Sinclair, Thomas S. Russell, and E. S. Paddock. Sinclair was first elected a director on October 21, 1882, in place of Jones, but took no part in any business meeting until the meeting of November 13th, at which he was authorized to execute the note and mortgage of that date. He testified that when he was elected he had no experience in the business of corporations; that Mr. Jones, whose place he took on the board of directors, requested him to look out for his interests, and that he (Sinclair) promised Jones that he would do so as if they were his own; that at the meeting of November 13th he was told by Wilson and Elbert that the company owed only about $8,000 or $9,000, and that the mortgage to them and Jones was to be executed as mere matter of form, to prevent an attachment of the property mortgaged until money could be raised to pay the debts, and that the debts, to secure which the note and mortgage were given, were fictitious; that Jones, who was not present at the meeting, had told him substantially the same; that Wilson and Elbert, who were then directors, were present at the meeting, and requested that the resolution authorizing the execution of the note and mortgage be passed, and that it certainly would not have been passed without their request; that it was understood that the company would not be compelled to pay the mortgage, and therefore that it would harm nobody; and that, while the resolution was being acted upon by the other three directors, Wilson and Elbert retired into an adjoining room as a matter of form. Thomas S. Russell, who had been a director up to October 21, 1882, testified that he understood in October, 1882, that the company was very little in debt; that he did not understand that it was indebted to Wilson, Elbert, and Jones in the sums mentioned in the resolution of October 21, 1882; and that Elbert had told him that the mortgage was put on to save trouble,—it would give them time to raise money to meet whatever obligations there were. E. S. Paddock, who was a small stockholder, testified in substance, that Elbert told him that the mortgage was given to protect the property from other debts, as they feared an attachment; that the mortgage would be canceled when the outstanding debts were paid; and that they did not intend to enforce the mortgage. Jones was called in rebuttal, but did not dispute a word of Sinclair's testimony; nor did Wilson, who was present at the trial.

The sixth finding, to the effect that the "Grant Stock" was the property of Wilson, Elbert, and Jones, and that the proceeds of the sale thereof belonged to them, though not satisfactorily proved, would not, in an ordinary case, be disturbed, as the evidence as to it was substantially conflicting; and it may be allowed to stand in this case without affecting the result, and it is therefore unnecessary to decide whether it is justified by the evidence or not. But the ninth finding, "that on and prior to August 21, 1883, J. Elbert and J. D. Wilson paid, in advance, to defendant the sum of $16,000, which is included in said note and mortgage, which sum was used by defendant in payment of debts of defendant;" and the tenth finding, that "all transactions between J. D. Wilson, J. Elbert, and D. E. Jones, with reference to said debts and said note and mortgage, were fair and honest, and the making and executing of said note and mortgage were for the benefit of defendant and all its stockholders,"—are not, nor is either of them, justified by the evidence on any theory of law possibly applicable to the case. The view most favorable to respondents, and which seems to have been adopted by their counsel, is that the case falls within the first exception to the general rule expressed in section 2230 of the Civil Code, as follows: "Sec. 2230. Neither a trustee nor any of his agents may take part in any transaction concerning the trust in which he, or any one for whom he acts as agent, has an interest, present or contingent, adverse to that of his beneficiary, except as follows: (1) When the beneficiary, having capacity to contract, with a full knowledge of the motives of the trustee, and of all other facts concerning the transactions which might affect his own decision, and without the use of any influence on the part of the trustee, permits him to do so. * * *" Section 2234 of the same article provides that "every violation of the provisions of the preceding sections of this article is a fraud against the beneficiary of a trust." These provisions of the Civil Code expressly apply to the directors of corporations in their relation of trustees of the stockholders; and are made to apply to them in this case, as agents of the corporation, by section 2322 of the same Code, which provides that "an authority, [of an agent,] expressed in general terms, however broad, does not authorize an agent * * * (3) to do any act which a trustee is forbidden to do by article 2, c. 1, of the last title," (which title includes the sections above quoted,)—since it does not appear that the directors of the defendant corporation had any specific authority to deal with it as they are shown to have done in this case; and, if they claim authority for their acts, they must claim it under "an authority expressed in general terms;" in which case sections 2230 and 2234 of the Civil Code, in regard to trustees, apply to them as mere agents of the corporation.

Under these conditions, the resolutions of October 21, 1882, allowing and ordering paid to Wilson, Elbert, and Jones all the indebtedness for which the note and mortgage were afterwards given, except the $16,000 to be advanced by Wilson and Elbert, cannot be sustained, for the sufficient reason, among others, that it was not a case in which, being interested in the transaction adversely to the corporation, Wilson, Elbert, and Jones merely dealt with it while it was represented by other agents, but a case in which, as agents of the corporation, they dealt with themselves. They represented both parties to the transaction. Of the directors, only Wilson, Elbert, Jones, and Duncan were present at the meeting that adopted those resolutions. The demands of Wilson, Elbert, and Jones were not considered or allowed separately, but all together in the same resolutions, which could not have been adopted unless at least two of the interested directors had voted for them. Clearly, therefore, the resolutions of October 21, 1882, were voidable at the election of the corporation, or at the election of a minority of the stockholders, in case the corporation had refused to avoid them, without regard to whether they were fair and honest or not. Andrews v. Pratt, 44 Cal. 309; San Diego v. Railroad Co., Id. 106; Wilbur v. Lynde, 49 Cal. 290; Chamberlain v.

Wool-Growing Co., 54 Cal. 103; Tracy v. Colby, 55 Cal. 67; Wardell v. Railroad Co., 103 U. S. 651; Koehler v. Iron Co., 2 Black, 715; 1 Mor. Priv. Corp. §§ 516-520. It is not intended to decide, however, that these directors may not have recovered from the corporation the value of money or property honestly advanced by them, and which had been used by and for the benefit of the corporation in carrying on its business, or the value of services rendered by them outside of the duties of their office, in a proper case, and upon a proper showing. The circumstances under which such recovery may be had are indicated in Mor. Priv. Corp. §§ 526, 715, 716. But no proper case for such recovery is made here. Indeed, there is no foundation for it in the complaint. The sole object of the action is to foreclose a mortgage executed to secure the payment of a note alleged to have been made by the corporation to its directors, and by them assigned to the plaintiffs. There is no count for the value of money or property advanced to, and used by, or for the benefit of, the corporation, nor for the value of services rendered by the assignors of the plaintiffs. In Gardner v. Butler, 30 N. J. Eq. 702, VAN SYCKEL, J., said: "The rule is that the trustee cannot fortify himself by a contract which he makes with himself, or for his own benefit, and set it up, either at law or in equity, as a valid obligation. * * * But, while the express undertaking is without legal force, the directors of a company have a right to serve it in the capacity of officers, agents, or employes, and for such services the law will enable them to recover a just and reasonable compensation. * * * No claim which they may make against their company can acquire any support or validity from the fact that they have expressly sanctioned it. It must rest exclusively upon its fairness and justice, and be enforced upon the quantum meruit." The decision of this court in Wilbur v. Lynde, 49 Cal. 290, rests upon the principles thus announced by Justice VAN SYCKEL.

The meeting of November 13, 1882, nominally composed of the three directors,—Sinclair, Duncan, and L. J. Wilson,—which adopted the resolution authorizing Sinclair to execute the note and mortgage, did not pretend to investigate or to pass upon the merits of the demands to be secured by the mortgage. That meeting was notified by the vice-president "that Messrs. Jones, Wilson, and Elbert called for the money due them, and insisted on its being paid or secured." Thereupon the resolution authorizing the note and mortgage was adopted, reciting that the company "is indebted to D. E. Jones in the sum of $8,871 8-100, to J. D. Wilson in the sum of $10,185 26-100, and to John Elbert in the sum of $10,185 26-100, for moneys advanced, as appears by the books of the corporation," that is, by the resolutions of October 21, 1882; for it appears that those sums were never credited on those books until that date. The resolution further recites the need of the sum of $16,000 to pay other pressing liabilities of the corporation, and that "Wilson and Elbert are willing to advance to the corporation the said sum of $16,000 upon the corporation executing to them" the note and mortgage in the form in which they were executed. The resolution only purports to authorize additional security for the debts audited and ordered paid by the resolution of October 21st, adopted by the votes of Wilson, Elbert, and Jones, and also to secure the $16,000 to be advanced by Wilson and Elbert, and, therefore, does not cure the infirmity of the alleged debts theretofore allowed, and evidenced only by the resolution of October 21st. No part of the transactions of November 13, 1882, resulting in the execution of the note and mortgage, appears to have been fair or honest on the part of Wilson, Elbert, and Jones. We have seen that Wilson and Elbert never did advance the $16,000 to the corporation; that they admitted to Sinclair and others that the debts to be secured by the mortgage were fictitious; that the object of the mortgage was to prevent an attachment of the property; and that they did not intend to enforce it, but would cancel it as soon as money could be raised to pay the other debts. They were present at the meeting immediately before the resolution was offered, and requested its adoption, and retired to an adjoining room while the resolution was being acted upon, as matter of form; and Sinclair testified that the resolution certainly would not have been adopted had they not requested its adoption. If the undisputed testimony of Sinclair is true, Wilson and Elbert were substantially present when the resolution was acted upon, and influenced its adoption. Their conduct and representations tended to deceive the other three directors as to the true object of the mortgage, and as to their motives in requesting the adoption of the resolution, and also as to their intention to advance the $16,000. That their conduct and representations had this effect is confirmed by the sequel. It is therefore quite clear that their conduct in procuring the execution of the note and mortgage does not come within the first exception to the rule provided by section 2230 of the Civil Code, but is governed by that rule. It cannot be said that the corporation, "without the use of any influence" on the part of Wilson, Elbert, and Jones, and "with full knowledge" of their motives, "and of all other facts concerning the transaction which might affect its decision," permitted them so to deal with it. The corporation, therefore, may repudiate the note and mortgage, as it has elected to do, thus leaving the respective assignees of the plaintiffs to such remedy as each may be entitled to upon quantum meruit allegations.

Finding 11, that the mortgage was duly ratified on the 3d day of March, 1883, by the holders of two-thirds of the stock, is not justified by the evidence. In the written instrument by which Wilson and Elbert attempted to ratify the mortgage, they declare that Wilson was then the holder of 25,000, and Elbert the holder of 45,000 shares of the capital stock of the company. To prove this, the plaintiffs called Richard Barnard as an expert book-keeper, who testified that he had examined the defendant's stock-book of certificates, from No. 1 down to and including certificate No. 147, with the stubs and indorsements, for the purpose of ascertaining how many shares of defendant's capital stock were held by Wilson and Elbert on March 3, 1883; that he thereby found that Wilson held on that day 11,850 shares, of which he gave a list. He also gave a list of certificates and number of shares held by Elbert on that day, as shown by that book, amounting to 38,300 shares. He then gave a list of canceled certificates, Nos. 119, 120, 121, and 122, of 5,000 shares each, and Nos. 124 and 125, of 500 shares each, amounting to 21,000 shares, which he found reattached to their stubs. All these certificates appeared to have been issued to D. E. Jones in October, 1882, and across the face of each was written, "Canceled March 17, 1883." No. 119 was indorsed: "Transferred Feb. 20, 1883. D. E. Jones, Tr." No. 120, same indorsement. No. 121, same. No. 122 is indorsed: "Transferred Feb. 20, 1884, J. Elbert, Tr.;" and "Feb. 20, 1884, D. E. Jones." Nos. 124 and 125 are indorsed simply, "D. E. Jones, trustee," without date. Plaintiffs also put in evidence that part of said certificate and stub book containing the stubs, and canceled certificates thereto attached, from 1 to 147 inclusive, all of which are copied into the transcript. It does not appear, however, by the stubs or otherwise, what was the number of the certificate issued in lieu of any one of these six canceled certificates, as the place on the stubs in which this number should have been entered remains blank. Nor does it appear to whom any of the lieu certificates were issued. On the part of plaintiffs D. E. Jones testified that he assigned and delivered these certificates to J. Elbert absolutely on February 20, 1883. On the part of defendant, J. D. Wilson testified, as an expert book-keeper, that he had examined said book of certificates and stubs for the purpose of ascertaining how many shares of stock Elbert had on March 3, 1883, and that it appeared from said book that Elbert was the holder of only 37,800 shares on that date. John Elbert was not called, and did not testify as a witness in the case, although it appeared by the testimony of J. D. Wilson that he (Elbert) was present during a part of the time while the depositions of the eight witnesses on the part of the defendant were being taken in San Francisco on May 27, 1884, and that witness saw him in San Francisco on October 1, 1884, seven days before the commencement of the trial, and, so far as witness knew, Elbert had been in San Francisco all the time since the taking of said depositions.

In the absence of any other evidence than that of the assignment of the six certificates in question by Jones to Elbert on February 20, 1883, perhaps the disputable presumption that Elbert continued to be the holder of the stock represented by those certificates (21,000 shares) on March 3, 1883, might have been indulged. Section 1963, Code Civil Proc. But from the cancellation of those certificates on March 17, 1883, the inference is not that Elbert held them until that day, but that he may have assigned them at some time prior to their cancellation, and possibly before March 3, 1883, (the date of the alleged ratification.) The presumption, under any circumstance, could only be "that a thing once proved to exist continues as long as is usual with things of that nature." There is no evidence as to how long the assignees of mining stocks usually hold them, nor as to how soon, after assignment, the assignee usually presents the certificates to the corporation for transfer and cancellation; and, since the law does not fix or limit these times, the court has no means of ascertaining them, unless it may take judicial notice of the usual course or mode of such transactions in mining stocks, which seems to have been done, to a limited extent, in Brewster v. Sime, 42 Cal. 143, which, perhaps, is of doubtful authority on this point. But it seems to be settled that certificates of stock indorsed in blank by the owners to whom they were issued, pass by mere delivery, without further indorsement, and without transfer on the books of the corporation, although they are not negotiable securities, in the commercial sense, or within the definition of the Civil Code. Brewster v. Sime, 42 Cal. 143; Cook, Stocks, § 441; Thompson v. Toland, 48 Cal. 111; Sherwood v. Mining Co., 50 Cal. 412; Winter v. Mining Co., 53 Cal. 431; Barstow v. Mining Co., 64 Cal. 388, 1 Pac. Rep. 349, Arnold v. Johnson, 66 Cal. 402, 5 Pac. Rep. 796. It follows that Elbert may have assigned the certificates indorsed to him in blank by Jones before the 3d day of March following, by mere delivery; and the same certificates may have passed through several persons in the same manner before the 17th of March, when they appear to have been canceled at the instance of persons not identified by the evidence. Moreover, it is to be observed that the certificate numbered 122 (for 5,000 shares) appears to have been indorsed by Elbert on the 20th day of February, 1884, the same date of the indorsement by Jones, (page 271;) the year 1884, instead of 1883, evidently being a typographical error, as Jones testified it was in 1883, and the indorsements were so read by him, and by counsel on the trial, (folios 350 to 364.) This tends to prove that Elbert assigned that certificate on the same day it was assigned to him by Jones; and deducting the 5,000 shares represented by that certificate from the number of shares claimed by respondents to have been held by Elbert and Wilson March 3, 1883, viz., 71,150 shares, would leave them only 66,150 shares,—516 shares less than two-thirds of all the stock.

Another circumstance strongly tending to prove that Elbert did not hold the stock in question on the 3d day of March, 1883, is that, in the instrument of that date, by which he and Wilson attempted to ratify the mortgage, he only declared himself to be the holder of 45,000 shares, which is 14,300 shares less than was claimed for him on the trial. That instrument was signed only 11 days after the 6 certificates (21,000 shares) were assigned to him by Jones. He had been the secretary of the corporation, and appears to have entered in the book all the issues, transfers, and cancellations of stock up to that time. Under these circumstances, it seems incredible that he underestimated the number of shares then held by him by 14,300 shares, while it is admitted that Wilson, in the same instrument, overestimated his by 13,000 shares. Again, it is unaccountable, by the record, that plaintiffs did not call Elbert as a witness or take his deposition as to this and other important issues of which the burden of proof was upon them, upon any other ground than that they feared, at least, if they did not know that his testimony would be against them for it appears, prima facie, that they might have taken his deposition, if they could not have induced him to attend at the trial.

There is nothing in the point that plaintiffs took their respective assignments of the note and mortgage without notice of any defense thereto, since the note is not a negotiable promissory note. Civil Code § 3087. Besides, only Wilson's first assignment to Packard was made before the note became due. The second assignment to Packard by Wilson and Elbert, and the assignment by Jones to Graves, were made after the maturity of the note. Undoubtedly, all the assignments to the plaintiffs were without prejudice to the defenses pleaded. Code Civil Proc. § 368. I think the judgment and order should be reversed, and a new trial ordered.

We concur: FOOTE, C.; HAYNE, C.

NOTE.

CORPORATIONS—CONTRACTS WITH OFFICERS. A contract between a corporation and individuals, some of whom are directors of the corporation, is voidable at the option of the corporation. Thomas v. Railroad Co., 3 Sup. Ct. Rep. 315, reversing 2 Fed. Rep. 877; Meeker v. Iron Co., 17 Fed. Rep. 48; Munson v. Railway Co., (N. Y.) 8 N. E. Rep. 355; Bernard v. Myroleum Co., (Mass.) 17 N. E. Rep. 887. A director of a corporation is not absolutely prohibited from entering into a contract with it through his fellow-directors; but the validity of such contract depends upon its nature and terms, and the circumstances under which it is made. Hubbard v. Investment Co., 14 Fed. Rep. 675; Thomas v. Sweet, (Kan.) 14 Pac. Rep. 545; Appeal of Hammond, (Pa.) 16 Atl. Rep. 419. Such contract will be enforced when shown to have been made for the benefit of the corporation, and to be just. Trust Co. v. Weed, 2 Fed. Rep. 24. A director of a corporation may become its creditor, and take security for his debt, but his conduct in enforcing such claim will be more closely scrutinized than that of an ordinary creditor, and the proceedings set aside if it appears that he has not acted in good faith as director. Hallam v. Hotel Co., (Iowa,) 9 N. W. Rep. 111. See, also, Garrett v. Plow Co., (Iowa,) 29 N. W. Rep. 395. On a sale of corporate property to one of the directors taking part in the transaction as buyer and seller, it devolves upon the directors to establish the good faith of the transaction, and that the sale produced the full value of the property. Wilkinson v. Bauerle, (N. J.) 7 Atl. Rep. 514. The sale by the president of a national bank, to himself and cashier, of the stock of the bank owned by the bank, may be ratified by the bank or its legal representative; but a sale by himself to the bank of its own stock, where he acts in the double capacity of seller and buyer, cannot be ratified, when the purchase of the stock by the bank is not necessary to prevent loss upon a debt previously contracted. SLANDER—ACTION FOR—PLEADING—INSTRUCTIONS—PRIVILEGED COMMUNICATIONS.

1. In an action for slander, where defendant admits the making of the charge complained of, but neither alleges its truth in his answer nor attempts to prove it at the trial, it is error to instruct that the law allows the defendant to plead the truth of the matter alleged to be defamatory, and that this does not remove the burden from the plaintiff to prove it false, even though defendant does not set up the truth of the alleged slanderous matter.

2. The reckless repetition of a mere rumor concerning the character of a candidate for public office, without any attempt to investigate its truth or probability, is not privileged.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Contra Costa county; JOSEPH P. JONES, Judge.

Chase & Chase, for appellant. W. S. Tinning and L. B. & L. Mizner, for respondent.

HAYNE, C. Action for slander. Verdict and judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. The answer does not set up the truth of the charge alleged to have been made against the plaintiff, which was slanderous per se: and at the trial the defendant admitted that he made it. No attempt was made to prove that the charge was true, and none could have been made under the pleadings. In this state of the case the court gave the following instruction: "The law allows the defendant, in an action for slander, to plead the truth of the matter alleged to be defamatory, and this does not remove the burden from the plaintiff to prove that the alleged slanderous matter is false, even though the defendant does not set up the truth of the alleged slanderous matter." This was, in effect, to tell the jury that it was necessary for the plaintiff to prove a matter which was admitted by the pleadings, and was manifestly erroneous.

There are other errors in the record; but, as they need not arise upon a retrial, we deem it sufficient to say that, while a communication from one voter to another concerning the character of a candidate for public office may be privileged, and consequently excusable even though it turns out to have been untrue, yet that the reckless repetition of a mere rumor, without any attempt at investigation of its truth or probability, is not within the protection of the rule.

We therefore advise that the judgment and order appealed from be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; VAN CLIEF, C.

JUDICIAL NOTICE—JUDGMENTS—WAIVER OF PROTEST BY INDORSER—NOVATION.

and private official acts of the * * * judicial department of this state," does not authorize a court to dispense with formal proof of its judgment in another cause.

2. In an action against the maker of a note for the amount paid thereon by the indorser, it is no defense that the indorser paid it without proper demand and notice; for, as these are for the benefit of the indorser, he may waive any defects therein.

3. The execution by an indorser of his own note, which is given and accepted in full payment of the note on which he is liable as indorser, constitutes a novation under Civil Code Cal. § 1530, providing that "novation is the substitution of a new obligation for an existing one," and is made (section 1531) "by the substitution of a new obligation between the same parties with intent to extinguish the old obligation;" and the maker of the first note becomes liable to the indorser, though the holder, instead of canceling it, indorsed it without recourse to the indorser.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JONH HUNT, Judge.

Wm. H. Fifield, for appellant. Henry N. Clement, for respondents.

GIBSON, C. This action was brought by C. M. Hitchcock, who has since died, to recover from the defendant the sum of $6,136.50, with interest, on account of the payment, for and on behalf of the defendant, of a certain promissory note made by him on February 11, 1879, for $4,500, with interest, payable to the order of Hitchcock, at the London & San Francisco Bank, Limited, on April 11, 1879, and which note he (Hitchcock) indorsed solely for the accommodation of defendant, who thereupon negotiated it to the said bank, and received the full amount of note in money for his own benefit, and then at maturity let it go to protest for non-payment. Subsequently, when the statute of limitations had about run against the note, Hitchcock paid it by giving his own note to, and which was received by, the bank in full satisfaction and payment of the protested note, which was by the bank indorsed without recourse, and surrendered to Hitchcock. Defendant, by his answer, admitted the making, indorsement, and negotiation of the note, but denied that Hitchcock was an accommodation indorser thereon to any greater extent than $3,631.28, and averred that the remaining $868.72, at the time the note was negotiated, was due from him to the defendant on account of a certain note, theretofore made by Hitchcock in favor of defendant, and by the latter negotiated to the above-named bank, and afterwards by him paid to the bank. He also denied that the note was protested: that notice thereof was given to plaintiff; and that Hitchcock paid the note; and claimed the said sum of $868.72 as an offset, and the further sum of $4,000 for services rendered as an attorney to Hitchcock, by way of counter-claim.

The complaint is sufficient to sustain an action by plaintiff, either for money paid out to the use of defendant, or upon the note as an equitable assignee thereof. The trial resulted in a denial of the offset and counter-claim of defendant, and a judgment against him for the full amount of plaintiff's demand. The appeal is from this judgment, and an order denying a new trial.

The appellant urges as the principal reasons why his appeal should be sustained—First, that there is no evidence to support the findings in which his offset and counter-claim are disallowed; second, that his note was not legally protested, and hence Hitchcock could not be held as an indorser and had no right to pay the note, but, having paid it, he acted as a volunteer and could not recover of the appellant,—the maker of the note: third, that Hitchcock's note, given to and accepted by the bank in payment of appellant's note, did not and could not constitute such a payment as entitled Hitchcock to recover therefor.

(a) The court found that it was not true that Hitchcock was an accommodation indorser only to the extent of $3,631.28 of the amount of the note, but that he indorsed the note wholly for the accommodation of appellant; and, further, that the offset and counter-claim could not be allowed, because they had formed the basis of separate actions prosecuted by the appellant, as plaintiff, against Hitchcock in the same court in which the action was tried, and which had been fully adjudicated. Respondents concede that there is no evidence in the record to show such adjudication, but in support of the findings argue that, as the claims were adjudicated in the same court, under section 1875, Code Civil Proc., which permits the courts of this state to take judicial cognizance of certain matters without formal proof, the trial court properly dispensed with formal proof of its own records showing the adjudications, and took judicial notice of them for the basis of its findings. The method suggested would be an easy one for supplying proof of a judgment, and, if it could prevail, would place all judgments in the same court beyond the reach of inquiry as to their reliability, since what a court can judicially notice in a case cannot be overcome by evidence. The scope of the above Code provision was evidently misapprehended, for while the court could take judicial notice of (subdivision 3) "public and private official acts of the legislative, executive, and judicial departments of this state and of the United States," it could not dispense with proof of such judicial acts as might be in judgments. For example, we know judicially that the superior court, from whence this appeal came, is divided into 12 departments, and that a judge presides in each, but we cannot know without competent proof what the judicial acts of the several judges may be. Thus said this court in People v. De La Guerra, 24 Cal. 73: "In the trial of one case the court can no more take judicial notice of the record in another case in the same court without its formal introduction in evidence than if it were a record in another court; much less can this court take notice of the existence of a record not introduced in evidence in the court below." To the same effect is Water Co. v. Cowles, 31 Cal. 215. This error alone, if it does not affect the merits of the case, will not warrant a reversal, because it is a well-settled rule that a judgment which is sustained by the record will not be reversed because one of the reasons upon which it is based is erroneous. Kidd v. Teeple, 22 Cal. 255; Webster v. King, 33 Cal. 348; Helm v. Dumars, 3

Cal. 455. As the appellant did not, at the trial, adduce any evidence in support of his affirmative defenses, he therefore failed to establish them; and the court properly found against them, although for an erroneous reason. It is therefore obvious that, as the findings were justified, the reason is immaterial, and did not affect the merits of the case.

(b) A promissory note may be protested in this state. McFarland v. Pico, 8 Cal. 626; Kellogg v. Box Factory, 57 Cal. 327. And when protested, the protest is prima facie evidence of the demand, non-payment, and notice to any or all of the parties to the note. Pol. Code, § 795. "But," said this court in Kellogg v. Box Factory, "it is not necessary, in order to fix the liability of indorsers, that a note should be protested for non-payment. A presentation of it to the maker upon the day of its maturity for payment, a refusal by him to pay it, and notice to the indorsers of such presentation and refusal, are sufficient."

The present case, however, illustrates the convenience of a protest, at least to banking institutions. The note was payable at the London & San Francisco Bank, Limited, which was at the same time the holder of the note. Now, to avoid making a demand upon itself, and a refusal of payment for lack of funds in its hands belonging to the maker of the note, it called in a notary for its convenience, whom it constituted its agent to make the necessary demand of payment at the bank, and who was authorized to place the dishonor of the note in a form that would constitute prima facie evidence thereof. The convenience of a notary in this respect was recognized by STORY J., as long ago as 1822, in Nicholls v. Webb, 8 Wheat. 326. Hitchcock, as indorser, was entitled to notice of the dishonor of the note, but as it was for the benefit of himself and the holder, and not for that of the maker, he could waive it, if he saw fit to do so. Civil Code, § 3135, subd. 1; 2 Daniel, Neg. Inst. § 1090. In Curtis v. Sprague, 51 Cal. 239, which was an action upon a note against the maker and an indorser, who was treated as a guarantor, the latter having promised to pay the note after maturity, and with full knowledge that the holder had failed to make a demand of payment, and give notice of non-payment, the court said: "It is well settled that a promise by an indorser or guarantor, after maturity, to pay the note, with notice of the laches, dispenses with the necessity of proving demand and notice." This rule is almost universal wherever the law merchant prevails. Daniel, Neg. Inst. § 114; Story, Prom. Notes, § 274. So, if a notice may be completely waived by an indorser, or entirely dispensed with by his promise to pay after maturity, it is plain that he may determine whether he will treat a notice that may be imperfect as sufficient or not. Hence, as Hitchcock brought into court at the trial one of the duplicate notices of dishonor, made out and sent to him at two different places by the notary, it is evident that he at some time received the one he produced. Whether he received it in time was for him, not the maker, to determine. That he (Hitchcock) considered that the notice was in time, and effectual, may be inferred from the fact that he never questioned it; but with a knowledge of its defects, if any existed, at all times afterwards admitted his liability upon the note, and subsequently, and just before the statute of limitations had fully run against it, paid it. If no demand and notice had been given, and the indorser voluntarily paid the note at any time before it became barred, how could the maker be injured? He is the one that is primarily liable, and it matters not whether he is compelled to pay to the holder in the first place, or to his accommodation indorser, after the latter has paid the holder of the note, in the next place.

The plaint of the maker of the note in this case, that notice of dishonor was not given to his accommodation indorser, does not come with as good grace as it might from an indorser whom the indorsee was seeking to hold in an action upon the note, wherein it would be incumbent upon the plaintiff to prove a proper demand and non-payment and notice in order to hold him. Here the indorser admitted the receipt of notice and the demand, the latter being undisputed, and acted upon them, besides in paying the note, as he had a right to do at any time before it was barred. Besides, it seems the appellant at one time was satisfied with the manner in which the notice of dishonor was given, and the consequent liability of Hitchcock, as he, several times after the dishonor of the note, promised both the bank and Hitchcock that he would pay it, and did make several small payments to the bank on account of interest. Therefore the findings in this respect are fully sustained by the evidence.

(c) "Novation is the substitution of a new obligation for an existing one," (Civil Code, § 1530;) and it is made "by the substitution of a new obligation between the same parties, with intent to extinguish the old obligation," (Id. § 1531.) This is in accordance with the Roman law upon this subject; and, says Judge Story in his work on Promissory Notes, § 105: "It shows that common sense, in its application to the every-day transactions of human life, speaks the same language, and is regulated by the same motives of convenience and policy and justice, in all civilized countries, however wide their distance or remote their ages from each other. Thus we are told in the institutes that the ancient lawyers at Rome held that a novation—the substitution of a new debt for an old one thereby extinguishing the former — (Evans, Poth. Obl. marg. p. 546; Dig. Lib. 46, tit. 2, c. 1) arose when a second contract was intended to dissolve a former." And again, in section 438: "A negotiable promissory note will, by our law, operate as an extinguishment of a prior existing debt if it is so intended between the parties. The only question is as to the proof of such intention." Applying this doctrine in this case, the testimony of Hitchcock, the indorser of the note, and that of Scrivener, the managing agent of the bank that held the note, indisputably shows that the note of Hitchcock was given and received in absolute extinguishment of the latter's liability as indorser upon the appellant's note. Hence, as between Hitchcock and the bank, the appellant's note was fully paid, and a novation was thereby perfected between Hitchcock and the bank.

It makes no difference to the appellant, that we can perceive, that the bank, instead of canceling the note, indorsed it without recourse to Hitchcock, because between him and the maker he, as an accommodation indorser, stood towards the bank as a surety for the maker. Therefore the appellant, as principal debtor, was bound to reimburse his surety for his disbursements in satisfaction of the note, including necessary costs and expenses. Civil Code, § 2847. See Waldrip v. Black, 74 Cal. 409, 16 Pac. Rep. 226, and Fowler v. Strickland, 107 Mass. 552. In the first case Waldrip signed a note as surety for and with the two defendants, they having executed a mortgage on realty to secure him against possible loss. He was compelled to pay the note to the holder, who, upon such payment, indorsed the note to Waldrip. The latter, to obtain reimbursement, brought suit upon the note against the makers, and to foreclose the mortgage. Held that, having paid the note, he became the equitable assignee thereof, and was entitled to enforce it as the holder thereof, as well as to foreclose the mortgage as collateral security.

In Fowler v. Strickland, which was similar to the present case, the note for $2,000 sued on was an accommodation note, made by the defendants to the plaintiff, as payee, who indorsed it for the accommodation of the defendants. They, defendants, thereupon negotiated it to one Loomis for the full amount of the note, and the plaintiff, as such indorser, thereby became liable for such amount in an action on the note by Loomis or other lawful holder. At the maturity of the note one of the defendant makers of the note informed the plaintiff that they would be unable to meet the note, and the plaintiff would be obliged to pay it. Soon after, the plaintiff took up the note by giving Loomis, the holder, in payment three promissory notes, signed by himself and another person, aggregating $700, and nothing further. The court, by Gray, J., held that "the plaintiff had the same right as any other person to purchase the note from Loomis for such price as might be agreed on between them. Even if, by the terms of such an agreement, Loomis had retained any interest in the proceeds of the note which he delivered to the plaintiff, the latter, in an action against the defendants on the note, could have recovered the full amount thereof, although he might have held a part of the proceeds in trust for Loomis. If he purchased the entire interest of Loomis in the note at the time of its delivery by Loomis to him, he might recover the whole amount to his own use. The defendants, having received the whole amount of the note at the time of its original negotiation, and being now no longer liable to any action by Loomis, the amount of their liability in this action against them as makers of the note is not affected by the question of how much the plaintiff paid to Loomis, or whether the sum recovered will belong to Loomis or to the plaintiff." Of what concern then is it to the appellant here whether Hitchcock's note is ever paid or not? It ought to be sufficient for him to know that it relieved him of his responsibility to the bank upon his own note, of which he received the fruit. At one time, as we have seen, he was satisfied of the liability of his indorser upon the notice of dishonor, which he now strenuously seeks to avoid on this appeal.

Our conclusion is that, whether we regard the action as one upon the note by an equitable assignee, or one for money paid to the use of the defendant, the liability of the appellant in either case is manifest from the evidence; and, as there is no prejudicial error in the record, the judgment and order ought to be affirmed.

We concur: Belcher, C. C.; Hayne, C.

FALK v. STROTHER, Auditor. (No. 12,061.)

MANDATE TO COUNTY AUDITOR.

Under the act of the California legislature commonly known as the "Consolidation Act," (article 6, § 92,) providing that any person may appeal from the rejection of his claim by the county auditor to the county board, whose decision thereon shall be final, a writ of mandate will issue against the auditor to pay a claim allowed by the county board on appeal from its rejection by him, though the rejection may have been justified on its first presentation.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; T. H. Rearden, Judge.

George Flournoy, Jr., (Philip A. Galpin and Wilson & Wilson, of counsel,) for appellant. Oliver P. Evans and M. A. Edmonds, for respondent.

Sharpstein, J. This appeal is from a judgment directing a peremptory writ of mandate to issue out of the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco commanding the defendant, Fleet F. Strother, auditor of said city and county, to audit and allow the demand of the plaintiff, Ray G. Falk, for his salary as agent of the board of election commissioners for the detection of fraud, and the scrutinizing of the registration of voters, and appointment of election officers for the half month of September, 1886. Said board of election commissioners approved and allowed his claim and demand for a half month's salary as agent aforesaid. Such demand was afterwards presented to the defendant, auditor as aforesaid, and he refused to audit and allow the same. The plaintiff then appealed from the decision of defendant to the board of supervisors of said city and county, and said board approved and allowed said demand. Thereafter plaintiff presented his said claim, so approved and allowed by said board of supervisors, to defendant, and requested him to allow and audit the same, and make the proper entries in the proper books, in like manner as in other demands allowed by him, and to make the proper indorsement on the same.

Section 92 of article 6 of the act of the legislature commonly known as the "Consolidation Act" provides that "if any person fee aggrieved by the decision of the auditor or other proper officer or officers of said city and county, except the board of education, in the rejection of, or refusal to approve or allow, any demand upon the treasury, presented by such person, he may appeal, and have the same passed upon by the board of supervisors, whose decision thereon shall be final; and, if the said board shall approve and allow the demand, it shall afterwards be presented to the auditor, and entered in the proper book, in like manner as other demands allowed by him, and an indorsement must be made of its having been so entered before it can be paid." Conceding, as we do, that the auditor was justified in refusing to audit and allow this claim when presented to him for that purpose, was it not his plain duty, after his decision had been appealed from to the board of supervisors, and reversed by that board, to enter it in like manner as other demands allowed by him? Such appears to be the duty enjoined on him by law, and the law must be obeyed. After an appeal has been taken from the decision of the auditor, and his decision reversed by the board of supervisors, the duty of the auditor is simply ministerial or clerical. He can no longer exercise any discretion in the premises. The law plainly prescribes his duty. Judgment affirmed.

(No. 12,120.)

Carriers of Passengers—Connecting Lines.

A railroad company which sells a coupon ticket over its own and connecting lines, containing the condition, referred to in each coupon, that the company, in issuing the ticket, acted for itself over its own line, and as agent of the connecting lines, but assumed no responsibility beyond its own line, and would not permit stop-over privileges, is not liable for injuries received by the holder while riding on the connecting line.[1]

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; John W. Armstrong, Judge.

B. McKinne and George B. Gillen, for appellant. W. H. L. Barnes, for respondents.

Per Curiam. Action for damages for bodily injuries received by plaintiff through the alleged negligence of defendants while carrying plaintiff as a passenger on a stage-coach from Gilroy Hot Springs to Gilroy. Both defendants answered, but at the trial the defendant corporation only appeared, and, after the plaintiff closed his case, it moved for and obtained a nonsuit as to itself. The case was then given to the jury, who returned a verdict for plaintiff against defendant Paine. From the judgment of nonsuit plaintiff appeals. The facts are as follows: On the several dates hereinafter mentioned, the respondent corporation owned and was operating a steam railroad for the carriage of passengers and baggage between San Jose and Gilroy in either direction, and the defendant Paine was the owner of and operating a stage line between Gilroy and Gilroy Hot Springs for the carriage of passengers and baggage in either direction. On the 23d of June, 1885, the plaintiff purchased of the respondent a round-trip special excursion ticket from San Jose to Gilroy Hot Springs and return to San Jose, entitling him to transportation over the railway and stage line above mentioned. The ticket was in the form of a coupon ticket, and had three coupons attached to it. The first provided for one continuous passage from San Jose to Gilroy; the second, for one passage from Gilroy to Gilroy Hot Springs; the third, for one passage from Gilroy Hot Springs to Gilroy; and the main ticket, for one continuous passage from Gilroy to San Jose. Among other matters not material here, the ticket contained on its face the following: "Issued by the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, acting for itself over its own line, and as agent for the line named in the accompanying checks, but assuming no responsibility beyond its own line. * * * In consideration of this ticket being sold at a reduced price from the regular first-class rate, it is hereby understood and agreed upon by the purchaser that it will not be good for passage after October 31st of the year indicated by agent's punch mark in the margin, that it is not transferable, and no stop-over privileges will be granted." These conditions were referred to in each of the coupons. On the 27th day of June, 1885, when the appellant was returning from Gilroy Hot Springs to Gilroy, upon said ticket, as a passenger, on a stage-coach of the stage line belonging to the defendant Paine, the stage-coach, while descending a steep grade on the road, and making a sharp turn around a bank on one side, was upset against the bank, solely through the negligence of the driver, and the appellant was crushed between the bank and stage-coach and severely injured. The claim of appellant is that the respondent, by selling him the ticket from San Jose to Gilroy Hot Springs, via Gilroy, and return to the first place, undertook, as principal, to transport him over the connecting stage line from Gilroy to Gilroy Hot Springs and back to Gilroy, and is liable as such principal for the default of the owner of the stage line.

Doubtless, a railway company may so issue tickets to places beyond its own line, and so control the transportation of its passengers as to be held to have contracted for the entire distance, and, in consequence, be answerable in damages for negligence occurring on any one of the connecting lines. Such is the effect of the following cases, cited by appellant, viz.: Railroad Co. v Blake, 7 Hurl & N. 987; Buxton v. Railway Co., L. R. 3 Q. B. 549; Ward v. Vanderbilt, 4 Abb. Dec. 521; Williams v. Vanderbilt, 28 N. Y. 217; Van Buskirk v. Roberts, 31 N. Y. 671; Quimby v. Vanderbilt, 17 N. Y. 307; McElroy v. Railroad Corp., 4 Cush. 400; Schopman v. Railroad Corp., 9 Cush. 24; McLean v. Burbank, 11 Minn. 277, (Gil. 189;) Carter v. Peck, 4 Sneed, 203; Wheeler v. Railroad Co., 31 Cal. 46. But we understand the rule to be that where there are several connecting lines, and the plaintiff seeks, as in the present case, to recover of one for an injury received upon another of the connecting lines, he must establish a contract with the line he endeavors to hold, or that it had some interest in, or control over, the transportation of passengers by the line in default. Wylde v. Railroad Co., 53 N. Y. 156; Railroad Co. v. Schwarzenberger, 45 Pa. St. 208; Railroad Co. v. Connell, 18 Amer & Eng. R. Cas. 339; Hartan v. Railroad Co., 114 Mass. 44; Brooke v. Railway Co., 15 Mich. 332; Knight v. Railroad Co., 56 Me. 234; 2 Redf. R. R. (6th Ed.) 313, 314. Do the facts in the present case show a contract between the appellant and respondent whereby the latter undertook to carry the former to Gilroy Hot Springs and back again to San Jose? The only evidence upon this point is that the appellant purchased, paid for, and accepted the ticket containing the notice and conditions above set forth, and that he rode upon it from one of the termini to the other and back again. There is not a word to show that the respondent undertook differently from what appears upon the face of the ticket. The sections of the Civil Code cited by appellant refer only to contracts of railroad companies for carriage over their own lines. The nonsuit was properly granted, and the judgment is affirmed.

NOTE.

Common Carriers — Connecting Lines. In the absence of a contract to carry to the ultimate destination, the liability of a common carrier is limited to its own route; and the fact that it receives goods with knowledge that they are destined to a point beyond its line, and names the through rate, does not establish such a contract. McConnell v. Railroad Co., (Va.) 9 S. E. Rep. 1006; Ortt v. Railway Co., (Minn.) 31 N. W. Rep. 519. While a railroad company cannot be compelled to carry beyond its own termini, it may contract to carry further over its own and other lines, and it then assumes all the obligations of a carrier over all the lines. The connecting carriers become its agents, and it is liable for their negligence. Railroad Co. v. Roach, (Kan.) 12 Pac. Rep. 93; Washington v. Railroad Co., (N. C.) 7 S. E. Rep. 789. The connecting carriers are also liable to the person injured by their negligence, (Railroad Co. v. Roach, supra;) but not as on a breach of a contract to carry safely, as there is no contract between such connecting line and the injured person, (Railroad Co. v. Mount Vernon Co., [Ala.] 4 South. Rep. 356.) See, also, cases cited in note 1; Harris v. Railway Co., (R. I.) 5 Atl. Rep. 305, and note; Fox v Railroad Co., (Mass.) 19 N. E. Rep. 222; Jennings v. Railway Co., 5 N. Y Supp. 142.

People v. Tonielli. (No. 20,543.)

Threatening Letter—Information—Evidence—Appeal.

1. An objection that the venue was not proved will not be heard on appeal, where the record does not affirmatively show that fact, nor that it contains all the evidence in the case.

2. Pen. Code Cal. §§ 518, 519, declare that extortion is the obtaining of property from another with his consent, induced by wrongful use of force or fear, etc., and that fear such as will constitute extortion may be induced by a threat to expose or impute to a person any disgrace. Section 523 provides that a person who, with intent to extort money from another, sends him a letter expressing or implying, or adapted to imply, such threat, is punishable as though he had actually obtained the money. Section 950 provides that an information must contain a statement of the acts constituting the offense in ordinary and concise language, so that a person of common understanding may know what is intended. Held, that an information is sufficient which charges that defendant sent a letter to a certain person which expressed and implied, and was adapted to imply, a threat to impute disgrace to him, and to expose it; which letter, as set out, stated that the writer, having found out all the facts charged against such person in a certain newspaper, would, for a certain amount, not only disclose nothing, but prevent discovery by his antagonists, "should they employ detective," but on condition that an answer must "come before night."

3. Though the letter introduced in evidence contains the word "another" between "employ" and "detective," the variance is immaterial.

4. The admission in evidence of the people's translation of the newspaper article referred to in the letter was not prejudicial error, as it tended to explain defendant's motive and object, and as he himself introduced the same article translated with but immaterial variance.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. F. Sullivan, Judge.

Ash & Mathews, for appellant. George A. Johnson, Atty. Gen., for the People.

Foote, C. The defendant was convicted of an attempt to extort money by means of a threatening letter. From the judgment rendered in the premises, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial, he appeals. One ground of alleged error is the insufficiency of the information as against a demurrer interposed thereto. The part of the pleading attacked material to this controversy reads: "In the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, state of California, the 19th day of September, A. D. eighteen hundred and eighty-eight, A. P. Tonielli, alias Tonielli, is accused by the district attorney, by this information, of the crime of felony, to-wit, extortion, committed as follows: The said A. P. Tonielli, alias Tonielli, on the third day of August, A. D. eighteen hundred and eighty-eight, at the said city and county of San Francisco, with intent feloniously to extort money and property from one Edward Larcher, did then and there willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously send to said Edward Larcher a certain letter and writing; did express and imply, and was adapted to imply, a threat to impute to the said Edward Larcher disgrace, and to expose the same, which said letter and writing was then and there in the words and figures following, to-wit: 'City, Aug. 3, 1888. E. Larcher, City—Dear Sir: Having been asked by Mr. Deshayes of "Le Bayard" to find facts that might serve as proofs of what he asserted in his paper against you, I was to find out these facts, and I have found all, whilst he was naturally to pay me. But, before I reveal anything, I wish to let you know that, if you give me $300, I will not only say nothing, but also frustrate all their efforts in finding anything, should they employ ——, detective. I want $100 at once, and balance when the case comes out. I guaranty that, if I keep silent, they will lose the case, and you get your $20,000. Answer must come before to-night. Address 721½ Bush street. Yours, truly, A. P. Tonielli,'— contrary to the form, force, and effect of the statute," etc. Extortion is defined by the Penal Code as follows: "Sec. 518. Extortion is the obtaining of property from another, with his consent, induced by a wrongful use of force or fear, or under color of official right. Sec. 519. Fear such as will constitute extortion may be induced by a threat, either (1) to do an unlawful injury to the person or property of the individual threatened, or to any relative of his or member of his family; or (2) to accuse him, or any relative of his, or member of his family, of any crime; or (3) to expose or impute to him or them any deformity or disgrace; or (4) to expose any secret affecting him or them."

The appellant claims that the information does not contain facts sufficient to constitute the offense charged. The defendant is specifically charged in the information with sending a letter to E. Larcher which expressed and implied, and was adapted to imply, a threat to impute to him disgrace, and to expose the same, (which letter, as set out in the pleading, purports to have been subscribed by the defendant,) and was so sent, as charged, with the felonious intent to extort money from Larcher. The defendant was convicted as charged, under section 523 of the Penal Code, which is: "Every person who, with intent to extort any money or other property from another, sends or delivers to any person any letter or other writing, whether subscribed or not, expressing or implying, or adapted to imply, any threat such as is specified in section 519, is punishable in the same manner as if such money or property were actually obtained by means of such threat." As we view it, the letter claims that the writer has found out all the facts charged against Larcher in a paper called "Le Bayard," for obtaining and communicating which the former was to receive pay from one Deshayes, who published the charges against Larcher: that being possessed of all this knowledge damaging to Larcher's character, before informing Deshayes, his employer, he wishes to get money from Larcher, and then he will not only refrain from revealing what he knows to Larcher's antagonists, but will frustrate their attempts to find out these facts, if a detective be employed to do it; the guaranty being further made that, if Tonielli keeps silent, the other side will lose its case, and that Larcher will get $20,000 that he has sued for. But an answer must come before night to a certain place on Bush street. It is clear to the ordinary mind that Tonielli intended to declare, and did virtually declare, to Larcher: "I have found out the truth of all the charges made against you in a certain newspaper publication in Le Bayard. I can get paid for this information from the newspaper man who employed me to ferret it out, and, if I do, you will suffer disgrace. But I will not reveal what I know, if you will pay me $300 not to do it. But, if you don't let me know by to-night that you will pay me, I will tell all I know against you, as charged in the paper." This kind of a letter expresses, implies, and is well adapted to imply a threat to impute disgrace to Larcher, and to expose it, if money is not paid to prevent it. And this brings the information within the statute supra, and of the Penal Code, § 950. Extortion, and the attempt to do so, as charged, are made felonies. Pen. Code, §§ 519, 520, 523.

It is further claimed that the venue was not proven. The record shows that the trial took place in the city and county of San Francisco, state of California, and nowhere in the record is it even remotely intimated that the letter was sent or received anywhere else than in said city and county and state. It is in evidence by a witness that it was received in "San Francisco;" that the envelope was postmarked there. It was said in People v. Manning, 48 Cal. 338: "Another point made by the appellant is that the venue was not proved. No witness testified in so many words that the killing occurred in the city and county of San Francisco. But the whole testimony, taken together, left no room for a reasonable doubt on this point. We think the venue was sufficiently proved." The same rule may be applied to the case in hand. Besides, the record does not affirmatively show that it contains all the evidence given on the trial, or that the venue was not proved; hence no objection on that ground can be heard on appeal. The defendant must show error affirmatively. People v. Huff, 72 Cal. 117, 13 Pac. Rep. 168; People v. Marks, 72 Cal. 46, 47, 13 Pac. Rep. 149, and cases cited; People v. Leong Sing, 77 Cal. 119, 19 Pac. Rep. 254; People v. Carroll, ante, 129.

The variance claimed between the allegations of the information and the proof on the trial is that the letter, as set out in the pleading, has a blank space between the words "employ" and "detective," while the letter introduced in evidence has the word "another" filling the blank space. We do not perceive the materiality of the variance. It does not in any way alter the sense of the letter as expressing or implying a threat to impute disgrace to Larcher, and to expose it, if money is not paid to the writer by Larcher. The variance, being immaterial, should be so regarded. People v. Hughes, 41 Cal. 236.

It is further urged, on behalf of the appellant, that the newspaper article, as translated for the people was inadmissible. We do not so regard it. It tended to explain the reason, motive, and object of the writer of the letter, which referred to the article. Again, the appellant suffered no injury, for he introduced the same article in evidence translated with but slight and immaterial difference.

Upon the whole case, we perceive no prejudicial error, and advise the affirmance of the judgment and order.

We concur: BELCHER. C. C.; VAN CLIEF, C.

PEKIN MINING & MILLING CO. v. KENNEDY et al. (No. 12,453.)

EXECUTION—SALE—EQUITY—FRAUD—MINING CORPORATIONS—DEEDS.

1. At a constable's sale, March 22, 1884, one who volunteered his assistance to the justice to write out the certificate of sale inserted his own name as purchaser, and the certificate was signed by the constable and recorded. Afterwards the mistake was discovered, and a new certificate was issued to the real purchaser, which recited the sale as taking place July 12th, and which was filed for record July 19th, and the constable executed a deed to the assignee of this certificate. Held, that no title passed to the assignee as against the persons having the right to redeem from the sale, who in the mean time, without notice of the second certificate, had paid the necessary amount, and received a certificate of redemption from the holder of the first certificate.

2. A sale of land under execution on a judgment against persons having no title, though in possession, cannot pass the title.

3. A part of a tract of land was conveyed to a corporation, and afterwards the grantor conveyed the entire tract to O., from whom, by mesne conveyances, plaintiff derived title. Defendants claimed that O. took the deed for their benefit; but it appeared that one of the defendants, who was a grantee from O., and a director and superintendent of the corporation, had conspired with the other defendants to defeat the title of the corporation by this deed to O. Held, that the equitable claim of defendants, being founded on fraud, could not stop the flow to plaintiff of the legal title to that part of the land which had not been conveyed to the corporation.

4. The deed of a mining corporation does not pass the title to its mining land, unless it is shown to have been ratified by two-thirds of its stockholders, as is provided by Laws Cal. 1880, p. 131. Following McShane v. Carter, ante, 178.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, El Dorado county; George E. Williams, Judge.

Blanchard & Swisler, for appellants. Marcus P. Bennett, for respondent.

McFarland, J. This is an action of ejectment to recover a tract of land containing about five and one-half acres, situated in section 29, township 9 N., range 10 E., M. D. M., in El Dorado county. The findings and judgment were for plaintiff, and defendants appeal from the judgment and from an order denying a new trial.

The land in contest constitutes a part of what is known as the "Oro Fino Quartz Mine," which was surveyed by a United States mineral surveyor, and marked out, etc., in 1880. No patent seems to have been obtained for the land as mining ground; but plaintiff claims to have acquired the United States government title through one Charles P Schenck, who was a homestead claimant of that part of said section 29 which includes the land in contest. In June, 1882, Schenck received a patent from the United States for the land covered by his homestead claim, but on September 11, 1880, when he was only a homestead claimant, and had not made his final proof, by a deed which was never recorded, he "granted and quitclaimed" a part of the land described in the complaint to one William H. Miller. The deed was drawn by Miller on a blank in which was printed the word "grant," and immediately after that word he wrote the words "and quitclaim." He knew that Schenck had not proved up his homestead claim. Prior to the year 1883, and subsequent to November, 1881, the land described in said deed from Shenck to Miller had been conveyed from said Miller, through mesne conveyances, all recorded, to the Oro Fino Gold Mining & Milling Company of El Dorado, a mining corporation existing under the laws of the state of Illinois; which corporation had built a mill on the land at a cost of $18,000, and had sunk a shaft to the depth of 130 feet, and had done other work, at large expense. On April 9, 1885, a deed was made which purports, on its face, to be the deed of said last-named corporation, and which, if it be a valid deed of said corporation, conveys to the plaintiff herein all the land described in the complaint. The name of the corporation is signed to it, and also the names of persons assuming to be its president and secretary, who acknowledged it in due form before a notary, and it has affixed to it the corporate seal. There was no evidence offered, however, to show that the deed had been authorized by the trustees of the corporation, or that it was ratified by two-thirds of the stockholders, nor was there any other proof of its execution; and defendants objected for these reasons to its introduction. The objection was overruled.

On February 20, 1884, said Schenck, having then obtained his patent from the United States as hereinbefore stated, executed to one Frank B. Ogden a quitclaim deed to all the land sued for in this action; on July 9, 1884, said Ogden by deed bargained, sold, and quitclaimed all said land to A. J. Mason, Robert Gay, and Peter Baker; and on February 21, 1887, said Mason, Gay, and Baker, by deed "granted, bargained, and sold" all said land to the plaintiff herein. So the plaintiff claims the government title through said patentee, Schenck, by two courses: First, the one which ended in the alleged deed from the Oro Fino Corporation to plaintiff; and, second, the one which ended in the deed to plaintiff from said Mason, Gay, and Baker. Defendants deny the title of plaintiff, and set up title in one Mathilda de Lescault, with whose consent they claim to be in possession. We think, however, that no title was shown to be in said Lescault. Her asserted title rests upon execution sales under two judgments,—the one known as the "Phelps Judgment," and the other as the "Park Canal Company Judgment."

With respect to the sale under the Phelps judgment, the facts, as found by the court, are these: In 1883 the said W. H. Miller made two trips from California to Chicago, where the principal place of business of the said Oro Fino Mining Corporation was, for the purpose of procuring himself to be elected a director, and to be appointed the superintendent of said mine, and on the last trip was successful. After his return, and while he was such superintendent, and as such in charge of said mine, he entered into a contract (about which, however, there had been former negotiations) with the defendants Kennedy and Bargion, by which the three were to take possession of and work the mine—including the mill and all the land described in the complaint herein, and the adjoining ground of said corporation, known as the "McMahon Ground"—as partners, ignoring the right of said corporation, and intending to get the title unto themselves. In accordance with this agreement, Miller let the said two defendants into joint possession with him, and the three commenced to work the mine as partners. The facts of Miller's director-ship and superintendency of the corporation, and the right of the latter to the mine, were well known to said defendants. In September, 1883, one Josiah Phelps commenced an action in a justice's court against said Oro Fino Corporation to recover a small sum of money. Miller appeared as managing agent and superintendent, and answered for the corporation. At the trial Kennedy appeared for the corporation at the request of Miller, and judgment was rendered against the corporation for $186.85 and costs. Execution was issued and levied on the mine, and on March 22, 1884, the day of the constable's sale, the mine was knocked down to Kennedy for the sum of $280. It had been agreed between Miller, Bargion, and Kennedy that the latter should bid off the property in his own name. But it had also been agreed between Miller and Frank B. Ogden (hereinabove mentioned) that said Ogden should attend the sale for the purpose of procuring the title to said mine to be taken in his (Ogden's) name. Ogden attended the sale, and it was agreed between him and Kennedy that, for the purpose of deterring bidders, Ogden should give public notice at the sale that the mine did not belong to said Oro Fino Corporation, but was the property of him, (Ogden.) Such notice was accordingly given, and the mine was bid in by Kennedy, as before stated. But another complication arose. Ogden volunteered his assistance to the justice of the peace to write out the certificate of sale, and inserted therein his own name as purchaser, instead of that of Kennedy This was not known to or discovered by the constable (Cline) or Kennedy. It was signed by the constable, and filed in the office of the county recorder, as provided by law. This was on March 22, 1884, and the mistake was not discovered until the next July; and on the 12th of said July the constable undertook to remedy the mistake by issuing another certificate to Kennedy, but this second certificate recited a levy and sale as taking place on said 12th day of July, instead of March 22d. It was filed for record July 19, 1884. Kennedy assigned his certificate to Ella C. Gates on August 18, 1884, and on September 22, 1884, the constable executed a deed to said Gates. On December 30, 1884, the said Gates executed a grant deed of the mine to the said Mathilda de Lescault. The said Gates and Lescault were relatives of defendants, and there is no evidence that they were purchasers for value. But, in the mean time, Mason, Gay, and Baker, (hereinbefore mentioned,) having the right to redeem, paid the said Ogden on September 20, 1884, the full amount necessary to redeem the mine from said sale of March 22, 1884, and received from said Ogden a certificate of such redemption, which was recorded October 1, 1884, and they had no knowledge that there was any other certificate of sale than the one in which Ogden was named as purchaser, unless the recording of the second certificate to Kennedy in July constituted legal notice. Under these circumstances we think that no title to the premises in contest passed to Lescault through the sale under the said Phelps judgment. If the officer could amend the certificate after the lapse of several months, and if the redemptioners were called upon to look for additional certificates of the sale, still an examination of the records would not have disclosed any certificate referring to the sale of March 22, 1884; and we think, therefore, that the redemption was fully accomplished. But, in addition to that, the sale itself was invalid for fraud,—fraud, First, by the director and superintendent (and those who conspired with him) against the absent corporation, whose rights he was bound to protect, and, second, fraud through the conspiracy to deter bidders and prevent a fair sale.

The facts about the Park Canal Company sale are, briefly, these: While Miller, Kennedy, and Bargion were working the mine they incurred a liability to the Park Canal & Mining Company, and the latter company brought a suit in the justice's court against the three. It got service on Kennedy and Bargion, but not on Miller, and took judgment against all three. Execution was issued, and the interest of the three in the mine was sold to one Crawford, who assigned his certificate of sale to Lescault, to whom the constable afterwards made a deed. It is needless to determine the question discussed by counsel whether or not a joint judgment against three defendants, where only two are served, is valid against either; for, as the defendants in that action had no title to the mine, therefore Lescault got no title through the sale.

The only question, then, is whether plaintiff has shown title which will support ejectment. It is clear that plaintiff has title to all that part of the premises in contest which was not conveyed by Schenck to Miller by the deed of September 11, 1880, and which went by mesne conveyances to the Oro Fino Mining & Milling Company; that is, to all that part conveyed by Schenck, for the first time, to Ogden on February 20, 1884, and which went from Ogden to Mason, Gay, and Baker, and from the latter directly to plaintiff, by their deed of February 21, 1885. The only thing which defendants have to say against this view is that Ogden took the deed from Schenck for the benefit of Miller and themselves. But while Miller, who procured the deed to be made by Schenck to Ogden, told Kennedy and Bargion that Ogden was to hold the title for their benefit and his own, (thus cutting off the title of the Oro Fino Corporation, of which he was director and superintendent,) he told Schenck that Ogden was to hold for the Oro Fino Corporation, and Schenck executed the deed with that express understanding. The only complaint which defendants have, therefore, on this score, is the failure to have Schenck do what he did not intend to do; and they cannot successfully stop the flow of the legal title by the obstruction of asserted equitable claims founded on their own fraud.

But the title to that part of the land in contest, described in the first deed of Schenck to Miller, and which carried the title afterwards acquired from the United States, seems still to be in the Oro Fino Mining & Milling Company. This result comes from the fact that no evidence was offered to prove that the deed from the corporation to plaintiff was ratified by two-thirds of its stockholders, as provided in section 1 of the act concerning mining corporations, which went into effect April 23, 1880. St. 1880, p. 131. In McShane v. Carter, ante, 178, (filed September 2, 1889,) a majority of this court held that under said statute a deed of a mining corporation of any part of its mine, not shown to have been so ratified, does not pass the title. Upon the authority of that case we therefore hold that the title to that part of the premises in contest, now under discussion, is still in the Oro Fino Mining & Milling Company, and not in plaintiff. For this reason the judgment must be reversed. Judgment and order reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

Donovan et al. v. Judson. (No. 12,350.)

Contracts—Limitation of Actions.

Decedent entered into a written contract with defendant by which she agreed, without specifying the time for doing so, to convey certain land to him, and defendant agreed, "in consideration of the premises," to pay decedent $12,000, "within fifteen months after final judgment" in a certain case. Held, that payment by defendant did not depend upon decedent's performance of her contract, and cause of action against defendant arose, and the statute of limitations began to run, at the time specified for the payment of the money, though decedent had not executed the conveyance.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. G. McGuire, Judge.

Sharpstein, J. The plaintiffs, who sue as the administrator with the will annexed and devisees and legatees of Margeret Dalton, deceased, allege that on the 24th day of March, 1873, said Margaret Dalton and defendant entered into an agreement in writing, by which it was mutually covenanted and agreed between them that the said Margaret Dalton should grant, transfer, and convey, without incumbrances, all her right, title, and interest in and to a certain piece and parcel of land in said agreement described, to the said Judson, upon his demand and payment by him to the said Margaret Dalton of the sum of $12,000, 15 months after final judgment should have been entered in the case of Egbert Judson v. Paul Malloy in the district court of the fourth judicial district, in and for the city and county of San Francisco, and that said Judson should pay interest thereon at the rate of 9 per cent. per annum until the same should be paid, from and after 90 days from the entry of said final judgment. A copy of said agreement is attached to and made a part of the complaint. After reciting in said agreement that Margaret Dalton claimed to be the owner of said premises, and that there was litigation pending in regard to the same, which it was desirable to terminate, and said Margaret Dalton being desirous of disposing of her interest in said premises, said agreement proceeds as follows: "Now, therefore, in consideration of the premises hereinafter mentioned, said Margaret Dalton and said Michael Dalton, parties of the first part, hereby agree to and with the said party of the second part to execute a deed of conveyance in due form of law, in favor of the said party of the second part, of all the right, title, and interest of said Margaret Dalton, without incumbrances, in and to the premises described. Second. In consideration of the premises, said party of the second part agrees to and with said first party to pay the said Margaret Dalton the full sum of twelve thousand dollars in United States gold coin, within fifteen months after final judgment for plaintiff shall have been entered in the case of Egbert Judson v. Paul Malloy et al., in the district court of the fourth judicial district of the state of California, in and for the city and county of San Francisco, and number 12,091, and said party of the second part shall pay interest upon said sum of $12,000, at the rate of 9 per cent. per year, until the same shall be paid, from and after ninety days from the entry of such final judgment. It is understood that judgment is not final while motion for a new trial or appeal is pending." It is further alleged in the complaint that Margaret Dalton was, long prior to the execution of said agremeent, and up to the time of her death, the wife of Michael Dalton; that Margaret Dalton died on the 23d day of June, 1873, without executing to said Judson any conveyance of said land; that final judgment in favor of said Ebgert Judson was duly entered in said action of Judson v. Malloy et al., and all litigation therein finally ended, on March 27, 1873. On the 11th day of June, 1885, the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, sitting as a court of probate, by an order made on the petition of plaintiff Donovan, as administrator, etc., in the matter of the estate of Margaret Dalton, then pending before said court, directed and authorized said plaintiff Donovan to make and execute a deed of said premises to said defendant, pursuant to the terms of said agreement. And thereupon said plaintiffs executed conjointly a good and sufficient deed of said premises to said defendant, who refuses to accept said deed, or any deed, or to pay said sum by him covenanted to be paid to said Margaret Dalton. Defendant, by virtue of said contract, entered into, and has ever since retained, the possession of said premises. Wherefore plaintiffs demand judgment, etc. This action was commenced on July 24, 1886. The complaint was demurred to on the ground, among others, that the cause of action was barred by sections 337, 338, and 343 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The demurrer was overruled, and the defendant answered, pleading several defenses, among which is the plea that the cause of action is barred by the provisions of section 337 and of section 343 of the Code of Civil Procedure. A trial was had, and judgment entered in favor of plaintiffs. Defendant moved for a new trial, which was denied, and from the judgment and order denying his motion for a new trial he appeals.

The only question which we deem it necessary to consider is, did the cause of action accrue four years before the commencement of this action? If so, it is barred by the provisions of the Code, pleaded by the defendant. Counsel for respondents contended that no cause of action accrued against appellant until a conveyance of the interest of Margaret Dalton in the premises was executed to Judson; that the execution of such a conveyance was a condition precedent to the right to demand the sum which he covenanted to pay. By reference to the agreement, it will be seen that Judson agrees to pay the sum specified "within fifteen months after final judgment for plaintiff should have been entered in the case of Egbet Judson v. Paul Malloy et al." The covenants to convey and to pay are independent covenants. No time is fixed for the execution of the conveyance. It might be executed before or after the time fixed for the payment of the sum to be paid by Judson. Had it been executed before that time, no cause of action would have accrued for the recovery of the money before the time fixed for its payment. No time is fixed for the execution of the conveyance and the case is clearly within the rule stated by Sergeant Williams in his note to Pordage v. Cole, 1 Wms. Saund. 320*b*, which has been accepted in England and this country as a correct explication of the law on this question. He says: "If a day be appointed for payment of money, or part of it, or for doing any other act, and the day is to happen or may happen before the thing which is the consideration of the money or other act is to be performed, an action may be brought for the money, or for not doing such other act before performance, for it appears that the party relied upon his remedy, and did not intend to make the performance a condition precedent; and so it is where no time is fixed for performance of that which is the consideration of the money or other act." In this case no time is fixed for the execution of the conveyance which Margaret Dalton covenants to execute to Judson. It is therefore clear that he did not intend to make the performance of that covenant a condition precedent to the payment which he covenants to make at a specified time. In none of the many cases in which covenants have been held to be independent covenants were they more clearly so than in this case. We must ascertain, if possible, the intention of the parties from the written agreement entered into between them. But there is nothing in the conduct of the parties, as disclosed by the record before us, inconsistent with their written agreement. In Morris v. Sliter, 1 Denio, 59, BRONSON, C. J., said: "I think the defendant has plainly agreed that he would pay the money, and trust to a remedy on the plaintiff's covenant in case the deed should not be duly delivered, and he must abide by his contract." In Mattock v. Kinglake, 10 Adol. & E. 56, LITTLEDALE, J., said: "A time being fixed for payment, and none for doing that which was the consideration for the payment, an action lies for the purchase money, without averring performance of the consideration." We do not doubt that a cause of action accrued in favor of Margaret Dalton, against the defendant, at the expiration of the time within which he agreed to pay her the stipulated sum specified in his covenant. Such being the case, it is clear that the action was barred by the provisions of the Code, above cited, and that the court erred in its conclusions of law on the findings that it was not so barred. The court also erred in overruling the demurrer to the complaint for the reason that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. Judgment and order reversed, and cause remanded, with directions to the court below to enter judgment for the defendant.

MUNICIPAL BONDS—FUNDING ACTS—LIMITATION OF ACTIONS.

1. Act of March 26, 1851, (St. Cal. 1851, p. 391,) incorporating the city of Sacramento, and investing it with authority to sue and be sued; and acts of April 26, 1853, (St. Cal. 1853, p. 117,) and April 10, 1854, (St. Cal. 1854, p. 196,) authorizing the issuance of bonds of the city,—gave the purchaser of such bonds the right to sue the city, if they were not paid when due; and this right could not be impaired by subsequent legislation.

2. Act of March 22, 1864, (St. Cal. 1864, p. 217,) entitled an "Act to provide for the liquidation of the indebtedness of the city of Sacramento which accrued prior to January 1, 1859," and empowering the board of trustees of the city to issue new bonds, in liquidation, to all holders of claims against the city, was passed merely for the purpose of completing the funding of the city's indebtedness, and did not withdraw claims, existing before the passage of the act, from the operation of the statute of limitations; and an action for mandamus to compel the board of trustees to issue bonds, as therein provided, in place of those issued by the city under acts of April 26, 1853, and April 10, 1854, cannot be maintained where such bonds have since the act of 1864 become barred by the statute of limitations.

THORNTON, J., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county; JOHN HUNT, Judge.

A. C. Freeman and W. C. Belcher, for appellant. A. P. Catlin, for respondents.

FOX, J. This was an application for a writ of mandate to compel the defendants, as trustees of the city of Sacramento, to issue to petitioner new bonds of the city in accordance with the provisions of the act of March 22, 1864, in exchange for unpaid bonds held by him, which were issued under the provisions of the acts of April 26, 1853, and April 10, 1854. The defendants, in their answer and upon the trial, contended that the claims were stale, and barred by the statute of limitations. This contention prevailed, and resulted in a judgment for the defendants; from which, and an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals.

March 26, 1851, the city of Sacramento was incorporated by an act of the legislature, passed on that date, entitled "An act to incorporate the city of Sacramento." (St. 1851, p. 391.) By this act the government of the city was placed in the hands of a mayor, recorder, and a common council, who were constituted a body politic under the name of the "Mayor and Common Council of the City of Sacramento;" with authority to sue and be sued; to borrow money, and pledge the faith and credit of the city therefor; and to levy and collect taxes. April 26, 1853, another act was passed, entitled "An act to extend and better define the powers and duties of the common council of the city of Sacramento, and to authorize the establishment of free schools in said city," (St. 1853, p. 117,) which conferred upon the mayor and common council the power to issue bonds for the purpose of raising funds to pay the then existing indebtedness of the city. In the exercise of the power thus granted, the mayor and common council of the city of Sacramento issued a certain bond dated the 6th day of May, 1854, and numbered 418, for the sum of $544.45, and made payable to Jonathan Williams or bearer on the 1st day of July, 1874, unless sooner called in, together with 40 semi-annual coupons thereto attached for $27.22 each. Another act was passed April 10, 1854, entitled "An act authorizing the mayor and common council of the city of Sacramento to issue bonds for certain purposes," (St. 1854, p. 196,) under which the mayor and common council of the city of Sacramento issued two certain bonds for the sum of $1,000 each, respectively numbered 361 and 384, and dated 24th and 26th April, 1854; and attached to each bond were 40 semi-annual coupons for $50 each. Both bonds were made payable on the 1st day of July, 1874, unless sooner called in. Bond No. 361 was made payable to Edward McGowan or bearer, and No. 384 to Stow and English or bearer. April 24, 1858, another act was passed, which consolidated the city of Sacramento with the county, under the corporate name of the "City and County of Sacramento." This act vested all the revenue and property of the city of Sacramento in the consolidated government, and provided for the funding of all claims existing against the city on the 1st day of January, 1859, and fixed the time at June 1, 1859, within which the holders of such demands might present them for funding. This time was thereafter extended to the 1st day of October, 1859, (St. 1859, p. 359,) and subsequently to January 1, 1862, (St. 1861, p. 308.) April 25, 1863, an act entitled "An act to incorporate the city of Sacramento" (St. 1863, p. 415) was passed, creating the present "City of Sacramento." This last act provided, among other things, that all the property and revenue which belonged to the mayor and common council of the city of Sacramento on the 30th day of April, 1858, should become the property of the city of Sacramento, and that it should have power to sue and be sued, and defend, upon any obligation: provided, that such obligation was not made or entered into prior to the passage of the act. On the 22d day of March, 1864, an act was passed entitled "An act to provide for the liquidation of the indebtedness of the city of Sacramento which accrued prior to January 1, 1859," (St. 1864, p. 217.) By this last act the board of trustees of the city were empowered to issue to all holders of claims against the city which accrued prior to January 1, 1859, bonds payable to bearer on February 1, 1903, to bear date of May 1, 1864, and bear interest from January 1, 1859, at 6 per cent. per annum, payable annually, after the first six years, on the 1st day of January, at the office of the city treasurer. The act prescribed no time within which creditors should present their demands for liquidation, but provided that bonds should be issued for all claims which accrued prior to January 1, 1859, that the board of trustees, upon examination, should consider "legal and just."

The petitioner, on October 17, 1887, presented the three bonds above described to the defendants for funding, and demanded in lieu thereof, under the act of 1864, the issuance of bonds to him equal in amount to the principal and interest due on the bonds which he offered to surrender. This demand was refused by the defendants. The appellant, upon these facts, argues that the statute of limitations was suspended by the acts of 1858, 1863, and 1864, as to all persons holding claims who might choose at any time to accept their provisions; and that the act of 1864 is a continuing offer held out to the creditors of the city of Sacramento which can only be withdrawn by a repeal of the act; and all who have claims such as are mentioned in the act, and accept its terms, can enforce the funding of their obligations by mandamus. It is conceded by respondents that mandamus is the proper remedy, if the claims of the petitioner are not stale or barred.

The act of incorporation of the city of Sacramento of 1851, and the acts of 1853 and 1854, under which the bonds of petitioner were issued, expressly authorized suits against the corporation upon such obligations. The inhibition of the act of 1858, in the first section thereof, is that "the city and county shall not be sued in any action whatever, nor shall any of its lands, buildings, improvements, property, franchises, taxes, revenues, actions, choses in action, and effects be subject to any attachment, levy, or sale, or any process whatever, either mesne or final;" and that prescribed in the first section of the act of 1863 is that the city may "sue and be sued, and defend, upon any bond, covenant, agreement, contract, matter, or thing whatever, of which courts of law or equity have jurisdiction: provided, however, that such bond, covenant, agreement, contract, matter, or thing that is the cause of action has been made or entered into after the passage of this act." These inhibitions clearly applied only to obligations of the city and county and city, respectively, incurred after the passage of the several acts. The restriction in the first act was to prevent the city and county of Sacramento from being sued upon any obligation incurred by it as such; and that in the second act, to protect the city of Sacramento against suits upon claims for which the former city and county had alone become liable. The act of 1864 did not enlarge or affect these restrictions in any way. The rule is, as stated by Judge Dillon in his work on Municipal Corporations, (volume 1, § 69,) that, "if a municipal corporation becomes indebted, the rights of the creditors cannot, it is clear, be impaired by any subsequent legislative enactment." Meyer v Brown, 65 Cal. 538, 4 Pac. Rep. 25, 625. The bonds of petitioner were issued under the acts of 1853 and 1854, under which the city could sue and be sued, and the privilege to sue thereby became a part of and entered into the contract of the city with the holders of such bonds. Petitioner's bonds are therefore within the above rule, and the protection of the state and federal constitutions, which prohibit the passage of laws impairing the obligations of contracts; therefore the right to recover upon the bonds by suit after they matured, remained unaffected by the acts of 1858 and 1863. If, however, the petitioner had surrendered his bonds under the acts of 1858 or 1864, in exchange for those provided for in said acts, the inhibition against suing thereon, contained in the act of 1858, would have become as much a part of the new contract thus created as the privilege to sue granted by the acts of 1851, 1853, and 1854 did of the bonds in question here. Kennedy v. City of Sacramento, 10 Sawy. 33, 19 Fed. Rep. 580; Meyer v. Porter, 65 Cal. 67, 2 Pac. Rep. 884; and Meyer v. Brown, supra.

The claim of petitioner, that the act of 1864 was a continuing offer which he could take advantage of at any time before such offer should be withdrawn by repeal, cannot be supported. The purpose of the legislators in passing the act of 1864 was merely to complete the funding of the city indebtedness, not to withdraw claims founded on such indebtedness from the operation of the statute of limitations. This is manifest when the act is construed in connection with the legislation bearing on the same subject, beginning with the act of 1858; all of which show a complete plan to fund and adjust certain indebtedness of the city. As an inducement for its creditors to co-operate with it in the accomplishment of this object, the act of 1858 held out the opportunity, if taken advantage of before June 1, 1859, subsequently extended to January 1, 1862, to obtain bonds in exchange for the old ones, in one of four classes, that would run, respectively, until 1888, 1893, 1898, and 1903, dependent upon the order of issuance. These bonds would run from 14 to 29 years longer than the old bonds, and would draw interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, payable annually, and carried with them the pledge of an annual tax for municipal purposes, and an interest and sinking fund to pay the interest on the bonds as it accrued, and to effect the redemption of the bonds at maturity. The same opportunity was again renewed by the act of 1864, except that all new bonds issued thereunder were to run until 1903, or 29 years longer than the bonds held by petitioner; and the interest would be payable from January 1, 1859, and annually after the first 6 years. The benefit of the interest and sinking fund was a material advantage that could be gained by a surrender of the old bonds, as they were mere naked promises to pay, for which the general faith and credit of the city alone was pledged, and upon which the payment of interest stopped in 1858; no provision for the payment thereof having been made in the act of 1858, or any subsequent legislation, which we think is a circumstance showing a desire on the part of the legislature to compel creditors to fund their claim. Therefore, to say that the act of 1864 was intended to withdraw all claims therein mentioned from the operation of the statute of limitations would be to ignore the object of the legislation referred to, and encourage the holders of such claims to defeat the efforts of the city to adjust and fund its indebtedness. Besides, as the bonds of petitioner had yet 10 years to run before maturing, when the act of 1864 was passed, there was no necessity for a suspension of the statute of limitations; and, aside from what seems to us to be the object of the act, it is not reasonable to impute to the legislators who passed it an intention to provide for a necessity which did not exist, when they failed to give any expression in their act from which such an intention might be inferred. Again, it is a well-settled rule that the repeal of statutes by implication is not favored, and we are of the opinion that the same principle should apply with equal force to the suspension of the operation of statutes. It was, of course, optional with the petitioner to exchange the bonds or not; but having refused to exchange them from 1858 to 1874, and waited 13 years longer before offering to do so, his right to have his bonds funded is now barred, if it is within the provisions of sections 337 and 338 of the Code of Civil Procedure, pleaded in defendant's answer to his petition.

The Code of Civil Procedure (section 337) provides that an action must be commenced within 4 years "upon any contract, obligation, or liability founded upon an instrument in writing executed in this state." When petitioner, by his assignors, accepted the bonds from the city of Sacramento, a contract was thereby created between them whereby the city became obligated to pay the principal and interest of the bonds on or before the 1st day of July, 1874. This contract, it will be observed, was in writing, and was evidenced by the bonds. The right to maintain an action upon the bonds after July 1, 1878, 4 years after the maturity thereof therefore depended upon whether the plea of the statute of limitations would be made. The statute of limitations is a personal privilege that may be used as a means of defense by pleading it; otherwise, it is waived. Grant v. Burr, 54 Cal. 298. In this case this defense was not waived, the defendant having specially pleaded the bar of said section 337, and it constitutes a complete defense to this action. It follows that the judgment and order appealed from must be affirmed. So ordered.

THORNTON, J. I dissent. The proceeding herein is not barred by the statute of limitations. The Code of Civil Procedure classifies the procedure in this case as a special proceeding of a civil nature. See part 3, p. 371, Code Civil Proc. The contents of the page just cited are a part of the Code, (Sharon v. Sharon, 75 Cal. 16, 16 Pac. Rep. 345,) and define the character of the procedure mentioned in part 3 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The right to commence this proceeding did not exist until a demand was made for the issuance of bonds to the petitioner, and its refusal by the board of trustees of the city of Sacramento. The demand and refusal were made but a few days before this proceeding was begun. No statute of limitations that we know of effected a bar herein. Nor were the bonds of a former issue held by petitioner barred by the statute of limitations. This was, in fact, determined by the case of Underhill v. Trustees, 17 Cal. 177, which applies with all its force to this case. The court, in its opinion, by BALDWIN, J., states the case in relation to the defense of the statute of limitations, and disposes of it. The court said: "The important question is that arising under the statute of limitations. The bonds upon their face are payable at dates which show a bar under the general statute. But the plaintiff, to avoid the bar, sets up several acts of the legislature applicable to this corporation, which he alleges are sufficient to take the case from the influence of the statute. The bonds are dated 25th of March, 1853, and due two years afterwards. The first of these acts was passed March 9, 1855, and is entitled 'An act to reincorporate the city of Sonora;' at this time the bonds were not barred. The tenth section provides that the trustees shall have power, and it shall be their duty, semi-annually to raise, by tax on the real and personal property within the city, a revenue of 1 per cent., etc.; and section 16 provides: 'In case the public debt is not liquidated at the expiration of three years, the trustees shall have power to levy a sufficient tax, in addition to the 1 per cent. authorized in section 10, to pay the outstanding debt.' The second section of the act of 1858 is in the same words, except that six years are specified instead of three. It is contended that this is not only a recognition of the existence of these debts by the legislative authority, but a provision for their payment. This provisional office of levying the tax, being a public duty of the officers of the corporation, cast upon them by the public law, carried with it a legal obligation to discharge it, which might doubtless have been enforced by appropriate proceedings. It afforded, in other words, a remedy to the bondholder for the enforcement of the claim as a valid money obligation. These acts were passed at the instance of the corporators, according to the averments of the complaint. With the assent of the city, this legislative recognition and provision are equivalent to the same acts done with full authority by the corporation. Indeed, we suppose they would be sufficient without such assent, by virtue of the control which the legislature possesses over these municipal bodies. The legislative acts, then, recognize the debt, and make provision for its payment. This is enough to withdraw the case from the operation of the statute. It is equivalent to a trust-deed by the city, setting apart property out of which the money due was to be paid at a given time, if not sooner paid, upon a claim acknowledged to be an outstanding debt; and we cannot conceive of any principle of law or justice which would hold the claim to be barred by the statute merely because the creditor waited after this for his money. The plea of the statute, if successful, would, under these circumstances, be nothing less than an act of unqualified repudiation of a just and honest obligation, to the payment of which the faith and honor of the defendant are pledged. The respondent suggests, in justice to the city, that she is equitably entitled to set up this defense. We think the equities of the case, if there be any,—of which we cannot now judge,—must be set up in some other form."

It has long been settled in this state that municipal corporations, of which the city of Sacramento was and is one, are parts of the state government, and entirely under the control of the legislature. The latter proposition here stated was broadly true under the former constitution of this state, during the existence of which the acts of the legislature referred to in this case were passed. Important restraints on the legislative power were made in the present organic law; but they have no bearing on the question before us, the acts having been passed long before the present constitution went into effect. As to the nature of a public municipal corporation, I refer to Payne v. Treadwell, 16 Cal. 220, where the subject is fully and ably discussed. Many cases subsequently decided approved the rulings there made, which can easily be found by any one familiar with the reports of the decisions of this court. It is no longer a debateable question with us that a municipal corporation can be a trustee. It is in its essence a trustee of public trusts. The acts of the legislature concerning the indebtedness of Sacramento, providing for its funding, refunding, and payment, create a trust for the benefit of its creditors. The trust was an express one. It created a fund for the payment of creditors, the proper administration of which can be enforced, and should be enforced, in its letter and intent by the courts of the state. It is unnecessary to recapitulate the provisions of that statute. They have been fully and frequently stated in former decisions of this court. The statute of limitations never runs against an express trust until the repudiation of the trust by the trustees. This is settled law in this state. The cases which sustain this proposition are numerous. They may be found cited and commented on in any work on the statute of limitations. See Ang. Lim. §§ 166, 168, 169, et seq., 468, 469, et seq., where the cases are cited and fully discussed. See, also, Wood, Lim. in index, word "Trusts," where the text is referred to, in which the cases are cited and discussed. A common mode of creating express trusts is seen in the cases of executors and administrators. Ang. Lim. § 168. The retention of funds by them is consistent with their character, and they may be held to answer after a long period. Section 168. The devise of land to trustees or executors is a direct trust, and the statute does not run after the testator's death. Ang. Lim. §§ 169, 468. Instances of express or direct trusts are also seen in the case of assignees in bankruptcy, who are trustees for creditors. Wood, Lim. p. 420, § 202, and cases cited. See In re Leiman, 32 Md. 225, where the rule is elaborately discussed. Other instances might be referred to, but the foregoing are deemed sufficient.

The trust in this case has never been, and it is confidently asserted cannot and should not be, repudiated. Nor is the trust a stale one. It is a continuing trust, lasting at least until 1903. That such a trust can be stale is a delusion. The decision in Underhill v. Trustees, 17 Cal. 173, is in line with the cases above referred to, and was ruled on the same principle. Where a direct trust is created, the trustee can only set the statute into action by repudiating the trust. The statute only commences to run from some unequivocal act of repudiation, and there is none such here. If there was an attempt to repudiate the trust as to the bonds involved in this proceeding, it occurred only a short time before it was commenced, and a sufficient time had not then elapsed to effect a bar. It should be observed that the acts of the legislature under which this funding was had abolished the corporation of the city of Sacramento, and created a new one entitled the "City and County of Sacramento." All the assets of the old were transferred by the acts referred to to the new corporation, and the creditor was forbidden to sue the new corporation on any of the old indebtedness, like that of petitioner here. Instead, he was permitted to fund his claims; to obtain new bonds for old. The old corporation had gone out of existence by a valid legislative enactment, and it is difficult to perceive how it could be sued. Can a nonexistent corporation be sued? It would seem not. A corporation is a person,—an artificial one,—and, if it has ceased to exist, it cannot be sued any more than a dead man can. It has met its death, and persons who have ceased to live are not judicial persons. They have no longer standing in a court of justice. Inasmuch as the old corporation had died, and the new one could not be sued by the petitioner on his own bonds, it would be highly unjust to hold it to be law that the statute of limitations ran against him on such bonds; but, whether he could sue or not, we have shown that by the operation of the acts of the legislature the statute did not, and could not, run on these old bonds against the creditor now asking the interposition of the court.

It may be contended that the writ of mandate is, with us, one retaining its character as a prerogative writ, to be issued only in the sound discretion of the court, (so held in Water-Works v. San Francisco, 52 Cal. 117;) and that in the exercise of such discretion it should not issue in this case, for the reason that the petitioner has waited so many years before applying to exchange his bonds for new bonds to be issued under the act or acts of the legislature referred to by counsel. To the ruling in the case cited, as to the nature of the writ of mandate, Justice RHODES refused to accede, for reasons which seem to me very cogent. But it will be here conceded that the decision in 52 Cal. is correct. I think that for sound and controlling reasons this court is called on to so exercise its discretion as to order the issuance of the writ asked for herein, although the bonds presented by the petitioner were issued in 1854. The discretion referred to is a judicial discretion. As said by Lord MANSFIELD in Rex v. Wilkes, 4 Burrows, 2539: "Discretion, when applied to a court of justice, means sound discretion, granted by law. It must be governed by rule, not by humor; it must not be arbitrary, vague, and fanciful, but legal and regular." Lord KENYON, in Wilson v. Rastall, 4 Term R. 757, thus characterizes it: "The discretion to be exercised * * * [by a court or judge] is not a wild, but a sound, discretion, and to be confined within those limits within which an honest man, competent to discharge the duties of his office, ought to confine himself." WALLACE, J., speaking for the court in Ex parte Hoge, 48 Cal. 5, says of this discretion: "This 'discretion' to do 'justice' is not an arbitrary discretion to do abstract justice, according to the popular meaning of that phrase, but is a discretion governed by legal rules, to do justice according to law, or to the analogies of the law, as near as may be." 48 Cal. 5, 6. In Lybecker v. Murray, 58 Cal. 186, it is said: "Under no circumstances is the discretion of the court to be exercised arbitrarily, but it is a discretion governed by legal rules, to do justice according to law, * * * as near as may be;" citing Ex parte Hoge and Ex parte Marks, 49 Cal. 681. See, also, People v. Lewis, 64 Cal. 401-403, 1 Pac. Rep. 490. It will be observed that there is no such thing as arbitrary discretion in the administration of the law vested in courts of justice. The discretion, however broad it is, has its limitations as above pointed out. It must be exercised with great care, within the defined limits, always for the purpose of doing justice, never of doing or sustaining injustice. It must be exercised upon an anxious and careful consideraton of all the circumstances surrounding the transaction or res gestæ under consideration. Judicial responsibility is never more oppressive than when a matter of right is submitted to the discretion of a court. Therefore it should be always careful to observe the limits which define it, heedful of the maxim, misera est servitus, ubi jus est vagum aut incertum.

There are the strongest reasons in this case to induce this court to exercise its discretion in granting the prayer of the petitioner. In the first place, we have seen that the bonds of petitioner are not barred by any act of limitation, and it should not be so held. The case above cited from 17 Cal. is correctly decided, and solves this; nor are the coupons on such bonds barred,—especially so held in Meyer v. Porter, 65 Cal. 67, 2 Pac. Rep. 884 See, also, Freehill v. Chamberlain, 65 Cal. 603, 4 Pac. Rep. 646. Provision is made by the acts of the legislature above alluded to for funding the bonds issued before the enactment by the city of Sacramento. The city was unable to meet its obligations, and time was granted to it by the operation of these acts. The creditors accepted the proposition to extend the time of payment of the debt before contracted, and received new bonds in exchange for old indebtedness. If there was any delay to present bonds issued in 1858 to be exchanged under the act for new bonds, certainly the city was not hurt by it, and the creditor did not lose his right to payment, or to receive new bonds, because he was indulgent and forbearing to the embarrassed debtor. As was said by BALDWIN, J., in Underhill v. Trustees, supra: "We cannot conceive of any principle of law or justice which would hold the claim to be barred by the statute merely because the creditor waited after this [that is, after the passage of the act of the legislature] for his money." The bona fides of the bonds presented by petitioner is not impeached or assailed in any way. No fraud is hinted at in relation to them, nor to the indebtedness for which they were issued. The bonds were properly issued for actual existing indebtedness. They remained unpaid.

Further, such has been the conduct of the authorities of the city that it does not lie in their mouth to appeal to this court so to exercise its discretion as to refuse the writ asked for. They continued for years after the passage of the acts to issue new bonds in exchange for the old ones without raising this question. It is so found by the court below. These exchanges of bonds amounted to the sum of $90,630. According to the finding, (3,) at the time of the passage of the act of March 22, 1864, there were outstanding unpaid claims against the city of Sacramento amounting to about $100,000, including the three bonds involved herein. After the passage of said act, up to and including the year 1880, the board of trustees of the city of Sacramento issued under the act of March 22, 1864, new certificates in exchange for old bonds of the city, and other demands accruing prior to the 1st day of January, 1859. The following new bonds are found to have been issued, under the act of 1864, in the year mentioned, and for the amounts named below, viz..

In 1867	580
In 1870	3,113
In 1879	100
The whole amounting to	$90,630

Why, then, should the defendants here be allowed to invoke the exercise of discretion by courts, when year after year, up to 1880, they were funding the old bonds by issuing new ones in their stead? There is nothing in the act of 1864 to inhibit their being funded. No day is named in the act of 1864, as in the former acts, after which the old bonds then outstanding should not be funded, and the new bonds issued in their stead. The act of 1864 provided that bonds should be issued for all claims which accrued prior to the 1st of January, 1859, that the board of trustees should, on examination, consider legal or just. It is nowhere alleged or claimed or contended by defendants that the bonds of petitioner are not legal or just. The findings (1, 2, 3) of the court distinctly negative any such pretense or contention. Nor is it claimed or contended that the board of trustees refused to fund them because they were not legal or just. The failure to present them, under these circumstances, should not be allowed to operate against the holder. The trust was a continuing one, and the holder of the old bonds had a right to present them, and get new bonds in exchange, at any time during the continuance of the trust. The language is strong enough to amount to a mandate. It is to fund bonds found to be legal and just. We do not say that the conduct of the board constituted a technical estoppel on them, but it furnishes the strongest reason why its refusal to fund should not be regarded. It is said that, inasmuch as the act of 1864 did not prescribe a time within which the old indebtedness should be presented, it should be presented within a reasonable time after the passage of the act. This may be conceded. The bonds involved in this case were not presented in a reasonable time. Why were they not? It was during a continuance of a trust to last at least till 1903. It may be conceded that they could not be presented after 1903, though some of the bonds for the payment of which the debt was created might then have remained unpaid; but why could they not be presented before that time? The creditor here has certainly been conspicuously indulgent to an embarrassed debtor. Should he be punished for his kindness by losing his debt, honestly contracted, and honestly owing? This would be a strange position to assume in a court of justice. As the statute of limitations, under the act, could not run, it would be strange to hold, as was held in the court below, that the creditor was barred by laches. It is not a case where there was never a statute of limitations which could bar the debt. But for the legislation on the subject, the statute would run against bonds and coupons. But the legislature speaks with direct and undisguised tone, and in effect says, "We have provided a mode by which you can have time to pay this debt, but you must not, and shall not, plead such statute." There was nothing unfair or unjust in this; on the contrary, it was just all around, when the creditor consented, and was evidently helpful and beneficial to the embarrassed municipality.

Further, as the operation of the statute or of lapse of time were in effect and in reality suspended by the legislation regarding this indebtedness, we cannot perceive how laches could be predicated of the creditor under the facts of this case. It is held to be settled law in New York, under a statute of limitations substantially identical with the statute of this state, that laches cannot be held to take place when there is an existing statute of limitations applicable to the matter litigated; and properly so, for the reason that the doctrine of laches grew up in courts of equity in regard to matters in litigation because there was no statute of limitation applicable, and hence they proceeded on the ground of unexplained delay as evidence, and, by analogy to the statute, refused to enforce the claim because of laches or staleness of the demand sought to be enforced. See Derby v. Yale, 13 Hun, 277; Wood, Lim. § 62; and Morse v. Royal, 12 Ves. 373. And certainly no such reason as staleness of demand or laches can be held or assumed to exist, during the running of a continuous trust, years before its expiry, when, by the very meaning and intent of the settlement prescribed by the legislature, the operation of the statute of limitations is suspended, and is to cease running. The board of trustees are the trustees of the creditors for the payment of the indebtedness above referred to, with ample means of payment placed in their hands by the legislature. They can, under powers vested in them by the legislature, levy taxes on the property of the city to raise funds for such payments. They can do this every recurring year; and they have abundant property within the city, subject to their power to levy and collect taxes, to raise these funds during each recurring year. There is no excuse of inability to provide for the means of payment. The means to raise the funds necessary are amply sufficient, and at hand, right before their eyes; and accordingly the idea cannot be entertained for a moment that the tax-payers of Sacramento, owning ample taxables, are unwilling to pay the debts of their city government, honestly contracted for their benefit, or that they desire the stain of repudiation to rest upon their growing and lovely city, to mar its fair fame and its conspicuous beauty.

Further, as to the defense of limitation. The act of limitation is founded on the ground that the proofs of a defense to a claim may cease to exist, or be destroyed by lapse or operation of time. This cannot be so in this case. The claim here asserted is bonds signed, sealed, and delivered, having the attestation of such indicia of genuineness and bona fides. They were issued after the original indebtedness was examined into, and found to be justly and honestly due. It would be strange if a register or record was not kept of them by the city authorities. No doubt there was, for their genuineness and honesty are not impugned in this case by any one. These evidences constitute a permanent record, and they may be fairly inferred to exist, and to be in the hand of the city government. No testimony as to the bonds of the petitioning creditor has been lost. They remain in the form of a permanent record, as a check on any one who may dare to present spurious bonds for funding, and to expose such an attempt. The bonds of the petitioner are presented to the trustees for their inspection, and it is not pretended in any way that they were or could be at all deceived or entrapped. Why, under these circumstances, any delay or laches or staleness should be held to operate against the petitioner here, I cannot see. The whole matter is well attested, and the circumstances existing explained. The city was much embarrassed, and was slow in making payments, even of the interest on the bonds. The creditor indulgently waited, and now it is urged he should be mulcted for it by losing his debt. Can this be just or equitable, under any view that can be taken of the case? I can see no particle—no scintilla—of equity in any such contention.

Another matter may be adverted to in this connection. It is clear that the legislation in relation to the funding of these bonds was accepted by the authorities of the city of Sacramento, if these acts were not passed by their procurement. It is found in Freehill v. Chamberlain, reported in 65 Cal. 603, 4 Pac. Rep. 646, (see eleventh finding in this case,) that these acts were procured to be passed by them. Can we not look to the record in the case cited, under section 1875, Code Civil Proc. subd. 8? These facts are of general interest, as a part of the history of the city of Sacramento. Courts should be able to look to them. It is said by HEYDENFELDT, J., speaking for a concurring court in Irwin v. Phillips, 5 Cal. 146, that "courts are bound to take notice of the political and social condition of the country which they judicially rule." In Conger v. Weaver, 6 Cal. 556, the same learned judge, speaking for the court, said: "Every judge is bound to know the history and leading traits which enter into the history of the country where he presides." Should not these facts be noted as a part of the history of the country? Certain it is, the acts were accepted by the government of Sacramento after they were enacted, and they have reaped the benefit from them that they were designed to secure. After carrying out these acts, and acting under them, they should not now be permitted to turn round, and urge lapse of time as a reason why they should not acknowledge and fund the bonds of an indulgent creditor.

For the foregoing reasons I am of opinion that the lapse of time in asking for the funding of the bonds herein involved, furnishes no reason or excuse why the prayer of the petitioner herein should not be granted; that to refuse such a prayer would be highly unjust, and sanctioning repudiation of an honest debt; and that the judgment should be reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the court below to enter a judgment for petitioner as asked for by him.

KOHL et al. v. LILIENTHAL et al. (No. 11,719.)

CAPITAL STOCK OF CORPORATION—DIVISION AMONG STOCKHOLDERS.

1. Two mining corporations, owning adjoining claims, conveyed their lands to a third corporation, organized for the promotion of their mutual interests, each receiving in consideration a certain amount of the capital stock of the new corporation. One of the original corporations distributed such stock among its stockholders, and subsequently certain stockholders of the other brought an action against it to compel a like distribution, in pursuance of an alleged agreement. Held, that evidence of the distribution made by the former corporation was inadmissible, as it was not organized under the laws of the same state as the latter, and as there was no contract between them as to the disposition to be made of such stock.

2. Civil Code Cal. § 309, prohibits the directors of corporations from dividing, withdrawing, or paying to the stockholders, or any of them, any part of the capital stock, but provides that there may be a division and distribution of the capital stock of a corporation which remains after the payment of its debts, upon its dissolution or the expiration of the term of its existence. Held that, where a mining corporation conveys its lands to another corporation in consideration of a part of the capital stock of the latter, such stock becomes the capital of the former corporation, which neither the directors nor the stockholders can distribute among themselves until the corporation is dissolved in the manner prescribed by law, or until the term of its existence expires. Reversing 20 Pac. Rep. 401.

Bishop, and F. A. Berlin, for appellants. Stewart & Herrin and Wm. M. Pierson, (J. F. Lewis, of counsel,) for respondents.

Fox, J. In 1882, two mining corporations, the Head Center Consolidated Mining Company, organized under the laws of California, and the Tranquillity Mining Company, organized under the laws of New Jersey, were in possession of adjoining mining claims in the Tombstone mining district, in the territory of Arizona. Litigation of a vexatious character had arisen between them, and, for the purpose of discontinuing the strife and of promoting the mutual interests of both companies, negotiations were entered into with a view to effecting a consolidation of the interests and properties of the two. Being organized under the laws of different states, they were advised that this could not be done by a consolidation of companies, as provided by the laws of California. After considerable negotiation on the subject, it was decided to organize a third company, to be known as the "Head Center & Tranquillity Mining Company," with a nominal capital stock, consisting of 200,000 shares, and to which each of the old companies should transfer its mining ground, each in consideration of $5, and of 100,000 shares of the stock of the new company. This new company was incorporated on the 1st of December, 1882, and a board of seven directors selected, three to represent the interests of the stockholders of each of the old companies, and a seventh, who was impartial between them. To this new company, when organized, a proposition was formally made, to convey the grounds, known as the "Head Center" and "Yellow Jacket" claims (they being of the property of the Head Center Consolidated Mining Company) to it, in consideration of the sum of $5, and of 100,000 shares of the stock of the company, and a like proposition on the part of the Tranquility Mining Company, to convey to it the Tranquillity Mining Claim, with its appurtenances, for a like consideration, and both propositions were accepted by resolution of the board of directors, unanimously passed. On the 4th of January, 1883, at a meeting of its board of directors, the Head Center Consolidated Company passed the necessary resolutions authorizing its president and secretary to make the necessary conveyances to carry out this proposition, and on the 25th of the same month, at the annual meeting of the stockholders of the same company, at which 160,165 shares of the 164,211 outstanding shares of the stock of the company were represented, this action of the directors was ratified; and on the 27th of February following a deed was executed accordingly. On that day, Mr. Benjamin, to whom the secretary of the new company had been directed to issue the 100,000 shares of stock in the new company for the Head Center Company, directed the secretary to issue 99,980 shares of the stock to him as trustee, and the remaining portion of it, in pieces of five shares each, to several of the directors, and Jewell, to whom it had been ordered that the 100,000 shares paid for the property of the Tranquillity Company should be issued, directed that 99,975 shares of it be issued to Mr. Kohl as trustee, and the rest to the remainder of the directors, which was done.

The stock thus issued was deposited in the Anglo-California Bank, to be held subject to the joint order of Kohl and Foster. Although the question of what disposition was finally made of that part of it which was issued in payment for the property of the Tranquillity Company is not involved in the issues of this cause, it is claimed that it was distributed to the shareholders of the original Tranquillity Company in proportion to their respective number of shares of Tranquillity stock, and that no question was ever made as to the right to make such distribution; and this fact is urged upon us as strongly persuasive of the correctness of the claim of these plaintiffs to have that part of the stock of the new company which was issued in payment for the property of the Head Center Company distributed among its stockholders, in proportion to the number of shares held by them, respectively, in said last-named company. But we fail to see the force of that argument, or how evidence of what the stockholders of a New Jersey corporation may have done, or agreed to do, was in any manner relevant or material in this action. The laws of New Jersey may permit such a distribution of the assets which form the capital stock of a corporation organized under its laws. But, whether they do or not, the action of the stockholders of a New Jersey corporation, in the matter of the distribution of the assets of their own company, cannot change the laws of California; and for this reason, as well as because there was no contract between the two companies on the subject of the disposition which should be made of the stock of the new company when received, nor any reason why there should be such a contract, the admission of evidence upon that subject (as to what the Tranquillity people did with their stock) was error, manifestly prejudicial to the defendants in this cause. The mining ground of the Head Center Consolidated Mining Company so conveyed to the Head Center & Tranquillity Company did not comprise all the property of the former company. It had, and still has, left a mill for the reduction of ores, and is still carrying on corporate business and reducing ores, a part of the time, at least, at said mill, and keeps a general agent and superintendent in Arizona to look after its affairs. It was not free from debt at the time it sold this property, but some six months afterwards levied and collected an assessment, and paid up its then existing indebtedness. Its term of corporate existence has not expired, and it has not attempted to, and does not propose to, disincorporate. Under these circumstances the plaintiffs, Kohl, Moody, and Rehfisch, bring suit against the defendants, the Head Center Consolidated Mining Company and certain of its officers, alleging that they (the plaintiffs) are the owners and holders of 63,138 shares of the capital stock of the Head Center Consolidated Company, and as such, and by reason thereof, are entitled to have and receive to their own use 39,115 shares out of the 100,000 shares of the capital stock of the Head Center & Tranquillity Mining Company so received for the sale of the property of the Head Center Consolidated Company, and pray a decree compelling the defendants to transfer, issue, and deliver the same to them, and restraining the defendants from representing, voting, or dealing in any way with the shares so claimed by plaintiffs. The defendants claim that these shares are the property and assets of the Head Center Consolidated Company; that the company has no right, under the law, to distribute them to its stockholders, and that its directors are entitled to represent and vote them at all meetings of the Head Center & Tranquility Company. The plaintiffs had judgment in the court below, and from this, and an order denying a motion for new trial, the defendants appeal. The grounds of the appeal, briefly stated, are that the judgment is unsupported by the findings and any admissions in the pleadings, and that the findings are unsupported by the evidence.

We have already substantially stated most of the facts as found by the court or admitted by the pleadings, so far as they are necessary to this opinion. There is, however, one other fact found by the court necessary to the support of its judgment, if, under the law, it could be supported at all, but which finding we do not think is supported by the evidence. That finding is that it was "mutually understood and agreed by and between the stockholders of both the old companies that the stock of the new company should be equally divided between, and belong to, the stockholders of the old companies." We are unable to find competent or satisfactory evidence of any such agreement; especially of such an agreement among the stockholders of the company defendant here, or between any portion of such stockholders. There is plenty of loose and vague talk of an "understanding" of that kind, and we have no doubt that some of the stockholders did suppose, and in some sense understood, that there would be such a distribution of the stock as plaintiffs are here seeking to enforce. But this is an understanding which each of the stockholders who had it at all had with himself, or with such others, part only of the whole, as happened to share it. It was not the basis of any treaty or agreement among the stockholders, or between them and the directors. But, suppose there had been such an agreement among even a large majority of the stockholders. It would have been an agreement to change the terms of an existing contract which the statute had made between the whole body of stockholders, and would not have bound the non-concurring minority. If but a single stockholder, owning but a single share of the stock, had objected, the directors would have been bound to regard his protest. There is no pretense that all of the stockholders of this corporation consented to the distribution of this stock. Over 4,000 shares of the stock outstanding were unrepresented at the meeting which ratified the consolidation. A large amount of the stock was represented by proxy, and the proposition to distribute did not, and could not, come before the meeting. The "understanding" that there was to be a distribution must be referred to some other occasion. The witnesses who testify to it leave it in the clouds. Only a minority of the stock, scarcely a third, is represented by the plaintiffs in this action, and the holders of a very large proportion of the stock positively deny that any understanding or agreement to distribute the stock of the consolidated company ever existed. But it would make no difference if the fact were otherwise. Even if a small minority of the stockholders have not consented, this court should not command the directors to do what by the plain language of the statute they are forbidden to do. Nor is there any force in the suggestion that the minority, if it be a minority, are not here objecting. Naturally, they are not here objecting in their own names, because they have not been made parties to this action. But they are represented here by the directors, who, as in duty bound, are urging the objection in their behalf. Manifestly, the interests of all the absent stockholders are involved in the litigation; and, unless the directors are to be heard upon this ground, it results that the rights of the stockholders are to be adjudicated without a hearing. The statute (Civil Code, § 309) which controls the directors, and by which we are also bound in this case, reads as follows: "The directors of corporations must not make dividends, except from the surplus profits arising from the business thereof; nor must they divide, withdraw, or pay to the stockholders, or any of them, any part of the capital stock; nor must they create debts beyond their subscribed capital stock, or reduce or increase the capital stock, except as hereinafter specially provided. For a violation of the provisions of this section the directors under whose administration the same may have happened, except those who may have caused their dissent therefrom to be entered at large on the minutes of the directors at the time, or were not present when the same did happen, are in their individual and private capacity jointly and severally liable to the corporation, and to the creditors thereof, in the event of its dissolution, to the full amount of the capital stock so divided, withdrawn, paid out, or reduced, or debt contracted; and no statute of limitations is a bar to any suit against such directors for any sums for which they are made liable by this section. There may, however, be a division and distribution of the capital stock of any corporation which remains after the payment of all its debts, upon its dissolution, or the expiration of its term of its existence." (The italics are our own.) The term "capital stock," as used in this section, has a very different meaning from that of "shares of the capital stock," as representing the interest which the holders thereof have in the business and property of the corporation whose shares they hold. "Capital stock," as used in this section, is frequently otherwise and as well expressed by the simple word "capital," and means the money and property with which the company carries on its corporate business. Martin v. Zellerbach, 38 Cal. 309. It is vested in the corporation as a sacred trust, for the protection of its creditors. Id.; and Railroad Co. v. Bee, 48 Cal. 398. This money and property of the corporation constitutes the actual capital of the company, to which all persons having dealings with the corporation, by means whereof they may become its creditors, or become personally liable for its debts, (as shareholders do become, under the laws of this state, for their proportionate share of all its debts created while they are stockholders,) look, and have a right to look, to determine the measure of the company's responsibility, and of their security. The bare fact that a man holds "shares in the capital stock" of a corporation gives him no legal title to the property of the corporation. That remains in the corporation, and not in the shareholders. Gorham v. Gilson, 28 Cal. 484; Gashwiler v. Willis, 33 Cal. 19; Ditch Co. v. Zellerbach, 37 Cal. 591; Wright v. Mining Co., 40 Cal. 20; Clark v. San Francisco, 53 Cal. 311; Johnson v. Kirby, 65 Cal. 483, 4 Pac. Rep. 458; McCormick v. Insurance Co., 66 Cal. 363, 5 Pac. Rep. 617. The shares simply represent the proportion to which the respective shareholders, who may be such at the date of distribution, are severally entitled in the distribution of profits arising from the corporate business which may be made from time to time, and in the final distribution of the estate of the corporation, when from any cause it shall cease to exist, and its estate shall have been fully administered. This event may happen at the expiration of the term of its corporate existence, or it may be accomplished earlier, with the consent of the holders of two-thirds of its shares, and upon the judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction. Code Civil Proc. §§ 1227–1233. But this event has not happened in this case. The Head Center Company has sold its mine to a new corporation for 100,000 shares of the stock of such new corporation; but it has not ceased to exist as a corporation, and does not propose to do so. It remains a corporation, with full corporate power and capacity, and is also exercising those powers. The mine which it sold constituted the bulk of its capital, or "capital stock." The stock which it received in exchange for its mine stands in the place and stead of the mine, precisely the same as if it had been money, or any other kind of property, instead of stock; and by the plain terms of the section of the Code cited the directors are forbidden to divide it among the stockholders.

But it is said that this section operates only to restrain the directors, and does not prevent the stockholders from doing by agreement what the directors are forbidden to do. As already shown, we do not think the evidence proves any such agreement by the stockholders; but, if it did, we hold that even the unanimous assent or agreement of the stockholders would not authorize such a distribution. The inhibition runs against the directors because they are, under the law, the managers of the business of the corporation. What the directors cannot do—with few exceptions, of which this is not one—the stockholders cannot do, or authorize to be done. The inhibition of the statute has regard, not only to the rights of existing creditors, but to those of all persons who may deal with the corporation on the faith that its capital has not been divided. Certainly, the effect and operation of the statute, if unrepealed by judicial construction, would be to afford a large measure of protection to future as well as existing stockholders and creditors; and, having that effect, it ought to be supposed that such was its purpose. It cannot be assumed that the legislature intended that corporations who have divided up among their stockholders the capital stock with which they were doing business should continue to maintain a corporate existence, with power to contract, incur debts, and perpetrate the numberless frauds that would under such circumstances be within their power. A contrary intention is clearly implied in the express provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure relating to the dissolution of corporations (sections 1227–1233) and of the Civil Code, above quoted, allowing distribution of their remaining capital after payment of their debts, upon dissolution or expiration of their term of existence. When a method of procedure is prescribed by which a corporation may be dissolved, that method must be followed. When it is provided that the application must be made to the superior court, and must be in writing, verified, and must show "that at a meeting of the stockholders, called for that purpose, the dissolution of the corporation was resolved upon by a two-thirds vote of all the stockholders, and that all claims and demands against the corporation have been satisfied and discharged," there will be none so bold as to contend that a voluntary dissolution of a corporation can be effected without compliance with these requirements; and it is equally certain that when the legislature has said, in the same section of the Code in which it has forbidden the directors to divide the capital stock of a corporation among the stockholders, that the remaining capital may be distributed, after the payment of all its debts, upon its dissolution or the expiration of its term of existence, the intention was that there should not be a distribution under any other circumstances. And why, it may be pertinently asked, should any court go out of its way to order a distribution in any other mode, or under any other circumstances, than the statute prescribes? If the debts of the Head Center Company are paid and two-thirds of its stockholders desire a distribution nothing could be easier than to accomplish everything that is sought in this action by simply pursuing the statute. Why, when there is a plain and speedy statutory remedy, should this extraordinary remedy be allowed? The only answer to this question must be that the parties desiring this distribution cannot comply with the statute,—that two-thirds of the company do not desire to dissolve and distribute the capital; therefore this court is called upon to order a distribution without dissolution, and to sanction the continued existence of a corporation with little or no capital; in other words, to do what the statute has never authorized the court to do, and has forbidden the directors to do. And this, too, when to do it we must establish a precedent under which less than two-thirds of the stockholders of a corporation may at any time compel a distribution of the whole, or any part, of its capital, upon the most loose, vague, and unsatisfactory oral testimony that there was an "understanding" among the stockholders that it should be divided. In other words, stockholders who have heretofore imagined that in entering a corporation they were becoming parties to a contract, the terms of which were written in the statutes of the state, are to be informed that the contract may be changed, and their rights impaired, by an "understanding" among an indefinite number of their fellow-stockholders. A wide door would thus be thrown open to frauds, and contract rights would be taken away from contracting parties without their consent.

The statute upon this subject is too plain to admit of a doubt, or to leave room for construction. It was so held and adjudged by this court more than 20 years ago, in a well-considered and able opinion, which has ever since been accepted as established law, under which rights in property have accrued to an untold amount, which ought not now to be disturbed. Upon the faith of this statute, as it was found in almost identical terms with the present section 309, Civil Code, in section 13 of the corporation act of 1853, and of the decision referred to, (Martin v. Zellerbach, supra,) thousands of people, and, no doubt, among them these plaintiffs, have assumed the liabilities of shareholders in corporations, which, possibly, they would not have assumed, had they not been thus assured of the protection resulting from keeping the capital of the corporation intact until its final dissolution. The only difference between that case and this was that there the two corporations uniting to form the third were both domestic corporations, and the consideration for the transfer of the property to the new corporation was not by "understanding," but by actual agreement of both corporations, and of all the shareholders of each, that the stock of the new corporation should be issued and delivered directly to the shareholders of the old ones, in proportion to the number of shares which they respectively held in the old. The court held in the most emphatic terms that the language of the statute left no room for construction or doubtful interpretation, and that this agreement for the distribution of the shares of the stock of the new corporation, received for the transfer of the property of the old companies, was in direct violation of the statute; that these shares must remain the property of the old companies in lieu of the property for which they had been received and as constituting the capital of the old companies, not to be distributed until their dissolution, and the payment of their debts. This has been the written law of this state for more than 35 years. Under it all our corporations have come into existence, and their stock has been distributed among its people. It has constituted one of the bulwarks of corporate stability, and one of the chief securities of persons dealing with corporations, either as creditors or shareholders. The legislature has not changed it by enactment. The court cannot do it by interpretation. Judgment and order reversed.

We concur: BEATTY, C. J.; WORKS, J.; PATERSON, J.; SHARPSTEIN, J.

MCFARLAND, J. I dissent. The simple project of the two corporations, having adjoining mining claims, consolidating by each conveying to a new corporation created for that express purpose, and the persons who held the stock of the two old ones taking their proportionate shares of stock in the new one, there being no creditors, does not seem to me to be at all within the provisions of section 309 of the Civil Code, against directors' making dividends or paying capital stock to stockholders. I cannot conceive how, in the case at bar, the new corporation is to do any business or maintain its existence; for, according to the theory of the appellant, the new corporation has only two, and can only have two, stockholders, each of which is itself a corporation. It would be better to have the whole attempt at consolidation void for impossibility.

THORNTON J. I dissent. I am of opinion that there was evidence sufficient to sustain the finding of the court that it was agreed among the stockholders that 100,000 shares of stock in the new corporation should be divided among the stockholders in the Head Center Consolidated Mining Company as they held shares in the Head Center Company. I adopt the opinion of the commissioners, formerly rendered in this case, as a correct exposition of the law applicable to it.

CITY OF EUREKA v. CROGHAN. (No. 11,695.)

DEDICATION—WHAT CONSTITUTES—ACCEPTANCE.

1. A person owning a tract of land in a town conveyed a portion of it, describing it as being bounded by certain streets, "if extended." Some four months afterwards he conveyed another portion of the land, including that which would have been occupied by the streets above mentioned. Held, that these facts are insufficient to support a finding that any of the land was dedicated to the public for use as a street, as the latter conveyance revoked the offer, if any there was, in the former, there having been no formal acceptance of such offer.[1] Reversing 19 Pac. Rep. 485.

2. A map, which was not made by the owner of the land alleged to have been so dedicated, and not shown to have been made with his consent or by his authority, and to which no reference is made for description in the deed containing the alleged offer to dedicate, is of no effect on the question of dedication.[1]

3. Where there is no formal acceptance of such offer to dedicate by the city, to constitute an acceptance by the public their use must be shown to have been under a claim of right, and not by a temporary license of the owner.[1]

[1] In general, as to what constitutes a dedication of land to public use, see note to City of Eureka v. Croghan, (Cal.) 19 Pac. Rep. 485; People v. Davidson, (Cal.) 21 Pac. Rep. 538, and note; Baker v. Vanderburg, (Mo.) 12 S. W. Rep. 462, and note.

PATERSON, J. The only question to be determined in this case is whether the land in controversy was dedicated by Cushing to public use as a street. On April 7, 1870, Cushing, who was then the owner of the land in controversy, together with other lands, executed to one Leary a deed of land, which was described therein as follows: "Commencing at a point distant in a southerly direction 600 feet from the north-west corner of block 108, as laid down on the official map of the town of Eureka made by J. S. Murray, and filed in the office of the county recorder of said county, July 28, 1859, said point of commencement being the north-west corner of a block of land bounded on the north and west by Tenth and F streets, if said streets were projected; thence running south, along the east line of F street, if said street were extended southerly, 120 feet; thence easterly, at right angles with said F street; thence northerly, and parallel with F street, 120 feet; thence westerly, along the south side of Tenth street, 120 feet, to the place of beginning, being the north-west quarter of the block," etc. On August 8, 1870, Cushing sold to the appellant another portion of land, including the premises in controversy. At the time appellant purchased, the whole tract was uninclosed. From the date of his purchase he has always paid taxes on the land, and in 1876 he built a house upon the west half of the land in controversy, and constructed fences across the same. In 1884 he fenced in the eastern half of the land. Between April 7, 1870, and the time in 1876 when appellant built a house upon the western half of the premises, the public passed over the lands in controversy, but the city authorities never worked or improved the same, nor was any ordinance or order passed accepting them for public use.

We think that the evidence is insufficient to support the finding of the court below that the land in controversy was dedicated to the public for use as a street. The only evidence of dedication is found in the description of the land in the deed made by Cushing to Leary. To constitute a valid dedication the animus dedicandi must be shown to exist. It must be shown clearly, indicated by unequivocal acts, and there must be an acceptance by the public. Until such acceptance, the declaration or act of the owner is a mere offer, and cannot be made effectual as an irrevocable dedication. Hayward v. Manzer, 70 Cal. 476, 13 Pac. Rep. 141. We think that the subsequent conveyance of the land in controversy was a complete revocation by Cushing of the offer, there having been no acceptance by the public or by the city authorities at the time he conveyed to appellant. The act of Cushing in conveying to Leary by the description given above is qualified by his subsequent conveyance of the land in controversy to Croghan. If the conveyance to Leary be taken as an offer by Cushing to dedicate the land in controversy to public use, the subsequent deed to Croghan operated as a revocation of that offer. In determining whether there was a present intention on the part of Cushing to dedicate the land to public use at the time he conveyed to Leary,—and the intention is the soul of every act of dedication,—the conveyance to appellant about four months thereafter of the land in controversy is an important matter to be considered. It is certainly as strong an indication of the non-existence of the animus dedicandi as the first deed was of an intention to dedicate to public use.

It is true, no formal acceptance on the part of the respondent was necessary, but in the absence of such formal act the owner had the right at any time prior to a public use to revoke his offer, and resume possession and control of the property. People v. Reed, ante, 474, (filed October 9, 1889.) The cases relied upon by the court below in support of its judgment, we think, are not applicable. People v. Blake, 60 Cal. 499, and Breed v. Cunningham, 2 Cal. 369. In those cases the parties who dedicated the land to public use had platted the same into lots, blocks, streets, and alleys, and had sold the lots and blocks with reference to the streets laid out and adopted by them. In this case Cushing did not survey his land into lots, blocks, and streets, nor did he plat the same.

We do not think that any effect can be given to the Ryan map on the question of dedication. Ryan did not own the land represented upon the map made by him, nor is it shown that it was made with the consent or by the authority of the persons owning the land represented thereon. The appellant did not refer in his deed to Leary to the Ryan map, for a description of the premises conveyed by him, and therefore it cannot be said that he in any way adopted or recognized it. It is claimed by respondent that the evidence does show an acceptance by the public before the conveyance to the appellant, but a fair construction of the sixth finding of the court and of the evidence shows simply a casual use by the public of the land, which was open and uninclosed. This use was the same after as before the alleged dedication. People traveled over the land in controversy as a matter of convenience, but the use was merely a permissive one, apparently, which the owner had a right to end at any time. The city was not bound to accept the offer to dedicate, if such offer was made, and in the absence of a formal acceptance it should appear that the use by the public was under a claim of right, and not by a temporary license of the owner. Judgment and order reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

INSOLVENCY—PROPERTY WITHHELD FROM SCHEDULE—ACTION BY ASSIGNEE—COMPLAINT—EVIDENCE.

1. In an action by the assignee of an insolvent debtor to recover property alleged to have belonged to the insolvent at the time of the assignment, the complaint alleged that such property was wrongfully withheld by the insolvent from the schedule of assets; that defendant wrongfully came into possession of and retained the same, though the plaintiff, as assignee, was entitled to it, and refused to deliver possession to plaintiff upon demand. Held, that the complaint was sufficient without any allegation of fraud, the action not being based upon fraud.

2. It appeared from the evidence in such action that defendant was the mother of the insolvent, and that the evening before the filing of the petition of insolvency he "turned over" to her certain property "needed for his family," including that in controversy. Held, that the evidence did not tend to show a fraudulent transfer, but that there was no transfer at all, and such evidence is competent to prove the allegations of the complaint, that the insolvent was the owner of the property and defendant was not.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Lassen County; M. MARSTELLER, Judge.

Shinn & Masten, for appellant. E. R. Dodge, J. D. Goodwin, and D. W. Jenks, for respondent.

WORKS, J. This action was brought by the respondent, as assignee of an insolvent debtor, against the appellant, to recover certain personal property alleged to have been the property of the insolvent at the time of the assignment. The complaint alleges, in substance, that the property belonged to the insolvent; that the same was wrongfully withheld by him from the schedule of assets; that the defendant wrongfully, and without the consent of the plaintiff, came into possession of and retained the same, claiming to be the owner thereof, and that she had no title to or right to possession of said property, but that the same was the property of the insolvent, and the plaintiff, as his assignee, was the owner, and entitled to the possession, of the same; that a demand had been made for the property, but the defendant had refused to give possession of the same. It is contended by the appellant that the complaint was bad because the plaintiff's right to recover was based upon fraud, and the fraud was not alleged. But we do not understand that the cause of action depended upon a claim of fraud. The complaint was based solely upon the grounds that the plaintiff was the owner of the property in controversy, and that the defendant was wrongfully withholding the possession thereof, under a claim of ownership in her. The complaint was therefore sufficient without any allegation of fraud, specific or general.

It is further contended that certain evidence offered on the part of the plaintiff was erroneously admitted, because it tended to show a fraudulent transfer of the property by the insolvent to the defendant, and there was no allegation of fraud in the complaint. But, as we understand the evidence, it does not show, or tend to show, any transfer of the property, either fraudulently or otherwise, from the insolvent to defendant. It appears from the evidence that the defendant was the mother of the insolvent; that the evening before the petition in insolvency was filed he "turned over" to her certain of his property "needed for his family," including the property in controversy, and that she told him at the time to turn over "what was most needed for his family," and he said "he would need the stage-coach to take his family in when he went out, and the stove he needed for his pre-emption, and the tents he needed when he took his family out camping." This evidence did not tend to show a fraudulent transfer of the property, but that there was no transfer at all, and that the "turning over" of the same was a mere pretense of a transfer, to mislead. The evidence was clearly competent to prove both of the allegations of the complaint, that the insolvent was the owner of the property and that the defendant was not. Other items of evidence are objected to as incompetent and irrelevant, but all of these objections are without foundation.

It is asserted that the findings are not sustained by the evidence, but we cannot agree with counsel for appellant on this point. We think the findings are fully sustained by the evidence, and that the judgment was right. Judgment affirmed.

We concur: PATERSON, J.; FOX, J.

In re Jessup's Estate. (No. 12,941.)

Illegitimate Children—Adoption.

1. Held, reversing the judgment of the court below: That the court had jurisdiction, in proceedings had under the article of the Code providing for partial distribution, to hear and determine a question of contested heirship; Justice Fox holding, per contra, that the court has no jurisdiction to hear and determine such a question, prior to the time when the estate comes up in regular course of administration for final distribution, unless it be under, and in proceedings conducted in accordance with, the provisions of section 1664, Code Civil Proc.

2. That a statement of counsel, in the course of argument, to the effect that he has no doubt the court will hold, from the rulings already made and the evidence adduced, that the fact of paternity is established, does not amount to an admission, in the cause, of the fact of paternity, binding upon the parties.

3. That letters from the mother of an illegitimate child to its nurse may be admitted in evidence for the purpose of showing her assent to the disposition that is being made of the child, and the manner in which it is being provided for, but are incompetent for the purpose of proving paternity.

4. That pictures of the putative father and of the illegitimate child, taken by photography, are not inadmissible in evidence for the purpose of showing resemblance between the two, but are entitled to but little weight, since great dissimilarity between kindred, and strong resemblance between strangers, are matter of every-day observation.

5. That the statute of 1850 and the statute of 1870, in reference to the adoption of illegitimate children, are to be strictly construed, but the provisions of the Code on that subject are to be liberally construed, when applied to acts of the putative father done since the adoption of the Codes.

6. That in the absence of written acknowledgment, attested by competent witnesses, an illegitimate child can be adopted by, and given a right of inheritance in the estate of, the father, only by the father's "publicly acknowledging it as his own, receiving it as such, with the consent of his wife, if he is married, into his family, and otherwise treating it as if it were a legitimate child." That "public acknowledgment" requires that he should have held the child out to his relatives, friends, acquaintances, and the world as his child.

7. That secret and clandestine maintenance of, or contributions to the support of, an illegitimate child, kept outside the circle of his own daily association, never allowed to bear his name, never visited by the father at the place of its abode, never entertained by the father at his own place of abode, the father denying its paternity to his relatives, and concealing it from his business and daily associates, will not constitute adoption, or establish a right of inheritance in the estate of the father, even though the father may have, in the presence and hearing of the child's nurse, and of a few persons with whom he was brought in contact in connection with providing for the wants of the child, spoken of it as "my boy," or "my son."

John Garber and John H. Dickinson, for appellants. W. H. L. Barnes and Morris C. Baum, (Henry I. Kowalsky, of counsel,) for respondent.

FOX, J. Gershom P. Jessup died in this state on the 2d day of November, 1886, leaving a last will and testament, dated August 28, 1867, and being at the time of his death a resident of the city and county of San Francisco. The will was admitted to probate November 22, 1886, and letters testamentary issued to S. O. Putnam and Isaac Jessup, the executors therein named. He was never married, and his entire estate, amounting to nearly $100,000, was devised to his brother, Isaac Jessup, and his two sisters, Mrs. Ann A. Lindsley and Mrs. Caroline O. Bogart, the two latter of whom were and are non-residents of this state. On the 11th day of April, 1887, the petitioner, respondent here, describing himself as Richard P. Jessup, but signing as Richard Jessup, and who is subsequently shown to have been usually known as Richard Miller, filed his petition in the said case in probate, in which, after setting out the preliminary facts showing the death and pendency of the probate proceedings, and showing the character and condition and amount of the estate, he avers substantially that he is a son of said Gershom P. Jessup, deceased, and of Josie Landis, deceased; that he was born in San Francisco, March 20, 1866; that said Gershom P. Jessup and Josie Landis never intermarried, nor lived together as husband and wife, but that from and after the birth of said petitioner, and for many years subsequent thereto, and up to the time of the death of said Gershom P. Jessup, he, the said Gershom P. Jessup, publicly acknowledged the petitioner as his child, and supported, maintained, and educated him as such, and otherwise and in all ways treated the petitioner as if he were a legitimate child; "and did thereby adopt your petitioner as and for his legitimate child, and thereby and thenceforth your petitioner became for all purposes the legitimate child of the said Gershom P. Jessup, from the time of your petitioner's birth." It further sets out that said Gershom P. Jessup was never married, and never had any family residence; that by an omission not appearing to be intentional he wholly omitted to provide in his will for petitioner, and claims that by reason thereof petitioner is entitled to the same distributive share in the estate of deceased as though said deceased had died intestate; and then proceeds to set out that the estate is but little indebted, and prays an order of court, after due notice and hearing, distributing the whole of the estate, or such part thereof as the court shall direct, to petitioner, upon his giving bond conditioned for the payment, whenever required, of his proportion of the debts of the estate. Under this petition, citation was issued to the executors of the will only, and served on the same day. Subsequently the executors appeared and demurred to the petition (1) for want of facts to entitle the petitioner to partial distribution; (2) repeating the same ground in another form; (3) for uncertainty, which was duly specified; (4) that the court had no jurisdiction of the subject-matters contained in the petition; (5) for defect and misjoinder of parties, in that the devisees under the will were not joined; (6) that the court had no jurisdiction of the person, or any person, interested in and necessary to the determination of the questions presented in the petition; (7) that the petitioner had no legal capacity to petition for partial or any distribution, and setting forth the reasons therefor. This demurrer was afterwards overruled and exception taken, and the ruling is assigned as one of the errors relied upon on this appeal. The executors then answered, putting in issue the question of the paternity of the petitioner and the question of his adoption. On the issue thus framed a trial was had before the court, and a large amount of testimony was taken. The court found in favor of the petitioner, and gave judgment ordering the distribution of the entire estate to him, upon his giving bond in the sum of $1,000, which was given, conditioned that he would, when required, pay any debts that might be found due from the estate. From this decision and judgment or order an appeal is taken to this court, both on questions of law and on the ground of insufficiency of the evidence to justify the decision; the evidence being brought up in a bill of exceptions.

Twenty-three specifications of errors of law are assigned, six of which go to the question of jurisdiction. Personally, I am of opinion that the court never acquired jurisdiction to hear and determine the questions involved in this appeal; that, upon petition for partial distribution, jurisdiction to determine the question of contested heirship, or right to inherit, can only be acquired by proceeding as provided in section 1664 of the Code of Civil Procedure. But in this a constitutional number of the justices of the court do not agree with me, and the ruling of the court is in favor of sustaining the ruling of the court below, in so far as relates to the question of jurisdiction.

The remaining specifications of errors of law relate mostly to certain rulings of the court upon the admission and exclusion of evidence. Counsel for respondent contends that these rulings, even if erroneous, were harmless, for the reason that most of such rulings relate to evidence tending to show that the respondent was the son of the deceased, and that this fact was admitted by counsel in the court below. By an amendment of the record, that which is claimed to have been an admission so made by counsel has been brought to this court. We do not agree with counsel that it is an admission which should be held binding upon the parties, as to the existence of the fact. At most, it was a mere expression of opinion of counsel as to what he supposed the court would find, in view of the rulings already made and given, not as an admission of the fact, but as a reason why he need not dwell longer upon that point. The fact of paternity is denied even here, and it is the first of the questions of fact which will have to be determined in any proceeding which the respondent may prosecute for the purpose of asserting his claim to inheritance.

As to the particular question put to the witness Winter and objected to, it may be said: For the avowed purpose for which the question was put, it was, to say the least, harmless to admit it. The witness had already testified to the fact that the deceased had admitted to him the paternity of a boy, and shown him the boy. The point of inquiry at the moment of the question objected to was the identity of the young man to whom his attention was then called in court with the boy so shown to him some years before, and the witness had himself spoken of marks of resemblance between the person so before him in court and the deceased, and which marks of resemblance had attracted his attention on the former occasion, and it was in reference to these marks of resemblance and reminder that the question was put; the counsel declaring that the question was not put for the purpose of proving paternity, but simply of identity.

We cannot see that it was prejudicial error to allow the question put to Mrs. Hatton as to the conversations had between herself and the deceased at any time during the last six or seven years in regard to the intentions of the deceased towards Richard's mother. The question was entirely irrelevant and incompetent for the purpose of showing adoption, but it was undoubtedly put in the hope of eliciting further evidence tending to show paternity. It was a dangerous question for the respondent to put, for paternity alone, even if admitted, would not give a right of inheritance, and, if the response proved an intention to make any other arrangement than that of marriage, (an arrangement which counsel evidently did not expect and did not prove,) its tendency was, and evidently must have been, to show that whatever the deceased had done for the boy was done for some reason other than that of an intent to adopt.

We do not perceive that it was prejudicial error to admit petitioner's Exhibits A, B, C, D, E, F, G, and H, the letters of Mrs. Landis to Mrs. Nugent. They were incompetent and inadmissible for the purpose of proving paternity, but they were not offered for such a purpose. The sole object of introducing them was to show that at that time the child's mother acquiesced in the disposition that was being made of, and the provision that was being made for, the child. For that purpose the letters were admissible, although, perhaps, not very material; it being borne in mind that this was prior to the passage of the act of 1870.

Exhibit K, the photograph of the deceased, taken 10 or 12 years ago, was entirely irrelevant and immaterial to any issue in the cause, and the objection to its introduction should have been sustained. Its admission was, however, probably a harmless error.

Exhibit L was a photograph showing the deceased and the petitioner in the same picture. It was made shortly before the trial, by bringing two negatives in juxtaposition, and from them making a third. One of them, that of the petitioner, was made from life at the time; the other was an old negative made several years before. The admitted purpose of the introduction of this picture was to show the resemblance of the two persons, as a fact tending to prove paternity. Mere opinion as to resemblance between a child and its putative father is not admissible in evidence, but the fact of resemblance is held to be some evidence tending to prove paternity, and so, when the child and the alleged father have both been present, it has been held permissible to place them side by side before the jury, for the purpose of letting them draw their own deductions as to the fact of resemblance. Gilmanton v. Ham, 38 N. H. 108. We are not prepared to say that pictures taken by the improved processes of photography may not be admissible for such a purpose; but they would be entitled to much less weight as evidence than profert of the persons themselves, and even the latter would not go far towards establishing relationship, since a marked similiarity between strangers, and great dissimilarity between kindred, are matters of almost daily observation. See 1 Whart. Ev. § 346.

We do not think the exception taken to the admission of the deposition of the clergyman Ward, as a whole, was well taken. Taken by itself, that deposition would not have been admissible as proving, or tending to prove, anything binding upon the deceased; but, taken in connection with the testimony of Mrs. Hatton, it was admissible, as corroboratory of her testimony in relation to the fact of the christening.

Errors are also assigned as to some other rulings of the court in the admission and exclusion of evidence, but we do not deem them of sufficient importance to merit special consideration here.

The only remaining point upon this appeal which it is necessary for us now to consider is that "the evidence is insufficient to justify the decision." The evidence is voluminous, and at the first reading seems conflicting. But when we have first examined the law, and ascertained and determined what facts are necessary to be established by proof in order to determine that an illegitimate child has been legitimized and given the capacity of inheritance in the estate of the father, the apparent conflict is removed; and upon some at least of the points so necessary to be established by proof we find that there is not only no conflict, but no evidence whatever, to bring the case within the requirements of the law. All the rights which are given to the petitioner in the premises are given by statute, passed in derogation of the common law. It is claimed by the respondent that in determining those rights the rule established in section 4, Code Civil Proc., is to be applied, and the statutes are to be liberally construed, with a view to effect the object and to promote justice. That is true, so far as applies to the provisions of the Code, when applied to the acts of the deceased done since the passage of the Codes. But the converse of the proposition is the rule, so far as reliance is placed upon statutes passed prior to the Codes and acts done under them. Pina v. Peck, 31 Cal. 359. And, even as to the Code, "liberal construction" does not mean enlargement or restriction of a plain provision of a written law. If a provision of the Code is plain and unambiguous, it is the duty of the court to enforce it as it is written. If it is ambiguous or doubtful, or susceptible of different constructions or interpretations, then such liberality of construction is to be indulged in as, within the fair interpretation of its language, will effect its apparent object, and promote justice. The law in force at the time of the birth of the respondent reads as follows: "Every illegitimate child shall be considered as an heir of the person who shall, in writing, signed in the presence of a competent witness, have acknowledged himself to be the father of such child." St. 1850, p. 220, § 2. This statute must be strictly construed. Pina v. Peck, supra. There is no pretense that any such written acknowledgment was ever made. It follows that under this statute neither oral admission nor proof (otherwise than by such written acknowledgment) of the fact of paternity will constitute the illegitimate child an heir. This statute continued in force until March 31, 1870, when it was repealed, and the legislature passed "An act providing for the adoption of minors, and the legitimizing of children born out of wedlock." St. 1869–70, p. 530. The third section of this act provides, among other things, that an illegitimate child cannot be adopted without the consent of the mother, and that the consent of the minor, if over 12 years, shall always be necessary. If this section is construed to apply to the adoption provided for in section 9 of the same act, it requires things which there has been no attempt to prove in this case; but we think that it cannot be fairly construed to have any application to adoptions under said section 9. The first seven sections of the act provide for the adoption of children by strangers, and, while the language of section 3, referred to, seems to be general, we think it was intended to be limited to the cases provided for in that part of the act embraced in the first seven sections. Sections 8 and 9 read as follows: "Sec. 8. A child born before wedlock shall, to all intents and purposes, become legitimate by the subsequent marriage of its parents. Sec. 9. Either or both parents of an illegitimate child, or the father with the consent of his wife, or the mother with the consent of her husband, may acknowledge such child as his or their own, by a document in writing, executed by either, if single, or both, if married, or by treating, receiving, or acknowledging him publicly as his or their own legitimate child; and such child and the one mentioned in the foregoing section shall to all intents and purposes be deemed legitimate from the time of its birth, and entitled to all the rights and privileges of legitimate offspring." This statute must also be strictly construed, for it was not until the adoption of the Codes, and is only as to the Codes, that the rule that statutes in derogation of the common law must be strictly construed was changed. This was the first statute which authorized legitimizing of an illegitimate child by any mode other than the written acknowledgment provided for in the statute of 1850, and at the time of the adoption of this statute the respondent in this case was a little over four years of age. This statute remained in force until January 1, 1873, when section 230 of the Civil Code took its place. That section, so far as relates to the legitimizing of an illegitimate child, provides: "The father of an illegitimate child, by publicly acknowledging it as his own, receiving it as such, with the consent of his wife, if he is married, into his family, and otherwise treating it as if it were a legitimate child, thereby adopts it as such; and such child is thereupon deemed for all purposes legitimate from the time of its birth." This provision, being a part of the Code, is to be liberally construed, but it is not retroactive, and relates only to minor children. Estate of Pico, 52 Cal. 84, and 56 Cal. 413. Section 1387 of the same Code is a part of the chapter on succession, and provides: "Every illegitimate child is an heir of the person who, in writing, signed in the presence of a competent witness, acknowledges himself to be the father of such child, and in all cases is an heir of his mother, and inherits his or her estate, in whole or in part, as the case may be, in the same manner as if he had been born in lawful wedlock." It is contended that this provision of section 1387 is a limitation upon section 230, but we do not think that the Code should be so construed. The whole chapter on adoptions relates to the adoption of minors; and by the express provision of this section 230 an illegitimate minor, acknowledged and adopted as therein provided, "is deemed to be legitimate for all purposes." One of the objects of adoption, and of legitimizing by adoption, is to give the capacity of inheritance. It has been already determined in Estate of Pico, supra, that this section relates only to minors, who alone are subjects of adoption, and that section 1387 provides for giving to illegitimate adults the capacity of inheritance. It follows from these statutes, and the rules of law applicable to the construction thereof, that prior to 1870, when this respondent was four years of age, he, the respondent, could not have been adopted by the deceased, or given the capacity of inheritance from him, except by acknowledgment in writing, in the presence of a competent witness; that from March 31, 1870, to January 1, 1873, he could have been so adopted and given such capacity, either by acknowledgment in writing, as before, or by the deceased having "treated, received, or acknowledged him publicly as his own legitimate child." Both these statutes must be strictly construed. Pina v. Peck, supra. It is conceded there was no written acknowledgment, such as prescribed by either statute. The act of 1870 cannot be construed as retroactive, so as to give force or effect to acts done or performed before its passage which they would not have had at the time they were so done or performed. Since the 1st of January, 1873, he could have been so adopted and given such capacity of inheritance by the deceased having "publicly acknowledged him as his own, receiving him as such * * * into his family, and otherwise treating him as if he were a legitimate child;" and this provision is to be liberally construed. But liberal construction does not mean that even this provision is to be construed to be retroactive. Nothing that was said or done by the deceased prior to January 1, 1873, can be construed as proving, or tending to prove, such adoption, unless it had that effect at the time it was said or done, and under the law then in force. Liberal construction does not require or authorize the frittering away of the written law, nor are we authorized to consider the apparent justice or hardship of particular cases, for we are not appointed to decide cases alone, but to settle principles first, and, second, to decide cases according to those settled principles, as applied to the facts presented in the cases. The decision of a single case according to its apparent justice or hardship might establish a principle that would cause greater injustice or greater hardship in numerous other cases. While it is true that illegitimate children are themselves innocent of wrong, and are for that reason entitled to the sympathies of mankind, and to such reparation as the laws can give, it is equally true that courts ought not, by any extraordinary liberality in the construction of those laws, to enable wantons in silk, having children without names, to prey upon the estates of dead men, however much they may have thrived through the fears of living ones. While in this particular case no adventuress is seeking to recoup for her own wrong, it is important to see that a rule of law is not established by construction which would place a premium upon perjury in other cases, though none may be manifest here. Of the women who are mothers of nameless children there are few indeed who would hesitate at any fraud, or to whom perjury would seem a crime, if by means of it a dead father, who had left a goodly estate, could be secured for the nameless one, and this even while continuing in illicit intercourse with the actual father still living. And human nature is so weak that even men are not wanting who would aid their mistresses in palming off their own children upon the estates of dead men, if thereby a competence could be secured upon which both, with their illegitimate offspring, could continue to live in luxury and in crime. On the other hand, the court ought never, by a strained construction in the other direction, to relieve a licentious man, or his estate, of any of the obligations or burdens which the legislature has imposed as a restraint upon vice, as a reparation to those who actually suffer from his vices, or as a protection to the commonwealth from the burden of supporting the nameless offspring of his crimes. Between these two dangers, the duty of the court is fairly to interpret the laws as the legislature has framed them, without regard to how its action may affect individual cases. If, thus interpreted, they are found to be too stringent or too liberal, the remedy is through the legislature, and not the courts.

Acting upon these rules of interpretation and construction, the inquiry is whether the acts and declarations of the deceased amounted to a public acknowledgment by him of this child as his own; receiving it as such into his family, and otherwise treating it as if it were a legitimate child. As he had no home and no family, in the strict sense of "a collective body of persons who live in one house, and under one head or manager,—a household including parents, children, and servants,"—it would not be a fair or liberal construction to say that the child had not been adopted or acknowledged because he had not been received in such a home or made a member of such a family. On the other hand, since it is a fact that the deceased did have a family, in the sense of having "brothers and sisters, kindred, descendants of one common progenitor," with some of whom he was brought into frequent contact, and also business associates and friends with whom he was in daily intercourse, from all of whom he not only studiously concealed, and to his brother in express terms denied, the relationship, it would require a liberality of construction destructive of the language of the statute itself to hold that there had been an adoption within the meaning of the Code, or of the statute of 1870. And it is conceded that there was none under the statute of 1850. An analogous question was recently considered by this court at great length in the case of Sharon v. Sharon, 22 Pac. Rep. 36-38, and the sum of the conclusion there reached was that the parties must have held themselves out to their relatives, friends, acquaintances, and the world as occupying towards each other the relations claimed for them in the action. Speaking generally, the laws applicable to this case seem to require something like the same kind of public acknowledgment and recognition as was required in that case. Was there such acknowledgment and recognition? Let us consider briefly what is and what is not shown by the evidence. We assume for the purposes of this opinion that the paternity was sufficiently established. That alone, unless established by written acknowledgment, in the presence of a competent witness,—which was not done in this case,—does not establish adoption, or give a right of inheritance. It is also in evidence that when the mother of this child was about to be confined the deceased brought her to this city, and procured for her care and maintenance at the house of a reputable negro nurse during the period of her confinement and illness. One witness, a dentist, with whom the deceased had some acquaintance, and to whom he applied for some professional service for the mother before her confinement, says that at that time the deceased acknowledged to him that the child about to be born of that woman was his; that he said he would not marry the girl, but would be just with her, and pay all the expenses of her care, and would care for the child. Another, a colored woman, who had the care of the boy after the first few years of his existence, and daughter of the nurse where the child was born, testifies that, at about the time the mother was brought to the house of her mother, she overheard a conversation between the deceased and her mother, in which deceased acknowledged that he was the father of the child about to be born, and intended to provide for it. She also says that deceased then also promised that he would marry the girl. This is the only direct testimony tending to show a promise on the part of the deceased to marry the child's mother. It is given by one who was herself a child at the time when she says the promise was made. This is in direct conflict with the statement made about the same time to the dentist. The conflict, however, is of little moment, except as it shows a conflict between the two witnesses, without whose testimony the respondent has no case whatever, and tends to show that the recollection of the colored woman as to events happening and declarations made during the period of her own childhood may not in all cases be reliable. It is sufficiently shown that the mother of the child remained at the house of the nurse about seven weeks, during which the deceased called there frequently, the witness says, and Jessup paid all the expenses. After the mother left, the child was kept and cared for by the nurse, at the expense of Jessup, who called frequently to see it, and, as it got old enough to observe things, would play with it, calling it his boy, and calling himself "daddy," and at a still later period would take the child and the witness, who appears at that time to have acted the part of nurse girl to the child, to North Beach, and let it see the animals there, and buy nuts and cakes for it to feed to them. The girl says that he was very fond of the child, and that it was called "Richard" at his request. Her testimony is very full, as tending to show his interest in and apparent affection for the child while it remained at the house of the original nurse and in the city of San Francisco; she saying, among other things, that he said "he wanted to make a man of him," and "if Richard behaves himself, and does what I want him, he will not be sorry for it," and many other expressions of this kind. All this might have gone far towards proof of acknowledgment and adoption, if it had been public, and at a time when the law authorized adoption by such kind of acknowledgment. But it was never public. It was made and done only to and in the presence and hearing of the negro family in whose care he placed and continued to keep it. When he took it out it was with the negro girl, and then not to a place where he would be likely to meet members of his own family and friends. And it all occurred during the period of the child's residence in San Francisco. During all that time the law of 1850 was in force, and no kind of acknowledgment or recognition would amount to adoption, unless it was in writing, and duly witnessed. According to the testimony of this witness, she was herself about 13 years of age when the respondent was born. In May, 1868, she married and removed to Petaluma, and two months afterwards, when the respondent was less than two years old, he was removed to her residence in Petaluma, and that continued to be his residence until 1876, when he was sent away to school. It will be observed that this removal to Petaluma occurred prior to the passage of the act of 1870, and it is a significant fact that it is not shown that the deceased ever visited the boy after such removal, either in sickness or in health, and is affirmatively proved that he never did visit him while living at Petaluma. Nor is it shown that the two ever lodged, even for a single night, in the same house, or sat down at the same table, or even in the same dining-room, in their lives. It is shown, however, that deceased continued to provide for the boy's maintenance while at Petaluma, and subsequently had the colored woman take him to Washington College, where he had arranged for his board and schooling, and where he was entered and known, as he had been known at Petaluma, by the name of "Richard Miller;" the latter being the family name of the colored people with whom he had been living. The witness testifies that, when she had her own children christened by a colored clergyman at Petaluma, she, at the request of Jessup, had Richard christened by the name of "Richard Page Jessup;" and the deposition of the clergyman shows that he had some recollection of such an occurrence, but no public or church record was made of the fact, and the private record kept by the clergyman had been lost. It is not shown that Jessup had any knowledge of this fact, except that the witness says she had it done at his request, and that afterwards she informed him of the fact, and he gave her five dollars to give to the preacher. The boy was never known anywhere by the name of "Jessup," but always and everywhere by the name of "Miller." He was placed at school as a ward of Jessup, and the accounts were kept against Jessup, as guardian of "Richard Miller." Two or three witnesses testify that while at school, when he was 16 or 17 years of age, the young man himself declared that he did not know who his father was; and it is fairly deducible from the whole evidence that he never did know Jessup as his father, or call him such, although he knew that, sometimes directly and sometimes indirectly, Jessup was contributing to his support. Jessup's diary, and all the accounts and memoranda kept by him relating to the boy that could be found among his effects, were brought into court, and nowhere among them is there an entry of any kind indicating an acknowledgment of the boy as being his son. Every reference that is made to him is as "Richard" or "Dick Miller." It is patent, however, from the evidence that for 14 or 15 years he secretly provided for the maintenance of that boy; that is to say, as secretly as such a thing could reasonably be done, without sending the boy entirely out of the country; and the evidence discloses abundant reason why he was not sent away. This could not have been done without causing a denouement which he was constantly seeking to avoid. Necessarily, the maintenance was not entirely secret. He was compelled to act through and to deal with others in providing for the care and education of the boy. But he always acted through channels that were not within the circles of his ordinary dealing or his ordinary association, and, as far as possible, without the knowledge of his family. The fact of the boy's existence, and that Jessup was supporting him, was communicated to his brother, while yet the child remained in San Francisco, by the nurse in whose charge he was. A few days afterwards, the brother asked Jessup about it, and asked him if it was his boy, to which Jessup replied: "No, it ain't my boy." Neither of the brothers was at that time occupying such social positions that either would have been likely to deny paternity through either fear or shame. During the last year or two of his life, Jessup was in feeble health, and it is apparent that both he and his brother felt that his end was approaching. During that period the brother again asked him about the boy, and asked him: "Gus, what ever became of that boy you were taking care of?" To which Jessup replied: "The boy,—I tried to make something of him. I have taken care of him, and have tried to make something out of him; but he didn't amount to anything, and I let him go." And the brother swears that Jessup never did acknowledge to him that the boy was his.

Some six or seven witnesses are called, besides the dentist and colored woman above referred to, who testify to conversations with the deceased at different times, in which he spoke of the boy as "his boy," and among them we notice that four, besides the dentist and colored woman, sometimes used the words "my son" instead of "my boy" as having been spoken by the deceased; but with all the witnesses who are examined on the subject "my son" is the exception to the rule, the more common form being "my boy," and the still more common form being "the boy." These witnesses may all be perfectly honest, and still by mistake may have used the words "my son" in the isolated cases where they have used it, when in fact they should have used the form of expression most commonly adopted by them, "my boy," or "the boy." But it makes no difference whether they were mistaken or not. None of these witnesses were members of Jessup's family, and, with a single exception, they were not persons likely to come in contact with his family. None of them were his business associates, and such of them as could in any sense be called his companions were only so during such portions of his time as he was in hiding from society. They were not persons likely to make public what he had said to them on such a subject, but rather to accept it as a matter of confidence, to be kept secret. Most of them were persons with whom he was brought in contact in the business of providing for the wants of the boy, and to only a few of those persons did he ever make any such revelations, and in no case were they so made as to amount to public acknowledgment. To the clothier from whom he always purchased the boy's clothing, he always spoke of him as "the boy," never using any expression to indicate that it was his son for whom he was providing. To an artist, to whom he paid $100 for painting a portrait of the child when an infant, he never used any form of expression to indicate a relationship to him, or why he had the portrait painted. But the fact that he procured this portrait is urged as strong evidence tending to show his affection for, and his intentions towards, the boy. It does not so strike us. It was procured prior to 1870, and consequently proves nothing in the way of adoption. It was retained by him for some 10 or 12 years, and during a portion of the time was seen by some few persons, in his room. He then had it revarnished, and this fact is dwelt upon as another evidence in support of the theory of adoption, and one occurring after the adoption of the Code. But the evidence discloses other facts which, to our minds, militate directly against this theory. It shows that although the mother, for the protection of her own good name, had left the boy to be provided for entirely by Jessup, her heart was constantly crying out for her baby boy, and she was seeking some memento of him. Just about the time this picture was finished she was married. When afterwards it was retouched and freshened up, she had become a widow, and had removed from the neighborhood in which her kindred resided. It is not shown that she ever received the picture, but, on the other hand, it is not shown that it was retained in Jessup's possession after it had been retouched, and it is not found among his effects. It does not appear that any effort was made to find it among the effects of the mother, who had died some time before Jessup did.

S. O. Putnam is one of Jessup's executors. He was the executor of a brother of Jessup, who died about 1865, and through whom Jessup received most of his fortune. Putnam and Jessup were always on very intimate relations, ever since the distribution of the former estate; and much of the time Putnam had funds of Jessup's in his hands. He knew that Jessup was providing for a boy, and during a portion of the time such provision was sometimes made through Putnam; but Jessup never told Putnam that the boy was his. In 1881 Jessup sent the boy to San Diego to go upon a ranch. That was the only time Putnam ever saw the boy. In 1882 the boy returned of his own accord, but, instead of going to Jessup, he went direct to Mrs. Hatton, (formerly Mrs. Miller,) the colored woman, then residing at Napa, and from there communicated with Mr. Putnam, writing to him several times for money These letters were shown to Jessup, and once Jessup authorized some money to be sent to him; but after that, for the balance of his life, Jessup refused to have anything to do with the boy.

Without dwelling further upon the details of the evidence, it may be summed up as follows: It is shown that, before and at the time of the birth of this respondent, Jessup had promised the mother that he would protect her good name by providing for the care and maintenance of this child. So long as the mother lived, he was in fear of personal difficulty from her kindred if he failed to keep this promise. This is shown by the evidence of Mrs. Hatton as to the earlier years, and of Mr. Jackson, and perhaps some others, as to the later years. While the mother lived, and until the boy had reached an age when Jessup seemed to think that he ought to be self-sustaining, he kept that promise. But in keeping it he kept the boy out of the circle of his own association. To a very limited number of persons, with whom he was brought in contact in providing for the boy, he spoke of him as "my boy," and possibly to a less number he may have used the words "my son;" but he never used these expressions either to or where they were likely to come to the knowledge of his own family or kindred, or to his most intimate and confidential business acquaintances and friends. He never visited the boy after he was two years old, or after the passage of any law under which adoption could result from any line of conduct other than written acknowledgment, duly witnessed; and when the boy was brought, or in later years came, to him, as he sometimes was and did, he did not entertain him, or keep him with him, for any length of time, but made his interviews brief, provided for his wants, and sent him away. And it does not appear that he ever but once made the boy a present, and then only of a five-dollar watch. Instead of providing for him among people of his own race, he reared him, and had him brought up, in a colored family, respectable, it is true, but still a family of another race, commonly considered inferior, and to be brought up among whom is regarded by most people of the race of the putative father as degrading; sent to the public school with the colored children, forbidden to bear his name, and allowed him all his life to be known by the name of the colored family in which he was reared; when sent to college, taken there by his colored nurse, and entered there by her name; at last placed upon a farm in San Diego, and, when he returns from there, going to the only home he ever knew, the home of his colored friends, and there becoming a bootblack and waiter in a colored barber shop: and finally left to start from such surroundings and associations to make his own way in life. And, as further evidence in negation of the idea of adoption, it appears that within a year after the boy was born, and at the time when Jessup was, according to the testimony of the colored nurse, showing more evidences of affection for the boy, and of desire to provide for his future, than he ever afterwards did, he (Jessup) makes a will in which he wholly omits all mention of the child, or any provision for him, and never afterwards changed it. It is true the colored woman says he frequently told her he was going to provide for the boy, and another woman, whose relations with Jessup were, to say the least, not above suspicion, testifies that towards the close of his life Jessup told her that he had made a will in which he had provided for both herself and the boy; but no such will has ever been found, and it is not only fair to presume, but, for the purpose of this case as it stands, must be presumed, that none such was ever made. In his intercourse with his own family, he denied his relationship to the boy; and with those most intimately connected with him in his business relations, and who, by reason of such connection, acquired some knowledge of what he was doing, he never admitted or communicated that he was doing anything more than "putting up" for the boy. It is said that as Jessup was never married he was not bound to receive this child into his family, for he had none in which to receive it. But we do not so read the law. The language is: "Publicly acknowledging it as his own, receiving it as such, with the consent of his wife, if he is married, into his family, and otherwise treating it as if it were a legitimate child." If he has a wife, he can only receive it into the family with her consent, but if he has no wife he must still receive it into his family; that is to say, in such family as he has the child must be acknowledged and treated as his. At least, he must not deny to the members of such family that it is his. Under this evidence, we are forced to conclude that Gershom P. Jessup never did "publicly acknowledge this child [the respondent] as his own," or "receive it into his family," or "otherwise treat it as if it were a legitimate child." It follows that the judgment or order appealed from must be reversed, on the ground that the evidence is insufficient to justify the decision. So ordered.

We concur: SHARPSTEIN, J.; THORNTON, J.; McFARLAND, J.

I dissent: PATERSON, J.

WORKS, J. I dissent, for the reasons stated in the opinion filed on the former hearing of this case, written by me, and concurred in by a majority of the court. No new point was made on the second hearing, and nothing additional, either of law or fact, was developed. The second hearing strengthened my views as expressed in the former opinion, and the manner in which the evidence is treated in the prevailing opinion of Mr. Justice Fox has served to confirm my first convictions.

BEATTY, C. J. I dissent. Reargument and re-examination of this case have convinced me that our former decision was correct, and have not materially changed my views as to the validity of the particular grounds upon which it was based. It is conceded—it would have been impossible to deny—that the proof of respondent's paternity is complete. The only argument that can be made against his claim to inherit his father's estate rests upon a strict construction of the statutes, remedial in their nature, designed to secure to innocent unfortunates in his situation a just share of the rights to which they are by nature as fully entitled as are legitimate offspring. No doubt a strong argument can be built on this basis of strict construction against the decision of the superior court. But I adhere to the view so strongly put and so satisfactorily maintained by Justice WORKS in his opinion, that in cases of this kind the only strictness required is in proof of paternity. That being satisfactorily established by plenary proof, I think courts should lean strongly in favor of a finding that the father of an illegitimate child has done what every honest and humane man should be not only willing but eager to do, and what a just law would compel the unwilling to do. I also think it a wholly unauthorized construction of the statute to hold that the acts of recognition, acknowledgment, etc., necessary to legitimize a natural child, should be performed with the express intention on the part of the father of accomplishing that object. If the acts are in themselves such as the statute prescribes, I think they confer legitimacy, without any reference to the intent with which they are performed. There is no danger to morality in recognizing the natural rights of illegitimate children, as against their fathers, or other claimants of their estates. And there is no danger of encouraging the fabrication of spurious claims, so long as strict proof of paternity is insisted upon. From this point of view, the evidence here is amply sufficient to sustain the decision of the superior court. Between the passage of the act of March, 1870, and the adoption of the Code, Gershom P. Jessup, if the witnesses told the truth, did enough to legitimize the respondent, and no subsequent neglect could deprive him of the status so acquired.

FELTON v. MILLARD. (No. 11,696.)

LANDLORD AND TENANT.

1. In the California statutory action of unlawful detainer, evidence of title is inadmissible, though it is offered as having some weight on the question of the existence of a lease. 21 Pac. Rep. 533, affirmed.

2. A notice to quit, purporting to be signed by the landlord by attorney, is good, where the attorney had authority to sign it; no written authority being necessary, under Civil Code Cal. § 2309. The tenant in such case questions the attorney's authority at his own risk. 21 Pac. Rep. 533, affirmed.

In bank. On rehearing. For opinion in department, see 21 Pac. Rep. 533.

PER CURIAM. Upon due consideration, after argument on rehearing, we adhere to our former opinion, (21 Pac. Rep. 533,) and for reasons therein given the judgment and order are affirmed.

TRESPASS—DAMAGES—WITNESS—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. Since a witness may be cross-examined in full respecting his reasons for his estimate of the amount of damages caused by defendant's alleged trespass, he may give his estimate, in his direct examination, without stating the reasons on which it is based.

2. Where plaintiff's wife, in attempting to stop defendant's trespass, was treated with derision, some of the testimony showing that she was roughly pushed about, and she testified that the fright and excitement caused by such treatment brought on a sickness continuing three months, evidence that she had a child only six or seven months old, which she was then nursing, is admissible to show that she was in a condition where fright might have affected her as she testified it did.

3. In trespass for damages caused plaintiff, a market gardener, by defendant's digging a ditch on his land, thereby diverting the waters of a spring, a verdict of $1,000, plaintiff remitting $500, will not be set aside as excessive, where plaintiff's evidence shows that, owing to the trespass, his business was injured about $4 per day; that his income from his garden since the trespass had decreased from $15, $20, and $25 per day to $6, $7, and $10 per day; that the ditch had been maintained over a year; and that the fright and excitement of plaintiff's wife, caused by defendant's treatment of her when attempting to stop the trespass, brought on a sickness continuing three months, for which a physician was employed. Fox, J., dissents.

4. Instructions relating to the rights of riparian proprietors are properly refused where the testimony shows that there was no bed or channel in which the water ran.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. F. SULLIVAN, Judge.

Action by Christoforo Razzo against Nicoli Varni and others for damages for an alleged trespass by digging a ditch on plaintiff's land, diverting the waters of a spring. Plaintiff, who is a market gardener, testified that owing to the trespass his business was injured about $4 per day; and that his income from his garden since the trespass had decreased from $15, $20, and $25 per day to $6, $7, and $10 per day. It appeared that the alleged trespass was committed in the latter part of December, 1883, and the trial took place in February, 1885. Plaintiff's wife testified that the fright and excitement caused by defendant's treatment of her when attempting to stop the trespass brought on a sickness continuing three months, and that a physician had been employed therefor. There was a verdict for plaintiff for $1,000, of which the court compelled him to remit $500 as a condition of refusing a new trial. From a judgment thereon, and from an order denying their motion for a new trial, defendants appeal.

M. C. Hassett, for appellants. T. B. Coogan, for respondent.

THORNTON, J. I have examined the record in this case carefully, and find no error in it. There is no ambiguity in the complaint. It merely sets forth in detail the circumstances attending an unauthorized and aggravated trespass on the close of plaintiff which have a material bearing on the issue of damages.

The court ruled correctly on the questions put to plaintiff as to his estimate of the amount of damage. It is to me a novel and unprecedented rule that a witness, before he can testify as to the amount of damage, must state the reasons or grounds or basis on which he estimates that amount. The lack of or defect in any reason or ground of basis of estimate can be made to appear by cross-examination. A competent witness (there is here no objection to witness' competency) may give his estimate, which can be admitted by the trial court. The party calling forth the testimony may, if he chooses, ask for the reasons or grounds on which the witness bases his estimate, but he is not bound to do so. The testimony is admissible whether the party calling out the testimony inquires as to the grounds of estimate or does not so inquire. The opposing counsel, on cross-examination, may make such inquiry, and may thus show that there is no ground or basis on which such estimate can be made or upheld, and that therefore such estimate is fallacious, and not to be relied on. Should he fail to do this, it is his own fault, and he cannot be heard to complain in this court. Here the defendant's counsel had abundant opportunity to cross-examine the witness as to the basis on which he made his estimate, and failed to do so. The aim and end of all cross-examination is to sift, explain, or modify what has been said on the examination in chief, and to discredit the witness. The evidence here might have been sifted by the cross-examiner calling out, when it became his turn to take the witness, the reasons or ground or basis on which he made his computation or estimate as to damage, and he might have shown that the estimate was based on grounds illusory and unsubstantial. A court cannot say, as a matter of law, that a witness who gives his opinion as to value, or testifies to an estimate of damage, has no criterion in his mind on which he founds his opinion or estimate. It would be inconsequential and unreasonable to assume such a vacant state of mind to exist, and would be contrary to all psychological rules. If the mind of the witness is so vacant, it can be made to appear by cross-examination. A court has no more right to assume that a witness testifies on such matters without grounds for it than it has to assume that a witness whose testimony bears the usual marks or indicia of truth is testifying falsely. The grounds or basis of a witness' opinion or estimate can always be sifted or examined into and tested by cross-examination, and this is the mode the law has prescribed to accomplish such end. This is the common, every-day mode, constantly resorted to in practice on trials in courts, and it is an eminently satisfactory and adequate mode. The court committed no error in its ruling on these questions. The counsel had full opportunity to sift the witness and his testimony on cross-examination, of which he failed to avail himself. See 1 Thomp. Trials, c. 17, on Cross-Examination, §§ 405, 406, 408-413. In section 413, just cited, the author correctly states: "Where a witness has, on his examination in chief, given his opinion as to value, he may be cross-examined in full respecting his reasons for such opinion; and here the rule applies that great latitude should be allowed in cross-examination," (citing Railroad Co. v. Haines, 10 Kan. 439; Railroad Co. v. Andrews, 30 Kan. 590, 2 Pac. Rep. 677; Railroad Co. v. Blackshire, 10 Kan. 477, 486; Markel v. Moudy, 13 Neb. 323, 327, 14 N. W. Rep. 409,) "the limits of which, where no rule of law is violated, are within the discretion of the presiding judge;" citing Miller v. Smith, 112 Mass. 470. "A question is proper which enables the jury to see upon what basis the witness has made his estimate of value, or which connects his general estimate of value with the thing in respect of which the injury is predicated;" citing Railroad Co. v. Blackshire, 10 Kan. 477. See, also, Thompson v. Moiles, 46 Mich. 42, 8 N. W. Rep. 577.

Nor did the court err in its ruling in admitting evidence to show that the plaintiff had a wife and a child, and that the child was only six or seven months old which his wife was then nursing. The trespass complained of was an aggravated one, and was committed with force; 13 men entering the close to dig a ditch inside of plaintiff's inclosure. One man came with a hoe, another with a shovel, and another with a gun. The gun was left outside of the inclosure. This display of force was calculated, and was no doubt intended, to intimidate, and therefore it may be said that the entry complained of was made with force. Plaintiff's wife attempted to stop them from digging the ditch. She alone, as far as the testimony shows, appeared on the ground and attempted to get the invaders to desist from digging the ditch. She was treated with derision, and there was testimony to show that she was roughly pushed about. She testified that she became sick from the fright and excitement caused by the treatment she there received, which sickness continued for three months. The evidence was admissible to show that she was in a condition where fright might have affected her as she testified it did. It was also admissible to show that the forcible entry was accompanied by circumstances of insult which had a material bearing on the question of damage.

It is said the verdict was excessive. I do not think so. The amount found by the verdict was $1,000, and the court required plaintiff, as a condition of refusing a new trial, to remit $500. This was done, and the new trial was denied. The defendants have no ground to complain of this amount. In my judgment the court might well have allowed the amount found by the jury to remain unchanged.

I find no error in refusing the request for instructions to the jury, to which the court's attention is called by defendants. The instructions requested had no pertinence to the case, but were entirely outside of it. There was no riparian ownership. The testimony showed no water-course. There was no bed or channel in which the water ran, and, consequently, there could be no ripa bank, and hence there could be no riparian or bank owner. The evidence, in our view, is sufficient to justify the verdict. We find no error in the record, and the judgment and order must be affirmed.

We concur: BEATTY, C. J.; MCFARLAND, J.; WORKS, J.; SHARPSTEIN, J.

FOX, J., (dissenting.) I dissent. In my judgment, the evidence, even if competent, which I do not concede, fails to show damage to an amount equal to one-tenth the sum recovered. Whatever damages were attempted to be proved were such as grew out of loss of profits in the business, and the testimony as a whole shows, by a great preponderance, that this loss resulted from causes other than such as can be traced to the acts of defendants, and was common to all persons engaged in the business at that time. Besides, I am at a loss to see upon what principle the court can allow a recovery for damages accruing after the commencement of the suit, under a complaint not framed for the purpose; and every dollar of the damage proved or attempted to be proved in this case accrued long after the suit was brought, while the complaint was never, either originally or by amendment, framed for the recovery of such damages.

GREEN v. BROOKS et al. (No 13,180.)

CONTRACT—CONSIDERATION—ACCOUNTING.

1. A contract by which defendant bound himself to purchase a particular tract of land, and pay plaintiff one-third of the net profits realized from its sale, is not void for want of consideration, where the contract provides that defendant is to be paid 10 per cent. on his investment out of the proceeds of sales; it also appearing that the contract had been entered into by reason of plaintiff's disclosure of certain information to defendant, which enabled him to so invest his money in the land as to realize large profits on its sale.

2. A contract founded on plaintiff's promise to disclose information as to the place where a railroad company intended to locate its depot is not void, as against public policy, where there is nothing to show that plaintiff obtained his information by reason of any relation of trust or confidence that he bore to the railroad company, or that it had any interest in the subject-matter of the contract, or that it attempted to keep the location of the depot a secret.

3. Where defendant, in consequence of information imparted to him by plaintiff, entered into a contract binding himself to purchase a particular tract of land, and to pay plaintiff one-third of the net profits realized from its sale, a trust in the land results in plaintiff's favor, and he is entitled to have the land disposed of in accordance with the terms of the contract, and, when so disposed of, to share in the profits.

4. In such a case, plaintiff is entitled to an accounting, though there is no fraud on defendant's part.

5. Since one of the objects of an accounting is to ascertain how much has been realized and expended by the accountant, plaintiff is entitled to an accounting, though no profits have been realized by defendant from sales of the land.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; WALTER VAN DYKE, Judge.

Frederic Hall, for appellant. Charles W. Eldridge, (C. C. Stephens, of counsel,) for respondent.

Works, J. This is an action to declare a trust, and for an accounting. The parties to this action entered into the following contract: "June 27, 1887. It is agreed that J. Marion Brooks purchased what is known as the Philbin tract of land, in the city of Los Angeles, containing 31 65-100 acres. That T. J. Cuddy is to receive 25 per cent. of the net profits on said tract, and that John W. Green receive ⅓ (one-third) of the net profits on said tract, and that J. Marion Brooks is to receive ⅔ (two-thirds) of the net profits on said tract. That said Brooks be allowed ten (10) per cent. on all moneys he may advance in purchase of said lands, and it shall be charged up as expenses in purchase thereof. Said Brooks to contribute to said Cuddy 16⅔ per cent. commission, and J. W. Green contribute 8⅓ per cent., being their respective proportion to the commission, 25 per cent., allowed said Cuddy. [Signed] J. Marion Brooks. [Signed] John W. Green. [Signed] T. J. Cuddy." It is alleged in the complaint that the consideration for said contract was that plaintiff should disclose to said Brooks and Cuddy information in advance of the knowledge by defendants and others of the fact of the place in the city of Los Angeles, state of California, of the intended location of the new passenger depot of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company; that said Cuddy should, in advance of the knowledge of that fact by others in said city, use his skill in selecting a desirable tract of land in the vicinity of said intended depot, and negotiating the sale of the same to defendant Brooks; that said Brooks should thereupon purchase the tract to be by said Cuddy selected; and also in consideration of the obligations and interests assumed and arising from the terms of the agreement above set forth. It is further alleged that the plaintiff did disclose the location of said depot grounds as agreed upon, and that the same were located at the place designated; that Brooks purchased a certain tract of land near said location, as agreed in said contract, for the sum of $125,000, and received a deed therefor; that the land so purchased increased largely in value; that he subdivided the tract into blocks and lots, and sold lots to the amount of $100,000; that there remained unsold about two-thirds of the property, of the value of $200,000; that an account of his management of the trust had been demanded of said Brooks, but had been refused. It is also alleged that Cuddy had refused to join as a plaintiff, and he had, for that reason, been made a defendant. The prayer of the complaint was that Brooks be declared a trustee for the plaintiff, to the extent of one-third of the property and its proceeds, and that he be required to account. There were some pleadings on the part of some other defendants who had become purchasers of a part of the land, but they are not appealing, and their connection with the case need not be further noticed. There was a demurrer to the complaint by Brooks, which was overruled. He answered by denying his purchase and the making of a deed to him on the date alleged, averring that the same occurred at a later day; and, as an affirmative defense, alleged that after the making of the contract, and before the bringing of the action, it was agreed, by and between the plaintiff and the defendants Brooks and Cuddy, that said contract should be waived, abandoned, and rescinded, and that they then waived, abandoned, and rescinded the same accordingly. The court found in favor of the plaintiff, and entered an interlocutory order for an accounting to be taken before a court commissioner. The account was taken, showing the moneys expended in purchasing the land and for expenses, the amount realized from sales of lands, and the quantity and value of lands remaining in the hands of the defendant undisposed of. Final judgment was thereupon rendered, confirming the report of the commissioner, except as to certain expenses which were allowed the defendant not allowed in said report, and disallowing others, declaring the trust in the defendant Brooks, and decreeing that the plaintiff was entitled to an accounting from time to time at reasonable intervals. The account taken showed that the defendant had not yet realized sufficient from sales made to repay him the amount paid by him for the land and for expenses in making sales. There was no personal judgment against him, except for costs. The appeal is by Brooks alone on the judgment roll.

It is contended by the appellant that the demurrer to the complaint should have been sustained, because the writing sued on did not amount to a contract, did not bind any one, except the appellant, to do anything, and therefore his promise was without consideration. We think otherwise. The respondent was possessed of certain information which might enable the appellant to so invest his money as to realize large profits, and agreed to disclose such information for a share of such profits, and agreed, also, to pay the appellant out of the proceeds of sales 10 per cent. on the amount of money invested by him. This was a sufficient consideration to uphold the promise of the appellant, and having received the information agreed to be furnished, and realized upon it, he cannot be allowed to repudiate his promise. That he did receive the information, and that it was valuable, and enabled him to profit largely by his purchase, is not denied.

It is further contended that the contract was void, as against public policy, for the reason that it was founded on the promise of the respondent to disclose a secret of the railroad company as to the place where it intended to locate its depot. This defense, if well founded, comes with a very poor grace from the appellant, who was a party to the transaction, and agreed to pay the respondent largely for what he now claims to have been a fraudulent and wrongful act. But there is nothing in the point made. There is nothing to show that the respondent obtained his information by reason of any relation of trust or confidence he bore to the railroad company, or that the company had any interest in the land to be sold which would be affected by the disclosure, or even that the matter was kept or attempted to be kept secret by the railroad company. Therefore no confidence was violated by the respondent, nor was there any matter disclosed that was or could be against public policy. Counsel cite numerous authorities in support of this contention, but for the reasons stated none of them are in point.

It is also claimed that the respondent had no interest in the real estate, but only a right to share in the profits. In support of this position the case of Stewart v. Nevins, 50 Cal. 276, is cited as decisive of the question. The case differs materially from the one under consideration. There the party attempting to enforce the trust had sold the land in controversy to the defendant for a fixed amount and for a certain share of the profits realized over and above a certain sum. The title was conveyed, and the only right of the vendee was to recover his purchase money. The fact that a part of the consideration to be received by him was contingent upon the realization of profits by a resale could not give him any interest in the land. But here the plaintiff was, in effect, one of the purchasers of the land. Suppose he had furnished one-third of the purchase money, or had agreed to render certain services for the interest he claims, could it be claimed that he had no interest in the land? If he furnished such information as enabled the appellant to buy it for their joint benefit for one-third less than its real value, or whereby that much greater profit could be realized to both, the result to the appellant was the same in effect, and in equity the respondent must be regarded as having such an interest in the land as entitled him to see to its proper disposition in accordance with the contract, and, when so disposed of, to share in the profits. And to this extent the appellant was properly held by the judgment of the court below as a trustee. Settembre v. Putnam, 30 Cal. 490; Seymour v. Freer, 8 Wall. 202. There are a number of other authorities referred to by counsel for appellant on this point, but the facts in the cases cited are so dissimilar as to render them of no weight.

Finally, it is contended that the complaint is bad because it does not allege fraud on the part of the appellant, and because it is not shown that the appellant had received more than he had paid out. The right to an accounting in a case of this kind does not rest upon fraud, and no such allegation is necessary in the complaint. Nor was it necessary for the appellant to allege that such an amount had been realized as entitled him to a share of the profits thereof. The very object of an accounting may be, and frequently is, to ascertain how much has been realized and expended, so as to determine whether the cestui que trust is entitled to payment. The case of Coward v. Clanton, 79 Cal. 23, 21 Pac. Rep. 359, is not in point. There the court below rendered a judgment against the defendant for a share of the profits when no profits had been realized, and we held the judgment to be erroneous. In this case there was no personal judgment in favor of the plaintiff. The judgment simply confirmed the account taken, which showed the state of the trust at that time, and showed that he was not entitled to recover a personal judgment. But this did not affect his right to the accounting when the trustee had denied the trust. Judgment affirmed.

PEOPLE ex rel. GRAVES v. McFADDEN et al. (No. 13,349.) SAME v. COUNTY OF ORANGE. (No. 13,460.) SAME v. COUNTY OF ORANGE et al. (No. 13,461.)

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW — DELEGATION OF LEGISLATIVE POWERS—SPECIAL LAWS.

1. St. Cal. 1889, p. 123, entitled "An act to create the county of Orange," etc., is not void, as being a delegation of legislative powers, by reason of a clause that, on the assent of two-thirds of the qualified electors voting at an election to be held for that purpose, a new county should be formed out of a designated territory, and the other provisions of the act take effect.

2. Nor is the act void as a delegation of the power to repeal the law by reason of a provision that, if less than two-thirds of the qualified electors voted in favor of the creation of the new county, the act should cease to be of any force or effect; the law being complete and in force as soon as approved by the governor, and the result of the election being merely the condition or contingency on which depended the carrying into effect, or not, of its provisions.

3. A county is not a "corporation for municipal purposes," within the meaning of Const. Cal. art. 11, § 6, providing that corporations for municipal purposes shall not be created by special laws.

4. Under Const. Cal. art. 4, § 25, subd. 33, providing that "the legislature shall not pass local or special laws * * * where a general law can be made applicable," it is a question of fact, to be determined by the legislature, whether a general law can be made applicable to the organization of new political subdivisions of the state.

5. Under Const. Cal. art. 11, § 5, providing that the legislature may classify the counties by population, it may classify each new county, on its organization, according to the best information at its command, to remain in force until a readjustment of the classification of all the counties in the state will take place under the provisions of the general law on the subject.

In bank. Appeals from superior court, Los Angeles county; LUCIEN SHAW, Judge.

Geo. A. Johnson, Atty. Gen., and Chapman & Hendrick, (Gottschalk & Luckel, of counsel,) for appellant. Victor Montgomery and Hutton & Swanwick, for respondents.

FOX, J. All of these cases involve, so far as the merits are concerned, precisely the same questions, and are brought to accomplish the same end, and for the same relief; the three actions being brought to meet a doubtful question as to who were the proper parties defendant, under the circumstances, to an action brought for that purpose. The cases are submitted together, ably argued on both sides, and a speedy determination desired upon the merits, regardless of the question of parties. The three cases cover all the possible necessary parties, and we shall proceed to consider the merits of the case as if it were but a single case, and not attempt to discuss the question as to who were necessary or proper parties. The real question is whether the act of the legislature of the state of California, approved March 11, 1889, entitled, "An act to create the county of Orange, to define the boundaries thereof, to determine the county-seat by an election, and to provide for its organization and election of officers, and to classify said county," (St. 1889, p. 123,) is constitutional or not. In each case demurrer to the complaint on the merits was sustained, and judgment of dismissal entered, from which plaintiff appeals.

1. The first point made by appellant is that the act is a delegation of legislative authority, and is therefore void. The first section of the act provides that "upon the assent of two-thirds of the qualified electors, voting at an election to be held for that purpose, as provided in sections 4 and 5 of the act, there shall be formed out of the south-east part of Los Angeles county a new county, to be known as the 'County of Orange,' which shall rank as a county of the fifteenth class until the census of 1890 is taken, and a new apportionment is had." The second section defines the boundaries; the third provides that the county-seat shall be chosen as thereinafter provided; and the fourth provides for the appointment of commissioners, to be appointed by the governor, whose duty it should be, after qualifying, and on a day named in the section, to order a special election to be held within the boundaries so fixed for the new county, upon a day also named in the act, at which the electors should determine by ballot whether or not said territory should be organized as a new county under the act,—the act itself adopting for the purposes of that election the election precincts within the territory, as the same had been established by the board of supervisors of Los Angeles county, of which it was then a part,—the commissioners to canvass the returns, and declare the result. If two-thirds of the qualified electors voting at such election vote in favor of the creation of the proposed county, then said commissioners are to divide the county into a convenient number of judicial townships, road and school districts, define their boundaries, and designate the name of each. They are also to establish election precincts, and give 30 days' notice by publication of the precincts established, designating the names and boundaries thereof; and also to divide the county into five supervisor districts, and give a like notice of the names and boundaries thereof; and they and their president and secretary are authorized and required by law to discharge the same duties as are required of boards of supervisors and county clerks, so far as the same apply to holding elections, canvassing returns, and issuing certificates of election. Within a period not exceeding six months from the first meeting of the commissioners, they are to order an election in said county for the election of county officers, and the selection of a county-seat. They are to keep a record of all their proceedings, and of the result of both elections, transmitting a certified copy thereof to the secretary of state, and filing the original in the office of the county clerk as soon as that officer shall have been elected and qualified; and thereupon the duties of said commissioners shall cease and terminate. If, however, at said first-named election, "less than two-thirds of the qualified electors voting for and against the creation of the proposed county vote for the creation of said county, then this act shall cease to be of any force or effect." Other provisions of the act may be hereafter noted, but are not material to the point now under consideration, except, perhaps, the concluding sentence of the act, which reads: "This act shall take effect and be in force from and after the date of its passage and approval." The proposition is not disputed, that the legislature has no power to delegate its legislative authority; but the question turns upon whether this is a delegation of such authority or not. Counsel for appellant has cited several authorities in support of that contention, among them Ex parte Wall, 48 Cal. 279; but they do not strike us as being in point. In Ex parte Wall and State v. Weir, 11 Amer. Rep. 115, the real question was whether the legislature could authorize the people of a given locality to suspend the operation within such locality of a general penal statute of the state, and the court held that it could not do so. The other case cited was similar in character. While there is a wide diversity of opinion in the reported cases as to what questions the legislature may, and what it may not, submit to the arbitrament of the people, we think it will rarely be found that the submission of a question like that submitted by the act now under consideration to a vote of the people has been held to be a delegation of legislative authority. Mr. Cooley, in his work on Constitutional Limitations, in discussing this subject, (page 140 et seq., 5th Ed.,) after laying down the rule in very strong language that the power conferred upon the legislature to make laws cannot be delegated by that department to any other body or authority, and citing many cases in support of it, adds: "But it is not always essential that a legislative act should be a completed statute which must in any event take effect, as law, at the time it leaves the hands of the legislative department. A statute may be conditional, and its taking effect may be made to depend upon some subsequent event. Affirmative legislation may in some cases be adopted, of which the parties interested are at liberty to avail themselves or not, at their option." After citing as illustrations the cases of private and municipal corporations, he proceeds, (page 141:) "For the like reasons, the question whether a county or township shall be divided, and a new one formed, or two townships or school-districts formerly one be reunited, or a city charter be revised, or a county-seat located at a particular place, or, after its location, removed elsewhere, or the municipality contract particular debts, or engage in a particular improvement, is always a question which may with propriety be referred to the voters of the municipality for decision."

This principle was adopted by this court, in the case of Upham v. Supervisors, 8 Cal. 378, where it was held that, while the legislature cannot delegate its legislative powers, it can delegate the power to the voters of a county to select a county-seat therein; and also in People v. Burr, 13 Cal. 343, where the legislature had passed an act authorizing the issue of certain bonds, unless, upon petition duly filed, and at an election thereupon held, the people of San Francisco should vote against the issuance of such bonds. Of like effect is the decision in Robinson v. Bidwell, 22 Cal. 379, where the court held that the vote of the people, under an act providing therefor, upon a proposition to issue bonds, and where the bonds were to be issued or not, according as the majority of the votes should determine, was not an act of legislation, but simply an event upon the happening of which the law is to take effect. See, also, Hobart v. Supervisors, 17 Cal. 23. In the case of People v. Nally, 49 Cal. 478, this court held that an act which submits to a popular vote of the electors of a county the question whether a portion of the territory of an adjoining county shall be annexed to it, and provides that, if the majority of the votes are for annexation, then the organization of the adjoining county shall be abandoned, and its territory shall be divided and annexed in part to the county in which the vote is taken, and in part to another adjoining county, was not unconstitutional. On the authority of that case, the ruling of the court below in this case as to the point now under consideration should be affirmed. But we may add to the reasoning given in the case referred to that the act here under discussion is in its nature and effect an enabling act, and, as such, it was full and complete, as an act of legislation, when it received the approval of the governor. Its purpose was to enable the people resident within the territory described in the act to segregate themselves from the county of Los Angeles, and to erect and maintain for themselves a county government. No doubt the legislature had the power to create a new county without submitting the question to a vote of the people, as congress had the power to admit California into the Union without an enabling act; but, as the burdens of the new local government were to be mainly borne by the people within the territory, it was, in the language of Mr. Cooley, "with propriety referred to the voters for decision;" and they were permitted, and, by pursuing the course prescribed by the terms of the act, enabled, to assume the position of a county in the state, and the burdens of a county government, or not, as they should elect; just as four territories were at about the same time permitted and enabled to assume the position and burdens of states in the union, or not, as the people thereof respectively should at the polls decide.

But it is further claimed that, if the act does not delegate to the people the power to create the law, it does delegate to them the power to repeal it, by reason of the sentence: "If, at such election, less than two-thirds of the qualified electors voting for and against the creation of the proposed county vote for the creation of said county, then this act shall cease to be of any force or effect;" and that by reason thereof the whole act is void. If the effect of this sentence was, as claimed, to delegate to the people the power to repeal the act, a complete and perfect answer to the objection would be that the sentence might be stricken out entire without affecting any other portion of the act. This being so, the presence of this sentence does not render the whole act void. Robinson v. Bidwell, supra; People v. Nally, supra; Ex parte Frazer, 54 Cal. 94. But we do not think that such was the force or effect of this clause. The law was complete and in force the moment it was approved by the governor. It provided for different steps and stages of proceedings in carrying it into effect. One of its provisions was that when it had reached a certain stage in these proceedings, which stage must be reached within a time limited by the legislature, the further proceeding under it should depend upon the happening of an event which might or might not happen, to-wit, the favorable vote of the electors. If that event or contingency happened, then all the remaining provisions of the act were to be carried into effect; and this, too, was to be done within a time limited by the act. If the event did not happen, then, by its own terms, no further provisions of the act were to be carried into effect. Not only had the legislature the power to provide upon what condition or contingency the provisions of the act might be carried into effect, but also to provide within what time it must be done, if done at all; and it may have been a wise provision, in view of the rapid changes taking place in the conditions of the surrounding country and the numbers of its people, to say to them, "If you do not choose to accept the permission granted by the provisions of this act within the time herein named, it shall not remain an open permit, to be accepted at any future time." It may very well be that the legislature was willing to create a new county, located and bounded as proposed in the act, at that time, and not be willing, or deem it wise, to create one in the same locality, or with the same boundaries, two or four years hence. Conditions may so change that in the early future two or more new counties may be needed in that part of the state; or, on the other hand, it may not be desirable then to make any change. Whatever may have been the reason which moved the legislature thereto, it did not delegate to the people the power to repeal the act, but itself said that if the provisions of the act were not accepted within the period named they should not thereafter be carried into effect.

2. Another point made is that the act is in violation of section 6, art. 11, of the constitution, which provides that corporations for municipal purposes shall not be created by special laws. This point does not seem to be very seriously insisted upon in argument, but it is proper to notice it. It is sufficient to say of it that it is easily deducible from the constitution itself that a county is not a "corporation for municipal purposes" within the meaning of the section referred to. Article 11 is on the subject of "Cities, Counties, and Towns." The first five sections relate entirely to the organization and management of county governments, the first section giving to them a designation different from that of "municipal corporations." It reads: "The several counties, as they now exist, are hereby recognized as legal subdivisions of this state." With the sixth section commence the provisions in reference to municipal corporations, and it and the two following sections are devoted exclusively to that subject, having nothing in them relating to counties or county government. So, also, with section 19. Sections 9 to 14, inclusive, and sections 16, 17, and 18 relate to subjects which are common to both counties and cities and towns; and every time that either is mentioned the three are mentioned by name, and not as organizations of a single class, as "municipalities" or "municipal corporations." Section 15 clearly defines the distinction between the two as classes. It reads: "Private property shall not be taken or sold for the payment of the corporate debt of any political or municipal corporation." It is clear, therefore, that the constitution does not hold counties to be municipal corporations, or "corporations for municipal purposes;" but, so far as they are to be regarded as corporations at all, they are "political corporations." And this is in harmony with the common acceptation of the terms "municipality" or "municipal corporation," as used in the common and written law of both England and America, time out of mind. This view is also in harmony with those provisions of the statutes and codes which define counties to be "bodies politic and corporate," and also with the decision of this court, made before the adoption of the constitution, when it declared that a county is not a municipal corporation, within the meaning of that term, as used in the Political Code. People v. Sacramento Co., 45 Cal. 695. It was also so understood by the framers of the constitution as shown by the debates in convention. See volume 2, p. 1050, and volume 3, pp. 1482, 1483, 1502, and 1509.

3. It is also claimed that the act is void because it is in conflict with, or passed in violation of, article 4, § 25, subd. 33, of the constitution, where it is provided that "the legislature shall not pass local or special laws * * * in cases where a general law can be made applicable." This point is not well taken. While it may be found practicable to, and the legislature has already endeavored, by a single act, to provide a uniform system of county government, we can hardly conceive it possible, in view of the varied conditions of the different localities in this state, if, indeed, it could be done in any state, to frame a single law which should meet the necessities of each attempt to organize a new "political subdivision of the state." In any event, whether such a law could "be made applicable" depends upon questions of fact which this court has no means of investigating, and upon the solution of which it would not attempt to substitute its judgment in place of that of the legislature. The policy of adding to the number of the "political subdivisions of the state" is one to be determined by the legislative department of the government, in each instance when the proposition to do so is made; and, if the determination be favorable, then the legislative department alone must fix and determine the boundaries of such subdivision.

4. Appellant claims that several distinct and separate provisions of the act are in conflict with distinct and separate subdivisions of section 25, art. 4, of the constitution, prohibiting local and special legislation on specific subjects, and that as to each of those provisions it is unconstitutional and void; as in the provision defining the duties of the commissioners, giving them the power to create supervisor, school, and road districts, and election precincts, and to exercise the powers conferred upon boards of supervisors in the matter of calling elections, canvassing the returns, and the like; the provision classifying the county; the one consolidating certain offices; the one providing for the transfer to the new county, when organized, of certain causes which may be then pending in the courts of the county of Los Angeles; and perhaps some others. It would extend this opinion beyond any limit of necessity to discuss each of these objections separately. By the very terms of the act, these provisions relate to the mere incidents of the organization of the county, and provide for acts which must be done in order to complete the organization and preserve the orderly and harmonious administration of the government and the laws. None of them extend in their operation beyond the time when the organization shall have become complete, and the subject-matters of its jurisdiction under the general laws shall have been brought and placed under its control, except, it may be, the single one of the classification of the county, and that extends, as does the classification already made of all the other counties, only until the taking of the next census, and the readjustment of representation. It was and is the duty of the legislature to classify all the counties, and for this purpose it may classify them by population. Article 11, § 5, Const. It had done this as to all the other counties, and it must necessarily classify every new county, as it is organized, according to the best information at its command, until such time as the new county can fall into the line of classification prescribed by the general law. It did so classify this one; the classification to remain in force until, and only until, a readjustment of the classification of all the counties will take place under the provisions of the general law on that subject. We have no doubt of the authority of the legislature to do this; and, as to the objections of a like character made to other separate provisions of the act, we may say, the legislature, having the power to create and organize a new county, had power and authority to adopt the measures necessary to its complete organization, and to the bringing and placing of the subject-matters of the jurisdiction of its courts or officers under their control; and all this might be done by the same act. These things were germane to the main object of the bill. Unless the validity of the whole act depends upon the constitutionality of one or more of these provisions of detail for the organization, the court ought not in this action to express an opinion as to the constitutionality of these separate provisions. It will be time enough to pass upon those provisions when some right dependent upon the disputed provision is brought before the court for adjudication. Brooks v. Fischer, 79 Cal. 173, 21 Pac. Rep. 652. No one of them that is now questioned seems to be so blended with the general scope and purpose of the act as a whole as to affect the validity of the whole act, or any other of its provisions; therefore, its invalidity, if it should be invalid, would not defeat the general scope and purpose of the act. As to the objection made to the provisions in regard to the holding of the elections, the manner of conducting them, and designating the places of voting, the constitution itself expressly excepts the case of the organization of new counties from the inhibition against local and special legislation. Article 4, § 25, subd. 11. And here it may be remarked that this very exception shows that the framers of the constitution recognized the probable necessity of legislation which might be denominated local or special, in cases of the organization of new counties.

But it is contended that the court ought now to determine the question of the constitutionality of these separate provisions to which attention is called, and of each of them, even if they do not go to the merits of the whole act, and, if any of them be found to be unconstitutional, then to consider and determine the question of whether or not the people would have been likely to have accepted the provisions of the act as a whole, and perfected an organization under it, if the provisions so found to be unconstitutional had been omitted from it. This is inviting the court to enter a field of pure conjecture, and upon a speculation as to probabilities in which we cannot indulge. All that we need to say here is, and that we do say, that the vote of the people was not an act of legislation, and that the act for the organization of the county of Orange is not, as a whole, or in any matter which affects its general scope and purpose, in conflict with the constitution. The judgment appealed from is affirmed in each case.

CONTRACTORS—NEGLIGENCE—HIGHWAYS.

1. Where a contractor, in violation of a city ordinance, leaves a hole unguarded by light or barriers in a public street which he is repairing, he is responsible to one injured thereby without contributory negligence.

2. A street is none the less a highway because the duty of keeping half of it in repair is imposed on some one other than the public.

3. The contractor's liability does not depend on the authority of his employer to have the street repaired, or whether the employer would be responsible for the injury.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; WALTER H. LEVY, Judge.

J. C. Bates, for appellant. L. Quint, for respondent.

HAYNE, C. Action against a contractor for negligence in repairing a street. Verdict and judgment for plaintiff for $300. Defendant appeals from the judgment without any bill of exceptions or statement.

It must be taken as established by the verdict that the allegations of the complaint are true. Therefore the fact must be taken to be that the defendant was a contractor, "to repair and replank East street, in said city and county of San Francisco, state of California, from the intersection of Market street with said East street, southerly to and beyond the intersection of Howard street with said East street;" that he entered upon the performance of the work, and on the 20th of January, 1887, he "was engaged in laying plank upon said East street;" that on said day "and on East street, he, the said defendant, carelessly and negligently left a space or hole uncovered, and carelessly and negligently left the same so open and uncovered, without any guard or other protection around the same, or notice to warn persons who might be traveling along or upon said East street of danger, or that they were approaching danger, as they came near or in proximity to said opening or hole, so left open, unguarded, and unprotected as aforesaid; nor did he, the said defendant, keep or have any light or lights about or near said opening or hole, that persons passing along said East street could see said opening or hole, or the danger they were in as they approached the same;" that on said 20th day of January the plaintiff was traveling along said East street, between the streets mentioned, "when, without any notice or warning of approaching danger, and without any fault or negligence on his part, he fell through said opening or hole, so left open and unguarded and unprotected by said defendant as aforesaid," and was injured. The complaint is perhaps not a model of pleading, but we think that it was sufficient, and that the demurrer was properly overruled. If a contractor leaves an unguarded hole in a public street which he is repairing, it is negligence for which he is responsible to those injured thereby without contributory negligence. It appears from the appellant's brief that there is an ordinance of the board of supervisors which contains, among other things, the following provisions: "Any person by whom, or under whose immediate direction, or by whose immediate authority, as principal or as contractor or as employe, any portion of a public street may be made dangerous, shall erect, and, so long as the danger may continue, maintain, around the portion of the street or highway so made dangerous a good and substantial barrier, and shall cause to be maintained during every night, from sunset until daylight, a lighted lantern at the ends of the portion of the street so made dangerous, and every side of a street crossing so made dangerous." The defendant did not comply with the requirements of this ordinance.

East street is a public street. Schulte v. Transportation Co., 50 Cal. 593. And it is conceded by the counsel for the appellant that the court will take judicial notice of the streets. It is none the less a public street because the board of harbor commissioners are charged with the duty of keeping one-half of it in repair. As was said in the case above cited: "Nor is it material by whom the street was improved so as to fit it for travel. By whomsoever the work was done, the plaintiff, in common with the public, is entitled to use the street as a highway." Nor is the question as to who had the authority to cause the street to be repaired important. If the defendant is guilty of negligence in repairing a street under contract with the proper authorities, he is a wrong-doer. If he was guilty of negligence in repairing the street without any competent authority, he is, a fortiori, a wrong-doer. It is enough that he left an unguarded hole in the street which he was planking, and that the plaintiff fell into it without any fault on his part, and this sufficiently appears.

The doctrine of respondeat superior invoked by the appellant has no application, if for no other reason, because he was not a servant, but an independent contractor. Boswell v. Laird, 8 Cal. 469; O'Hale v. Sacramento, 48 Cal. 214; Du Pratt v. Lick, 38 Cal. 691; King v. Railroad Co., 66 N. Y. 184; Hilliard v. Richardson, 3 Gray, 349; Reed v. Alleghany City, 79 Pa. St. 302. We therefore advise that the judgment be affirmed.

We concur: Belcher, C. C.; Foote, C.

Per Curiam. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is affirmed.

Thornton, J., (concurring.) I believe the above conclusion is correct. But I think it is so, notwithstanding the ordinance referred to in the opinion. The defendant was guilty of negligence, independent of the ordinance and its provisions. His negligence was patent to every one, and was pronounced and clear, though the ordinance had never been passed.

PEOPLE v. SAVERCOOL. (No. 20,456.)

ASSAULT WITH DEADLY WEAPON—INFORMATION.

An information charging that defendant, at a time and place named therein, "did commit an assault with a deadly weapon, to-wit, a revolver, upon the person of one N.," sufficiently describes the weapon and charges the felonious intent, within Pen. Code Cal. § 245, providing for the punishment of "every person who commits an assault upon the person of another with a deadly weapon or instrument, or by any means or force likely to produce great bodily injury."

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Plumas county; G. G. Clough, Judge.

C. E. McLaughlin, Dist. Atty., for appellant. Chipman & Garter and W. W. Kellogg, for respndent.

Foote, C. This is an appeal from a judgment sustaining a demurrer to an information and discharging the defendant. The part of the information material to this controversy is as follows: "William W. Savercool is accused by the district attorney of the said Plumas county, by this information, of the crime of assault with a deadly weapon, committed as follows: The said William W. Savercool, on the 21st day of January, A. D. 1889, at the said county of Plumas, did commit an assault with a deadly weapon, to-wit, a revolver, upon the person of one Elijah Nicholson, contrary to the form, force, and effect of the statute in such case made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the people of the state of California." The points made in favor of the judgment are: That the information did not charge the defendant with "any criminal or felonious intent;" that it did not sufficiently describe the weapon alleged to have been used in making the assault. Section 245 of the Penal Code, under which the information was drawn, is: "Every person who commits an assault upon the person of another with a deadly weapon or instrument, or by any means or force likely to produce great bodily injury, is punishable," etc. Examining the information, we find that it follows the language of that section. This is all that is necessary. The ultimate or issuable facts which the statute declares to constitute the offense are to be pleaded substantially in the language of the law, while probative facts, such as the intent with which an assault is made, and the "present ability" to do it, must be proved, but need not be alleged in the information or indictment. People v. White, 34 Cal. 183–188; People v. Cronin, Id. 210; People v. Turner, 65 Cal. 540–542, 4 Pac. Rep. 553. It being charged that the assault was made with a "deadly weapon," as the statute prescribes, it was unnecessary to have described it further as "to-wit, a revolver," as was done. The kind of weapon was a matter of proof only. People v. Congleton, 44 Cal. 92–94. We think the information was sufficient, and that the judgment should be reversed, and so advise.

We concur: Belcher, C. C.; Vanclief, C.

Per Curiam. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is reversed.

HARRIS et al. v. FRANK. (No. 11,422.)

FRAUDS, STATUTE OF—PROMISE TO ANSWER FOR DEBT OF ANOTHER—PLEADING.

1. In an action for goods sold and delivered, and money advanced to defendant on his alleged promise to pay for them, where the evidence shows that the goods were delivered and the money advanced to another, and so charged by plaintiffs, the defendant cannot be held as an original contractor, he being, at most, but a guarantor.

2. The guaranty of defendant, being only a verbal one, was within the statute of frauds; Civil Code Cal. § 1624, providing that a contract to answer for the debt of another is void, where the same, or some note or memorandum thereof, is not in writing, and signed by the party, unless within certain exceptions named in section 2794, which are not applicable to defendant's promise.

3. As the declaration contained only the common counts, a contract of guaranty not being pleaded, defendant was not required to plead the statute of frauds, but had a right to avail himself of it under his general denial.

Works and Paterson, JJ., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JOHN F. FINN, Judge.

Civil Code Cal. § 1624: "The following contracts are invalid, unless the same, or some note or memorandum thereof, be in writing, and subscribed by the party to be charged, or his agent: * * * A special promise to answer for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another, except in the cases provided for in section 2794 of this Code."

P. Reddy, (W. H. Metson, of counsel,) for appellants. Manuel Eyre, (M. S. Eisner of counsel,) for respondent.

FOX, J. Since the trial in the court below the defendant, Frank, has died, and the case is prosecuted here against his executors. The action is indebitatus assumpsit. Complaint in two counts,—one for goods, wares, and merchandise sold and delivered; and the other for moneys advanced, paid out, and expended,—both alleged to be for and at the special instance and request of defendant. Answer, specific denial of each allegation of the complaint, and a plea that the plaintiffs, who sue as partners in business, have not complied with the requirements of sections 2466 and 2468 of the Civil Code. On the latter plea no point is made on this appeal. Judgment went for defendant, motion for new trial made and denied, and plaintiffs appeal. The appeal is based entirely on the ground that the evidence is insufficient to support the findings.

The pleadings in this case give no intimation as to what is the real character of the action. The leading facts, as developed upon the trial, are: The plaintiffs were partners, carrying on a general merchandise business at Independence, in Inyo county. The defendant was an aged and retired man, of some means, residing at San Francisco. His sons and son-in-law were the owners of most of the capital stock and the principal officers of the Kearsarge Mill & Mining Company, a corporation owning and operating a mill and mine near Independence. This corporation had for a year or more an account at plaintiffs', from whom they purchased supplies used in its mining operations, and upon whom it had also drawn, from time to time, for moneys in the payment of its current expenses, making payments from time to time, as stocks were sold or moneys were otherwise realized by the company. In May, 1879, the balance against the company was something over $2,000, when plaintiffs notified Gray, the superintendent, that the credit of the company was stopped, and they could not give it further accommodation. Gray told them that the defendant, his father-in-law, was coming up in a few days, and that the company would arrange with him to secure them for such accommodation as it might need, and it would be all right; whereupon they consented to let him have such further supplies as might be absolutely necessary for the time being, and they did so. In the latter part of May, 1879, the defendant did go up and visit the mine. He had never been there before, and had no personal interest in the property or in the stock of the company. After visiting the mine in company with an expert, he went to the store of plaintiffs, and made some trifling purchase, and then had a conversation with the plaintiffs on the subject of the company's account and dealings with plaintiffs. Just what that conversation was, and the legal effect of it, is the whole subject-matter of dispute in this case.

It is conceded on all hands that no writing was made by or between the parties. But plaintiffs contend, with great earnestness, that the conversation was such as amounted in law to an original contract on the part of the defendant, giving to plaintiffs carte blanche to furnish the company with goods and money to any extent that the officers might call for, charge the same to the company as before, adding or including the present balance due, render monthly statements to the officers, and that he (defendant) would pay the bills; payments to be received through the company as theretofore. On the other hand, it is contended, on behalf of the defense, that nothing which transpired in that conversation was such as can be held in law to be an original contract on the part of the defendant to pay for goods or money furnished to or for the company, or thereafter to be so furnished, or even such as to make the defendant a guarantor for the company. The evidence is conflicting as to what was said or done at that conference. According to that on behalf of plaintiffs, the conversation was principally between the plaintiff Rhine and the defendant, but the plaintiff Harris and one Seeley were also present at the time. The two latter do not fully corroborate the former, but both of them disclaim having heard all the conversation which occurred between Rhine and the defendant. If the case rested, however, upon the oral testimony alone of these three, there would be much ground for argument that the contract was an original one on the part of the defendant, under which he would be liable for the goods and money furnished after the date of the contract. But the case does not rest upon their oral testimony alone. The defendant flatly contradicts the testimony of plaintiffs as to what occurred at that time. According to his evidence, all that he said at that time amounted to a mere expression of opinion as to the merits of the mine, and as to the fact that the plaintiffs would not ultimately "lose anything by the boys." It is contended that no weight should be given to his evidence, for when called to testify he was old and feeble, and his memory impaired. Taken by itself, we should not feel disposed to give his testimony much weight. But there is much evidence besides his which is in conflict with that portion of plaintiffs' testimony which tends to show an original contract. A conversation between the two partners, immediately after the defendant had left their store, tends to show that neither of them at the time understood his agreement to be an original contract, but a mere guaranty, and Harris told Rhine at the time that he was a fool, or words to that effect, for not having it in writing. Statements subsequently made by them to others are to the same effect. The testimony of witnesses called on both sides, and examined as to what the old gentleman said he was going to do, and as to what he was requested by the superintendent to do, also goes to show that his purpose, and all that was requested or expected of him, was not to open for himself an account, in his own or any other name, but simply to establish the credit of the company, so that it could continue to receive its accustomed accommodation at plaintiffs' store.

The subsequent course of business also furnishes strong circumstantial evidence in conflict with the theory of original contract. The fact that the charges were thereafter made to the company and the monthly statements rendered to its officers would not of itself have any weight in that direction, for, according to the testimony of plaintiffs, this was in accordance with their instructions. But the law is clear that if any credit was in fact given to the company, or it was in any degree liable for the indebtedness, then the defendant cannot be held as an original contractor, but at most as a mere guarantor. Brown v. Bradshaw, 1 Duer, 199; Rogers v. Kneeland, 13 Wend. 114; Welch v. Marvin, 36 Mich. 59; Bugbee v. Kendricken, 130 Mass. 437; Langdon v. Richardson, 58 Iowa, 610, 12 N. W. Rep. 622; Cole v. Hutchinson, 34 Minn. 410, 26 N. W. Rep. 319; Noyes v. Humphreys, 11 Grat. 643; Robertson v. Hunter, 6 S E. Rep. 850. Many other cases could be cited to the same effect. And the question whether the contract was one of original promise, or of guaranty merely, is always one for the jury (or in this case for the trial court) to determine from the surrounding circumstances of the case. Dean v. Tallman, 105 Mass. 443; Glenn v. Lehnen, 54 Mo. 45; Cowdin v. Gottgetreu, 55 N. Y. 650; Bloom v. McGrath, 53 Miss. 249; Eshleman v. Harnish, 76 Pa. St. 97; Moshier v. Kitchell, 87 Ill. 18; Pettit v. Braden, 55 Ind. 201. The fact, as shown conclusively by the evidence, and uncontradicted, that the plaintiffs continued to furnish the company with money and goods as they required the same, until the mine closed down in December, 1879; that neither during that time, nor ever until November, 1880, did they make any report to or demand on the defendant, or even intimate to him the state of the account; that during all that time they were at different times calling upon the officers of the company for money; that all the money they ever did receive was from the officers of the company; that shortly before the mine closed down they made advances to the amount of $1,200 in money at the special and personal request of the president, and on his assurance that the company would place a goodly amount to their credit in San Francisco,—all these are circumstances tending strongly to show that the plaintiffs regarded the company as their original debtor, and not the defendant. There is also a sharp and substantial conflict in the evidence as to what occurred at the house of defendant when plaintiff called upon him in November, 1880, in reference to the account. The plaintiff Rhine, who made the call, testifies substantially that he then told defendant that he had been unable to collect the bill from the company, and demanded that he should pay it as he had contracted to do; and that defendant told him that he had no money, but proposed to assign to him certain mortgage securities in satisfaction of the bill. Defendant denies that he made any such offer, or that Rhine claimed that he (the defendant) was the debtor; but in the same connection he says he was sick and got excited, and does not remember exactly what Rhine did say. Daniel Harris testifies that he was present at that interview, and that what transpired was as follows: "Rhine commenced to say, 'I have got no money from the boys yet;' and Mr. Frank said, 'Well, I have not got anything to do with the boys.' 'Well,' Mr. Rhine says, 'I would like to have the money.' 'Well,' he said, [Frank,] 'Do I owe you anything?' and Mr. Rhine said, 'No; you don't owe me anything, but you could see the boys, you know, so they could pay me along, even if it is not all at once.' And later on Frank said, 'Did I promise you anything?' and he said, 'No.' 'Do I owe you anything?' He said, 'No; * * * but you go down to the boys and tell them, so that I can get something out of them;' and he says he has nothing to do with it, nor will he have anything to do with it whatever." There are several other instances in the record where Mr. Rhine is directly contradicted by other witnesses as to what he has himself said about this transaction at different times. The court below has, as it was its duty to do, found upon the question of whether or not the defendant became an original promisor for the payment of this debt; and in view of the substantial conflict which we find in the evidence, oral and circumstantial, bearing upon the question, we cannot disturb that finding.

As we have said, there is also a conflict as to whether or not he became a guarantor; but that conflict is evidently not so marked or substantial. If there was such a contract, however, not being in writing, it was void, under sections 1624 and 2794 of the Civil Code. Plaintiff contends that it was not void under those sections, but simply voidable, and that defendant has waived any defense under the statute by failing to plead it, and because "it does not appear from the record" that the evidence was objected to. The complaint being upon common counts only, with no intimation that plaintiff relied upon a contract of guarantee, the defendant was not called upon to, and could not, plead the statute of frauds, but had a right to avail himself of it under his general denial. Duck Co. v. Dewey, 6 Gray, 446; Durant v. Rogers, 71 Ill. 124; Taylor v. Merrill, 55 Ill. 52; Hunter v. Randall, 62 Me. 425. It is true that the record does not show that the evidence was objected to; nor would it do so, even if such were the fact. The appeal is by plaintiffs, and the objections and exceptions of defendant have no place in the record. The presumptions are in favor of the rulings and findings of the court below, and we see nothing in the record to overcome such presumption. These being the only points made upon the appeal, it follows that the judgment and order appealed from must be affirmed. So ordered.

BARRETT v. MARKET-ST. C. RY. Co.

(No. 12,506.)

CARRIERS—STREET-CARS—TENDER OF FARE.

It is not necessary that a passenger on a street-car should tender the exact amount of his fare, but he must tender a reasonable amount, and the carrier must furnish change, and five dollars is such a reasonable amount.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; T. K. WILSON, Judge.

W. H. L. Barnes, for appellant. Stanly, Stoney & Hayes, for respondent.

PATERSON, J. Action for damages for the forcible ejection of plaintiff from one of defendant's cars. The defense was that the plaintiff had refused to pay his fare, and that, therefore, the defendant was justified in ejecting him. The trial court gave judgment for the plaintiff, and the defendant appeals upon the findings. The material portions of the findings are as follows: "That while in said car, as such passenger, and when said car was near the corner of Second and Market streets, the conductor in charge of said car, on behalf of the defendant, did, in the course of his employment as such conductor, demand of the plaintiff the payment of the sum of 5 cents; being the legal fare and cost of transportation on said car. That said plaintiff did not have in his possession any coin or currency of the exact value of 5 cents, or any coin of any smaller denomination than a $5 gold-piece, lawful money of the United States, and plaintiff, in response to said demand of said conductor, offered said conductor a $5 gold-piece, and told said conductor to take his (plaintiff's) fare out of said sum of $5. That the conductor refused to accept said $5 gold-piece, informing the plaintiff that he was unable to make change for said $5 gold-piece, and insisted upon the payment to him by the plaintiff of the exact sum of 5 cents, at the same time directing plaintiff if he did not produce and pay said sum of 5 cents to leave the car. That the plaintiff informed the conductor that the $5 gold-piece was the smallest coin he had; that he was willing to pay his fare, but could not furnish the exact amount; and refused to leave the car upon the demand of the conductor. That thereupon the conductor stopped said car, and called the driver to his assistance, and both of them thereupon seized the plaintiff, and, against his protest, opposition, and struggles, forcibly ejected him from said car at the corner of said Second and Market streets and in so doing inflicted upon plaintiff various bruises and injuries. * * * And the court finds from the foregoing facts alone that the plaintiff did not refuse to pay fare for his transportation on said car, and did not insist upon any right, or supposed right, to be transported free of charge, under any circumstances or upon any condition, and that plaintiff was not ejected or put out of said car for a refusal to pay his fare. And as a conclusion of law, from the foregoing facts, the court finds that the plaintiff is entitled to judgment," etc. It is stipulated by counsel "that, if plaintiff were entitled to damages, $500 was a fair and just estimate thereof."

The question on the merits to which counsel have mainly directed their arguments is whether the passenger was bound to tender the exact fare. It is argued for the appellant that the rule in relation to the performance of contracts applies, and that the exact sum must be tendered. But we do not think so. The fare can be demanded in advance as well as at a subsequent time. Civil Code, § 2187. And, so far as this question is concerned, we see no difference in principle where the fare is demanded in advance and where it is demanded subsequently. If it be demanded in advance, there is no contract. The carrier simply refuses to make a contract. Consequently the rule in relation to the performance of contracts, whatever it be, has no necessary application. The obligation of the carrier in such case would be that which the law imposes on every common carrier, viz., that he must, "if able to do so, accept and carry whatever is offered to him, at a reasonable time and place, of a kind that he undertakes or is accustomed to carry." Id. § 2169. This duty, like every other which the law imposes, must have a reasonable performance; and we do not think it would in all cases be reasonable for the carrier to demand the exact fare as a condition of carriage. Suppose that on entering a street-car a person should tender the sum of 10 cents? Would it be reasonable for the carrier to refuse it? Prior to the act of 1878, the usual fare was 6¼ cents. In such a case it would be unreasonable for the carrier to demand the exact fare; for there is no coin in the country which would enable the passenger to answer such a demand. It would be impossible for the passenger to furnish such a sum. Consequently, to allow the carrier to maintain such a demand would be to allow him to refuse to perform the duty which the law imposes upon him. The fare which he is now allowed to charge is no longer the sum mentioned. The act of 1878 forbids him to "charge or collect a higher rate than 5 cents." But there is nothing to prevent a lower rate from being charged. The carrier might fix it at 4¼ cents, and in such a case it would be equally impossible for the passenger to comply with such a demand as in the case above put. Consequently, it will not do to lay down the rule that the passenger is obliged to tender the exact fare.

But it does not follow that the passenger may tender any sum, however large. If he should tender a $100 bill, for example, it would be clear that the carrier would not be bound to furnish change. The true rule must be, not that the passenger must tender the exact fare, but that he must tender a reasonable sum, and that the carrier must accept such tender, and must furnish change to a reasonable amount. The obligation to furnish a reasonable amount of change must be considered as one which the law imposes from the nature of the business. Section 2188 of the Civil Code provides that "a passenger who refuses to pay his fare, or to conform to any lawful regulation of the carrier, may be ejected from the vehicle by the carrier." The question is whether the findings show a refusal to pay,—whether the tender of a $5 gold-piece was sufficient.

It is claimed by appellant that the establishment of the rule contended for by the respondent would lead to great inconvenience, and make it the duty of the carrier of persons for hire in street-cars to provide its conductors with sufficient small coin to do a general exchange business with all passengers; thus requiring the company to intrust, to a class of employes who are usually of no pecuniary responsibility, large sums of money. It is further said that if the tender of a $5 gold-piece is a tender of the amount actually due, and the conductor is bound to receive it and return $4.95 to the passenger, the same principle would apply to the offer by the passenger of $10 or $20 in gold or currency. With the question of convenience, however, we have nothing to do, except in so far as it bears upon the question whether the amount tendered was a reasonable sum,—such as the carrier was bound to accept. It does not follow, if it be established as a rule, that $5 is a reasonable amount to be tendered to a conductor, that $20 or $50 is also a reasonable amount, and must be accepted. The fears of the appellant are based upon the assumption that passengers generally will contumaciously, to avoid the payment of fare, and require the companies to carry them free, offer coin of a large denomination. But these fears, we think, can safely be set aside upon the theory that a question like this will, as is usual, settle itself by a spirit of mutual accommodation between carrier and passenger. It is a well-known fact that the $5 gold-piece is practically the lowest gold coin in use in this section of the country.

The case upon which the appellant relies (Fulton v. Railroad Co., 17 U. C. Q. B. 428,) is not quite in point. In that case the plaintiff had boarded a train of cars without a ticket, and when asked for his fare declined paying it, as he said he had not made up his mind how far he should go. The conductor told him that he must decide, and afterwards, on his declining again on the same ground, stopped the train and put him off. The plaintiff then tendered the conductor a $20 gold-piece, telling him to take his fare, $1.35, out of it. Under these circumstances the court very properly held that the plaintiff had refused to pay his fare, within the meaning of a statute very much like our own, and that the conductor was justified in refusing to carry him further. The court said: "The general practice is for the passengers to pay at the office, and get tickets, * * * and a person rushing into a car without a ticket has no reason to expect that he will find the conductor prepared to change a twenty-dollar gold-piece, for he relies upon receiving tickets from the parties, or, if money is to be paid to him instead, that it will be paid with reasonable regard to what is convenient under the circumstances." A distinction ought to be made, we think, between passengers traveling on steam railroads and those traveling on street railroads. Passengers of the former class are expected to prepare themselves with tickets procured at the regular office established at the station where the trains regularly stop. Horse-cars and cable-cars stop at all points along the road at the beck of those desiring to ride, and the conductors do not, as a general thing, expect to receive tickets for the passage. Judgment and order affirmed.

Mechanics' Liens — Material-Men—Appeal—Parties.

1. Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1183, providing liens for contractors, laborers, and material-men, requires the construction contract, where the amount exceeds $1,000, to be in writing, and to be filed in the recorder's office of the county where the property is situated; otherwise it shall be void; "and in such case the labor done and materials furnished by all persons aforesaid, except the contractor, shall be deemed to have been done and furnished at the personal instance of the owner, and they shall have a lien for the value thereof." Held that, as the contract is void when not recorded, the material-men are entitled to a lien without regard to the amount due on such contract. Following Kellogg v. Howes, ante, 509.

2. As the contract is void, and nothing due or to become due to the contractor, it is not necessary for the material-men to give notice to the owner of the amount they are entitled to, as provided for by section 1184, in cases where there is a recorded contract. Following Kellogg v. Howes, ante, 509.

3. Section 1187 provides that the claim of lien must contain a statement of the demand, with the name of the owner, and also the name of the party by whom he was employed, or to whom he furnished the materials. Held, that it was unnecessary for a material-man to state in such claim the relation of the party to whom he furnished the material to the owner, and that, the construction contract being void, he was deemed by the law to have furnished to the owner, for the purpose of the lien.

4. If it is necessary that there be some one personally liable in order to support a lien, such liability is found in the person of the subcontractor to whom the materials are furnished, but it is not necessary that the owner be personally liable.

5. Though, under a valid construction contract, the lien of one furnishing material to a subcontractor might not attach until notice is given the owner, under a contract void for want of record, the material-man being deemed by the statute to have contracted with the owner, his lien relates to the time of furnishing the material, and is not defeated by the subsequent filing of a declaration of homestead on the property.

6. A statute which subjects a homestead to a lien for materials furnished in its construction is not unconstitutional as impairing the obligation of a contract, but is a mere change of remedy.

7. On an appeal by material-men from a judgment denying a lien, it appeared that a subcontractor, against whom a personal judgment had been had in the same action, in favor of the material-men, and from which no appeal had been taken, had died since the rendering of the judgment. Held, that it was not necessary that he should be represented, as his interests were in no way involved in the appeal.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; H. K. S. O'Melveny, Judge.

Chapman & Hendrick, for appellant. Louis Gottschalk, for respondents.

Works, J. The respondent Ann Twohey, being the owner of certain real estate, attempted to contract with the respondents Strange and Gottschalk for the construction of a dwelling-house thereon. The contract price for constructing the house was more than $1,000, and the contract was not in writing or filed in the recorder's office. For these reasons it was wholly void. Code Civil Proc. §§ 1183, 1184. Strange and Gottschalk subcontracted the construction of the house to one Tittle, who was a party defendant in the court below, but whose death has been suggested in this court. The appellant furnished material for the construction of the building to the subcontractor, Tittle. It did not give any personal notice to the owner of the building that it had furnished the material. Tittle was paid in full before the appellant's claim of lien was filed. The appellant filed its claim of lien against the building in proper time, and in due form, in which it was stated that Strange and Gottschalk were the original contractors for the construction of the building, and Tittle the subcontractor, and that it had furnished the material to said Tittle, the same to be furnished "from time to time, as ordered, for so much as the same was worth." The complaint alleges the making of the contract between the owner and original contractor, and between the latter and the subcontractor, and the contract between the subcontractor and the plaintiff for the materials, substantially as stated in the claim of lien, and also alleges the facts above stated, showing that the original contract was void. The court below found the facts substantially as alleged, and rendered a personal judgment against the contractor and subcontractor for the amount of plaintiff's claim, but found against the plaintiff as to its claim of lien against the owner, and rendered judgment accordingly. The plaintiff appeals on the judgment roll from the judgment against it and in favor of the defendant Twohey.

The respondent contends that the action cannot proceed in this court until some one is substituted to represent the defendant Tittle, whose death has been suggested. There is nothing in this point. Tittle's rights are not involved in the appeal. There was a personal judgment against him in the court below, from which neither party has appealed; and he is in no way interested in the present appeal, nor is his presence, or that of his representative, necessary to a full determination of the matters before us.

It is further contended by the respondent that the complaint was insufficient, (1) because it alleged and proceeded on the theory that the original contract was void, while, as she insists, the contract was not void as between the owner and material-man, as held in Powder Co. v. Flume Co., 78 Cal. 193, 20 Pac. Rep. 419; (2) because it failed to show that anything was due from the owner to the contractor. These questions were fully considered in Kellogg v. Howes, ante, 509, (opinion filed November 7, 1889,) and decided adversely to the contention of the respondent.

It is further claimed by the respondent that the judgment of the court below was right because it found that the personal notice provided for in section 1184 of the Code of Civil Procedure was not given. The notice referred to was not necessary in this case. Its only object and purpose, as indicated by the statute, is to compel the owner to withhold payments due the contractor, for the better security of the material-man. In this case there was no contract, and no payments to stop. Not only so, but the statute provides that, where the contract is not made as required and filed in the recorder's office, "the labor done and materials furnished by all persons aforesaid, except the contractor, shall be deemed to have been done and furnished at the personal instance of the owner, and they shall have a lien for the value thereof." Code Civil Proc. § 1183; Kellogg v. Howes, supra; Lumber Co. v. Schmitt, 74 Cal. 625, 16 Pac. Rep. 516. If the owner was in contemplation of law the purchaser from the plaintiff, the latter was entitled to its lien for the value of the material furnished, without reference to any payments to the contractor. In other words, she stood in precisely the same position, as to the right of the appellant to enforce its lien, as if she had purchased the material directly from it. It must be apparent from this view of the case that she could not pay the contractor, to whom she was not liable, and thereby avoid the demand of the appellant, to whom she was liable, and that the service of the personal notice provided for in section 1184 would have been useless. The only effect of such notice, as provided by the statute, is that "it shall be the duty of the owner to, and he shall, withhold from his contractor * * * all money due or that may become due, to such contractor, * * * or sufficient of such money to answer such claim, and any lien that may be filed therefor for record, * * * and all money paid thereafter by the owner to the contractor * * * shall, for the purposes of all liens of all persons except that of the contractor, be deemed a payment prior to the time the same was due within the meaning of, and subject to the provisions of, this section." Code Civil Proc. § 1184. Other provisions of the section make this clear. The contract must be so made as to require payments to be made in installments, 25 per cent. of which must be payable at least 35 days after final completion of the work and contract. When such a contract is filed for record, it is notice that payments are to be made as therein provided for. If the 25 per cent. which must be withheld until after the claim of lien is filed is sufficient to pay his claim, the material-man need not give the personal notice provided for, and thereby stop the other payments. If such last installment will not be sufficient, he may give the necessary notice, which compels the owner to withhold other payments. But, if the contract is not filed in the recorder's office, it is not only void by the express terms of the statute, but he has no notice of the amount of payments to be made, or when they will fall due, or at what time he is required to give the personal notice. As a penalty for not affording him this means of knowledge, by filing such a contract as is required by the statute, the owner is deemed to have contracted for the material, so far as the right to a lien is concerned, and his property is bound for the value of such material. It seems to us that the language of the statute, and its object and purpose in this respect, are too plain to need construction. Besides, it appears in this case that the whole amount due, conceding the contract to have been valid, was paid before the 35 days after the completion of the contract had expired; and, in any view of the case, the appellant was entitled to its lien, to the extent of the 25 per cent. which was paid before it was due.

The respondent makes the further point that the appellant showed no cause of action for the enforcement of the lien, for the reason that the claim of lien was for material furnished to a contractor, and the action is for the enforcement of a claim of lien based upon the theory that there was no contract or contractor, and that the material was furnished to the owner. The claim of lien must contain a "statement of the demand after deducting all just credits and offsets, with the name of the owner and reputed owner, if known, and also the name of the person by whom he was employed, or to whom he furnished the materials, with a statement of the terms, time given, and conditions of his contract, and a description of the property to be charged with the lien." Id. § 1187. There is nothing in the section, or any other, that requires the material-man to state in his claim of lien what relation the person to whom he furnished the material bore to the owner, —whether contractor or agent; nor does the burden of determining whether any contract made, or attempted to be made, between the owner and contractor was valid or not rest on him when he comes to file his lien. He must state the facts required by the statute. Whether the person to whom he furnished the material had authority to bind the owner, and entitle the material-man to a lien, is a matter of pleading and proof at the trial. The complaint did not vary from the claim of lien in any material respect. It alleged the facts as stated in the claim of lien, and, in addition, alleged the facts showing that by virtue of what was stated in such claim, and other facts alleged, the property of the defendant was liable for the lien. The plaintiff could not have stated in its sworn claim that it had furnished the material to the owner, because such a statement would have been false. But the statute steps in, and provides that, the material having been furnished to the subcontractor, under the circumstances alleged in the complaint, the same should be deemed to have been furnished to the owner for the purposes of the lien. The facts stated in the claim of lien, and the provisions of the statute applied thereto, entitled the plaintiff to the lien; and there was no variance between the claim filed and the one attempted to be enforced. The case of Goss v. Strelitz, 54 Cal. 640, relied upon by the respondent, is not in point. There the attempt was made to recover for material not included in the claim of lien.

Again, it is urged by the respondent, in support of the judgment, that, in order to support the lien, there must have been some personal liability on the part of some one. This may be so, though we do not so hold. But here there was a personal liability. The subcontractor, who purchased the material from the plaintiff, was personally liable therefor, and a personal judgment was rendered against him by the court below. There need be no personal liability on the part of the owner. The owner is not made personally liable to the material-man, but his property is made liable for the material he has actually received, and retains in his building. This, it seems to us, is eminently just and right.

The respondent, after her contract with the contractor, and after the plaintiff had furnished the material, and it had gone into the building, filed a declaration of homestead on the property; and it is claimed that this defeated the lien. This is based on the ground that, as the law stood at the time the material was furnished, a claim for material could not attach to a homestead. A complete answer to this contention is that the lien must be held to relate to the time of furnishing the material, and at that time the homestead did not exist. In some of the earlier cases a distinction was made, in this respect, between contractors with the owner and subcontractors. As to the former, it was held that their liens attached at the commencement of the work, and as to the latter, that their liens were in the nature of attachments, and attached at the time notice was given to the owner. Cahoon v. Levy, 6 Cal. 295. But this distinction does not exist under the present statute, where the original contract is void. In such case the contract is, by the terms of the statute, deemed to be the contract of the owner, and the lien must be held to attach as in case of such a direct contract. Any other construction would relieve the owner from any liability, under the circumstances of this case. He could get his house completed, declare his homestead, and say to the original contractor: "Your contract is void, and I am not personally liable to you, nor is my property subject to any lien in your favor;" and to the material-man he could say: "After getting the full benefit of your material, and just before you could file your lien under the statute, I filed my declaration of homestead, and your lien comes too late." We do not wish to be understood as agreeing to the doctrine declared in the early decision cited, that the lien of a material-man did not attach at the time of furnishing the material, even under the former statute, (Association v. Wagner, 61 Cal. 349;) but, conceding it to have been so under the then existing statute, it is clearly not so now, where the contract is void for any of the reasons stated in the statute. Another conclusive answer to this claim of a homestead is that two days before the homestead was declared the law was so changed that a homestead, if properly declared, and in time, became subject to a lien for material. St. 1887, p. 81; Deer. Codes, Supl. p. 279, § 1241. Therefore, conceding that the lien did not attach until the claim was filed, the homestead was then subject to the lien, and the declaration filed did not affect it. The respondent contends that the amendment of the statute could not affect her rights, because it affected an existing contract. Counsel seems to forget his claim, so strenuously urged upon us, that there was no contract relation between the plaintiff and his client. But, conceding there was, the statute did not in any way affect the contract. It only took away the right of the respondent to defeat a just claim against her property, conceding counsel's position that the lien did not attach until notice was given. The judgment in favor of the defendant Twohey, and against the plaintiff, is reversed, with instructions to the court below to render judgment on the findings in favor of the plaintiff, foreclosing its lien.

BRANDT v. CLARK et al. (No. 13,444.)

TENDER—INTEREST.

There being conflicting evidence as to whether tender of the purchase price was made at the proper time, the allowance of interest to the vendors to the time of the trial should not be disturbed, especially where the vendees have been in possession, and had the use of the property.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; A. W. HUTTON, Judge.

F. K. Clark and R. L. Horton, for appellants. J. D. Bicknell, for respondent.

WORKS, J. There is a motion in this case to strike out the statement. As is usually the case, the motion is the result of inattention to the simple provisions of the Code by the attorneys for the appellants. The appeal is from the judgment. The point made is that the paper containing the evidence and the exceptions of the appellants is a statement of the case made in support of a motion for a new trial; that no motion for a new trial was made; and that under section 950 of the Code of Civil Procedure such a statement can only be used, on an appeal from the judgment, where it has been used in support of a motion for a new trial. This is the language of the section referred to. But counsel for the appellants say the paper relied upon may be treated either as a statement of the case or as a bill of exceptions. This is strictly true. It is entitled "Statement and Exceptions," and might with equal propriety be treated as a statement of the case, a bill of exceptions, or neither the one nor the other. We have never been able to understand why a statement was provided for in the Code, and having been provided for, we are equally at a loss to know why it should ever be resorted to in practice. A bill of exceptions has always been a well-known means of preserving exceptions and bringing up the evidence on appeal. It is a simple and convenient method of accomplishing these results, and is equally applicable to any and all kinds of appeals provided for by the Code. Code Civil Proc. §§ 646, 653, 661, 950. If attorneys could be induced to abandon entirely the practice of using, or attempting to use, a statement of the case, and resort exclusively to a bill of exceptions, much of the uncertainty and confusion that has crept into the practice on appeals to this court might in time be removed, and some degree of order and system in the practice in this respect be reasonably hoped for. As it is, a great portion of the time of this court, that should be devoted to the decision of cases on their merits, is taken up with these petty questions of practice.

As to the question presented by the motion in this case, we have not been able to satisfy our own minds whether the point made is well taken or not. If the language of the section is to be construed literally, a statement prepared on a motion for a new trial cannot be used on an appeal from the judgment, unless it has been used in support of the motion. But there is no reason apparent to us why this should be so. We are inclined to the belief that the section should not receive this strict and literal construction; but the conclusion we have reached on the merits of the case renders it unnecessary to decide the point, and we prefer to leave it open for further consideration, if it should ever become necessary.

This action was brought by the respondent, as the vendor of real estate, to correct a mistake in an agreement made by her to one of the appellants to convey certain property, and to recover the purchase money. The defendants denied the mistake alleged by the plaintiff, but in their answer, and by way of cross-complaint, averred another and different mistake, and further alleged that they had tendered payment of the purchase money, as provided in the contract, upon receiving a deed for the real estate actually purchased by them. The court found the mistake substantially as alleged by the defendants, that a small portion of the property agreed to be conveyed was not the property of the plaintiff; that the piece not owned by her was of the value of $100; that no tender of the purchase money had been made; allowed the defendants $100 deduction from the contract price for the tract of land for which they could get no title; decreed a conveyance of the balance; and rendered judgment against the defendants for the purchase money, with interest, and one-half the costs. The defendants appeal from part of the judgment.

It is contended that the court below erred (1) in allowing the defendants a right of way or easement of a certain road-way or street, instead of a fee in the land over which the road passed; (2) in allowing the plaintiff interest on the deferred payment of the purchase money from the time it fell due, by the terms of the contract, until the trial; (3) in allowing but $100 for the strip of land for which plaintiff had no title; (4) in decreeing a certain lot in controversy by reference to a map instead of by metes and bounds, whereby the fee of a certain private road-way is cut off, and a certain "drive" inserted, by reason of which the premises are cut in two; (5) the omission in the description of a certain other roadway; (6) the allowance of a less amount of water stock than the defendants were entitled to; (7) in compelling the defendants to pay one-half of the costs. Some of these questions depend upon the construction to be placed upon the agreement to convey, and others upon the evidence given at the trial. Upon a careful examination of the agreement and of the evidence, we are of the opinion that the court below did not err in any of the matters complained of.

It is claimed that the court erred in excluding certain evidence offered by the defendants; but we think otherwise. There is nothing in any of these objections that makes it necessary or expedient for us to notice or pass upon them, except in this general way. As to the allowance of interest on the purchase money, whether it should be allowed or not depended upon whether a tender of the purchase price had been made at the proper time. Upon this question the evidence was conflicting; and the findings should not be disturbed, for that reason. But there was no injustice in requiring the defendants to pay interest, as they had been in possession and had the use of the property during all of the time the interest was allowed. Judgment affirmed.

MILLARD v. SUPREME COUNCIL AMERICAN LEGION OF HONOR. (No. 11,716.)

MUTUAL BENEFIT INSURANCE—FINDINGS OF FACT.

1. In an action by the beneficiary, on a certificate of mutual benefit insurance, the court found that at the time when the certificate was issued to decedent he had become a member of the association, and had complied with all its requirements; that members could only know of the levy of an assessment by notice served on them; that decedent, on the day he was notified of his suspension for non-payment of a delinquent assessment, of which he had had no notice, paid the same, and all prior assessments due, and a subsequent one which had not yet become delinquent; that thereafter, when all assessments had been paid, and accepted by the association, decedent gave notice of the substitution of plaintiff for the original beneficiary, in the regular manner; that only one meeting having taken place since decedent's suspension, at which no action was taken in reference thereto, he was not reinstated into full membership until shortly after this notice and shortly before his death. Held, that there was a sufficient finding that decedent was a "member in good standing" at the time of his notice.

2. Such finding is immaterial, as the association had waived any right of forfeiture it may have had, by receiving and retaining the amounts of the assessments paid by decedent after his suspension.

3. Such facts are a sufficient finding as to the denials of the answer regarding the several suspensions of decedent, as there was no allegation that he was suspended at any other time, or for any other reason than delinquency in paying his assessments.

4. Such findings of fact, together with a finding that at the time of his death decedent was a member in good standing and had complied with all requirements of the association and of his certificate, are sufficient to avoid an objection that there was no finding on that issue, though the latter finding was classed under "conclusions of law."

5. The beneficiary was not required to furnish proof of death by the certificate or by-laws, the former merely requiring "satisfactory evidence of the death of said companion," and proof of death was required to be furnished to the supreme council only by the council of which decedent was a member. Held, that a finding of satisfactory proof of death by the beneficiary was immaterial, and had been waived by defendant in denying all liability on the certificate.

6. Code Civil Proc. Cal. §§ 632, 633, provide that, "upon the trial of a question of fact by the court, its decision must be given in writing," and the findings of fact and conclusions of law separately stated. Held that, though findings are required on all the material issues raised by the pleadings and evidence, it is not necessary that they should be in the exact language of the pleadings, or in any particular form. PATERSON and THORNTON, JJ., dissenting.

On rehearing. In bank. For opinion on hearing in department, see 21 Pac. Rep. 825.

R. B. Mitchell, for appellant. Manuel Eyre, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This is an action brought by the plaintiff, surviving wife of Eugene Alphonse Millard, deceased, to recover, as beneficiary, the amount of insurance or benefit certificate issued by defendant upon the life of the said Millard, deceased. The case was tried without a jury, and the court pronounced judgment in favor of plaintiff, and instructed her counsel to prepare findings. These were prepared accordingly, and adopted and signed by the presiding judge. A motion for a new trial was made by defendant, and was granted by the court, and from the order granting the new trial plaintiff appeals. The deceased was a member of Golden Council No. 118, a subordinate council of respondent. From the opinion of the court below, inserted in the brief of respondent, it appears that the court granted a new trial for the reason that the findings were defective; that is to say, although the judgment was apparently right, and although there is nothing to show that the court below thought it wrong, yet it was set aside because the findings (prepared after the court had reached its conclusions, and having nothing whatever to do with the legal merits of the case) did not, in the opinion of the court, sufficiently state the grounds upon which the judgment rested. And, under the numerous decisions on the subject, the court might well have been in doubt as to the sufficiency of the findings in the case at bar, and is not to be criticised for its action. When the findings are inconsistent and contradictory, or when they show affirmatively that the judgment is wrong, then the question presented is usually a very simple one; but when the findings all tend to support the judgment, and the point raised is whether or not there is enough of them, then a question of great difficulty often arises.

What the Code says about findings is very brief. Section 632, Code Civil Proc., provides that, "upon the trial of a question of fact by the court, its decision must be given in writing;" and section 633 provides that "in giving the decision the facts found and the conclusions of law must be separately stated." This is practically all there is of it; and upon this little apex there has been built up (necessarily, no doubt) an inverted pyramid of legal decisions which over tops nearly every other monument of the law. Perhaps the very conciseness of the Code has been the cause of some of the difficulties which the subject has presented. It will be observed that the Code does not prescribe what or how many facts the findings must contain. Indeed, in the sections above quoted, the word "findings" is not used at all. The language is that the "decision" must be in writing, and that in the decision the facts and conclusions of law must be separately stated. One main object of the provision seems to have been to prevent a court from summarily ordering judgment without giving any reasons for it,—without stating any facts or legal conclusions upon which it is based. There was also, no doubt, some intent to facilitate the review of a judgment on appeal. But surely the main object was not to afford a cover under which a losing party might successfully set a trap to capture a just judgment. The findings come after the case has been tried, considered, and determined, and after the character of the judgment, whether it is right or wrong, has been fixed. They are merely incidental to the main thing,—the judgment; and to test their sufficiency by a standard which exacts the extreme of accurate statement and minute detail is to put the incident in the place of the principal. Of course, there ought to be findings on the material issues raised by the pleadings and evidence, but if it appear that there are, in substance, such findings, it is not necessary that they should be in the exact language of the pleadings, or in any particular form. Moreover, it is often difficult to determine whether a certain conclusion from specific facts found should be classified as a finding of "fact," or of "law;" and, as the court said in Burton v. Burton, 21 Pac. Rep. 847, "the mere fact that one finding was placed under the wrong heading would be a very feeble reason for the reversal of a judgment." In our opinion, applying the views above expressed, the findings in the case at bar were sufficiently full. There are four reasons given by the court below why the findings were insufficient, and we will examine them in the order in which they are stated.

1. When the benefit certificate was issued by respondent to said Millard, now deceased, one Sarah Alexandrina Millard, who was then his wife, was the beneficiary named therein. Afterwards he notified and directed the respondent, as he had a right to do under the rules of the order, to change the name of the beneficiary from said Sarah Alexandrina to "Nellie C. Millard," the appellant herein, who was then his wife. It is averred in the complaint, and denied in the answer, that at the time of said notification the deceased was a "member in good standing" in the order, and it is contended that there is no finding on this issue. There is no finding in those very words,—that is, that he was at the time "a member in good standing;" but, assuming for the present that the issue was material, there were facts found which showed him to be in such standing. There is no pretense that the deceased lost his standing in any way other than by delay in paying certain assessments. The findings show that the benefit certificate was issued to him on June 2, 1881, he then "having become a member of said order, and having complied with all its rules and regulations." Assessments were not levied at stated times, but irregularly, upon the death of a member; so that members could know of the levy of an assessment only by notice served on them. Deceased paid all assessments levied from June, 1881, to July 7, 1883, on which last-named day assessment No. 39 became delinquent. This and other subsequent assessments remained unpaid down to assessment No. 46, which became delinquent December 20, 1883; but no notice of such assessments was given to deceased until January 10, 1884. On the last-named date deceased was notified of said last assessment, No. 46; that he was suspended for not paying it; "and that he could be reinstated upon paying said assessment No. 46, in 30 days from said date, and that if not paid within that time he would have to be re-examined." Nothing was said about former assessments. Upon receiving said notice deceased, on the same day, (January 10, 1884,) paid said assessment No. 46, and all prior assessments due, and also assessment No. 47, which had been levied, but was not yet delinquent. The amounts of these assessments were received by respondent, and placed in its benefit fund. "On January 26, 1884, said Millard paid all dues to said Golden Council No. 118, to March 3, 1884, the amount being received by said council and duly placed in its treasury." On February 8, 1884, all assessments and dues having been paid, said deceased gave the notice of the change of beneficiary. "Said notice was in writing, signed by said Millard, attested by the secretary of said Golden Council No. 118, the seal of said council affixed, and was upon a blank furnished by defendant, and is in all respects in accordance with its laws, rules, and regulations." On February 13, 1884, the deceased also paid assessment No. 48, which was then levied, but not delinquent, and the amount paid was received by defendant and paid into its benefit fund. On February 22d plaintiff also paid assessment No. 49, levied before the death of said Millard, but not delinquent until March 17, 1884. There was only one meeting of the council in January, 1884, after deceased had paid assessment No. 46, and the previous assessments, at which meeting no action was taken in the matter of his reinstatement; but on February 13, 1884, the date of the next meeting, "at a meeting of said Council No. 118, the said Millard was duly and regularly reinstated in full membership in said council." On February 23, 1884, the said Millard died. All the above facts are found.

We think these findings sufficiently show that when the notice of change of beneficiary was given the deceased had complied with all the requirements of the order, and had such standing as entitled him to his rights, notwithstanding the fact that the council did not act on the case at the meeting in January, and did not make the formal order of reinstatement until February 13th. Moreover, the court expressly finds "that the notice of change in beneficiary in said benefit certificate was in all respects in accordance with the laws, rules, and regulations of said defendant;" and we do not think that the virtue of this latter finding is destroyed because it is placed under the heading, "Conclusions of Law." But, really, the question whether or not the deceased, in a strict literal sense, was in good standing at the time mentioned, was immaterial; because by levying the assessments Nos. 46, 47, 48, and 49, and by receiving the amounts of those assessments, as well as the amounts of the prior assessments then remaining unpaid, and retaining the moneys paid thereon, and placing them in its treasury and benefit fund, the respondent waived any forfeiture that might have been insisted on, and became liable for the amount of the certificate. In Erdmann v. Insurance Co., 44 Wis. 376, a case very similar to the case at bar, the court says (we quote from the syllabus, which is a correct condensation of the decision) as follows: "(1) There is nothing in the charter or constitution of the defendant which renders inapplicable to it the doctrine of waiver applicable to other insurance companies. (2) Forfeitures are not favored in the law; and the benevolent object of the order for whose benefit the defendant company was organized, with the provisions of defendant's constitution and by-laws indicating a purpose to mitigate forfeitures, require the court to lay hold of any act showing an intention of defendant to waive the forfeiture in this case. (3) The right to payment of a certain sum by defendant as insurance on a life was forfeited in case the assured, at his death, had not paid all assessments; but after his death all assessments against him were paid for him in pursuance of authority granted and a request made during his life-time, and were by his lodge (which was defendant's agent for that purpose) received and forwarded to defendant, and by it accepted and retained until after commencement of this suit, with knowledge of the death of the assured on the part of the lodge and the defendant at the times of such receipt and acceptance. Held, that the forfeiture was waived." In Bailey v. Association, 27 N. W. Rep. 771, the supreme court of Iowa say: "(2) As to whether there was a default by the deceased in the payment of an assessment we need not determine. There was evidence tending to show that before the death of the deceased the company received the amount of the assessment. The court below, we may presume, so found, and the evidence was sufficient to sustain the finding. It is, to be sure, insisted by the defendant that the money was demanded and received by mistake, the real intention being to regard the certificate as forfeited. But we do not think that such mistake, if made, could be regarded as material. The defendant received and held the money until after the death of the deceased, and he had a right to regard the contract as in force, regardless of any intention of the defendant to the contrary." See, also, Tobin v. Society, 33 N. W. Rep. 663; Osterloh v. Insurance Co., 60 Wis. 126, 18 N. W. Rep. 749; Stylow v. Insurance Co., 34 N. W. Rep. 151; McDonald v. Supreme Council, 20 Pac. Rep. 41.

2. The second reason given is that "the findings are furthermore defective in omitting to respond to the denials contained in the answer in reference to the several suspensions by the order of the membership of the deceased." But the real facts about that matter are found. It is not averred in the answer, or pretended by respondent, that the deceased was ever suspended in any way, except so far as his delay in paying certain assessments (hereinbefore referred to) operated, ipso facto, to suspend him. And all the facts as to the delay in paying said assessments, and their subsequent payment and receipt by respondent, are specifically found. There is no averment or claim that the council of deceased ever suspended him, or took any steps in that direction, until the notice of January 10, 1884, when all assessments levied were immediately paid. From an examination of such parts of the constitution and regulations of the respondent as appear in the transcript, we are disposed to think that here, as in McDonald v. Supreme Council, supra, a legal suspension could be effected only by action taken in open council; but, however that may be, it is clear, from the authorities above cited, that any effect which such delay in payment might have had was waived by the subsequent conduct of respondent, as hereinbefore stated. We think, therefore, that all that was material on the point was found.

3. The third objection seems to be the want of a finding that deceased at the time of his death was "a member in good standing in said order." But all the facts showing such standing were found; and, moreover, there is a finding in these words: "That at the time of the death of said Millard he was a member in good standing in said order, had complied with all the rules, regulations, laws, and requirements of said order, and all conditions of said benefit certificate." If this finding had been placed a few sentences above the place it occupies, it would probably have been considered full enough for all purposes. It is placed, however, in the category of "conclusions of law." But the character of a thing does not depend upon the name given it.

4. A fourth objection to the sufficiency of the findings is suggested, rather than positively stated, and that is that there is no finding as to the satisfactory proof of Millard's death. The finding on this subject is: "That at the first meeting of Golden Council No. 118, subsequent to the death of the said Millard, to-wit, February 27, 1884, said council was notified of the death of said Millard." This is an extremely technical point, for there is no doubt intimated as to the death of Millard. It is averred, is not denied, and is found by the court; and there is no qualification in the certificate as to the manner of death,—no reservation against even suicide. There should, therefore, be no leaning towards this defense; it should be clear and certain. But, in the first place, there is no provision, either in the certificate, or in the by-laws of the order, that the beneficiary shall furnish proof of the death. The supreme council seems to act almost entirely through the subordinate councils. The certificate recites that Millard is "a member of Golden Council No. 118, A. L. H., located at San Francisco, Cal.," and that it is issued "upon evidence received from said council that said companion is a sixth degree contributor," etc.; and a main condition is that "said companion complies in the future with the laws, rules, and regulations now governing said council;" and the condition as to death is, simply, "upon satisfactory evidence of the death of said companion." And section 3 of law 1 is as follows: "On the death of a member who at the time of his death shall not be under suspension for non-payment of benefit assessments the council shall appoint a committee to ascertain the cause of death, and the circumstances attending the same. The report of said committee, and the proof of the death, shall be forwarded to the supreme secretary by the commander and secretary, under the seal of the council, together with an official notice of such death, in accordance with a form furnished by the supreme secretary. Such notice must state the name, age at the date of initiation, the date and cause of death, and the amount paid into benefit fund, and number of degree. Further proof of such death may be required, if deemed necessary by the supreme commander." It is evident, therefore, that the evidence of death was to be furnished to the supreme council by the council of which deceased was a member, and a finding that the plaintiff did or did not furnish such proof to respondent would have been immaterial. And, again, respondent denied all liability upon the certificate, and in such a case the general rule is that the preliminary proof is waived. We think, therefore, that a new trial should not have been granted for the alleged defect in the findings on this point.

We have thus reviewed the grounds upon which, as respondent shows, the court below granted the new trial. Under the circumstances we do not feel called upon to notice, in detail, other points made by respondent. We will say, however, that we have carefully examined the record, and think that the evidence supports the findings, and that the transcript shows no material errors. The order granting a new trial is reversed.

We concur: BEATTY, C. J.; FOX, J.; WORKS, J.; SHARPSTEIN, J.

PATERSON, J. I concur in the judgment, on the ground that the findings are sufficient to support the judgment, and the evidence is without conflict; but I do not think that we can look at the opinion of the learned judge of the court below. It is no part of the record in this case. Even if it had been made a part of the transcript, it would be stricken out on motion. We have so decided in a recent case.

THORNTON, J. I concur in the judgment, but differ toto cœlo as to the dicta in relation to findings of facts. I consider the provision in the Code of Civil Procedure as to the finding of facts one of the most valuable in our practice, and one which should be enforced as other laws. They are binding on this and all other courts, as are all other statutes, and their enforcement cannot be evaded.

INSOLVENCY—DISCHARGE.

1. An application by an insolvent for a discharge from his debts was opposed by certain creditors on the ground of a fraudulent preference of one creditor to the extent of $1,000. The insolvent denied having paid him anything but $500, which he alleged was paid in good faith, on a debt which he had owed him, and introduced in evidence, and rested on, the pleadings in the proceeding adjudging him to be an insolvent. The petition therein alleged that the insolvent, by making a payment of $1,000 to a creditor, had committed an act of insolvency, but did not allege fraud; and the answer denied having made a payment of $1,000, or any greater sum than $500, to such creditor, and was supported by affidavit, as required by the Insolvent Act Cal. § 49, that respondent had not done, suffered, or been privy to anything specified in the act as ground for withholding or invalidating his discharge. Held, that a direction of a verdict against the insolvent was unwarranted, as the burden of proving such fraud as would bar the insolvent's discharge was on the contestants.

2. The affidavit made by the insolvent in the proceedings to adjudge him insolvent is admissible to show compliance with the insolvent act.

3. Under section 48, which authorizes the insolvent to apply for a discharge at any time after the expiration of three months from the adjudication of insolvency, his discharge will not be delayed by the failure of an assignee to qualify, where the creditors failed to appear at the time designated by the court for choosing one.

4. As the answers denied all the allegations of fraud, it was proper to refuse to instruct that the insolvent, under the pleadings, had admitted that when he was insolvent, and in contemplation thereof, he paid a certain creditor $500; and that if he did so to prevent the money from reaching the assignee, or from being distributed under the insolvent act, he is not entitled to a discharge.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Monterey county; JOHN K. ALEXANDER, Judge.

N. A. Dorn and William M. R. Parker, for appellants. Geil & Morehouse, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. C. The material facts of this case are as follows: On the 18th day of May, 1883, certain creditors of James H. Harris filed in the superior court of Monterey county a petition asking that he be adjudged an insolvent. The petition alleged, among other things, "that the respondent has committed an act of insolvency, in that he did heretofore, to-wit, on or about the 30th day of March, 1883, being insolvent, and in contemplation of insolvency, * * * make a payment and transfer of property, consisting of money, to the amount of about $1,000, then and there belonging to said respondent, unto one Charles Harris, brother to said respondent." Harris filed an answer to the petition, in which he denied "that on the 30th day of March, 1883, or at any other time, he, the said Harris, made a payment of $1,000, or any greater sum than $500, to Charles Harris." The court made an order adjudging Harris to be an insolvent debtor, and directing the sheriff of the county to take possession of all his estate, real and personal, except such as was by law exempt from execution, and of all his deeds, vouchers, books of account, and papers, and to keep the same safely until the appointment of an assignee. The court also by its order appointed a time and place for the creditors to meet and prove their debts, and choose one or more assignees of the estate. Due notice of this order was published, but at the time and place appointed none of the creditors appeared. Thereupon the court made an order appointing one Graves assignee of the estate, and fixing the amount of his bond; but he never accepted the place or qualified, and no assignee was ever thereafter appointed. Subsequently, and more than three months after the adjudication of insolvency, Harris applied to the court for a discharge from his debts. Three of his creditors opposed his discharge, and filed specifications, in writing, of the grounds of their opposition. One of these specifications was, in substance, that on or about the 30th of March, 1883, Harris made a fraudulent payment of $1,000 to one Charles Harris, who was then his creditor, and that Harris was then insolvent, and in contemplation of insolvency, and made the payment for the purpose of preferring Charles Harris, and preventing the money from going into the hands of an assignee, and being distributed, under the insolvent act, in satisfaction of his debts. By his answer, Harris denied that he paid Charles Harris the sum of $1,000, or any sum of money whatever, on the 30th day of March, 1883, or that he ever made any payment to him fraudulently, or in contemplation of insolvency, or for the purpose of preferring him as a creditor, or for the purpose of preventing his property from going into the hands of an assignee, and being distributed, under the insolvent act, in satisfaction of his debts, but averred that on the 10th day of March, 1883, Charles Harris was his creditor for the sum of $500, and no more, and was about to leave the state; that on that day he paid him the said sum of $500 in satisfaction of his debt, and that the payment was made in good faith, and in the ordinary course of business, and without any view of preferring him as a creditor, or with any design of, view of, or contemplation of, insolvency. Upon the issues raised by these pleadings the matter was tried before a jury; and, under the order of the court, Harris commenced the trial by offering in evidence the petition of the creditors that he be adjudged insolvent, his answer thereto, and all the orders and papers made and filed in the case up to that time. Among the papers so offered was the affidavit of the insolvent, required by section 49 of the insolvent act, that he had not done, suffered, or been privy to any act, matter, or thing specified in the act, as ground for withholding his discharge, or as invalidating such discharge, if granted. The opposing creditors objected to this oath being received in evidence, on the ground that it had been prematurely filed, and was incompetent, and immaterial to show compliance with the insolvent law. The objection was overruled, and an exception reserved. Harris then rested his case, and the creditors moved the court that the jury be instructed to find against him, and that his discharge be denied, on the ground—First, that the petition of the creditors alleged that on or about the 30th of March, 1883, Harris, being insolvent and in contemplation of insolvency, made a fraudulent payment of $1,000 to Charles Harris, and the answer to the petition admitted the allegation to be true; second, that no assignee of the estate had ever qualified. The court denied the motion, and the creditors excepted to the ruling. The creditors then called Harris as a witness, and he testified, in effect, among other things, that he never knew that he was insolvent, or contemplated insolvency, until some time in April, 1883. At the conclusion of the testimony, the court instructed the jury very fully, and, as we think, correctly, upon the law of the case, but refused to give an instruction asked for by the creditors, which reads as follows: "The said James H. Harris has, under and by the pleadings in this case, admitted that on or about the 30th day of March, 1883, he, then being insolvent, and in contemplation of insolvency, did pay to one Charles Harris, his brother, the sum of $500. Now, if you find from the evidence in this case that he made said payment to his said brother as a creditor, or for the purpose of preventing the said $500 from coming into the hands of his assignee, or being distributed, under the insolvent act of this state, in satisfaction of his debts, then I charge you that the said James H. Harris is not entitled to a discharge under said act, and your verdict should be for contestants." By their verdict the jury found that Harris had not been guilty of fraud, and that he was entitled to be discharged from his debts; and thereupon the court entered judgment in his favor. The contesting creditors moved for a new trial, which was denied, and have appealed from the judgment and order.

1. We see no error in the admission in evidence of the insolvent's oath. The statute makes the taking and subscribing of such an oath by an insolvent debtor a condition precedent to his discharge, (Insolvent Act, § 49,) and the evident purpose of the requirement is to show to the court that the insolvent has not been guilty of any act which would prevent his obtaining a discharge, or render it invalid, if obtained. It must be proper, therefore, for an insolvent debtor to make the required oath when he applies for his discharge, and to introduce it in evidence to show the facts which it was intended to show.

2. The court properly denied the motion made by the creditors when Harris rested his case. They, in effect, asked that he be nonsuited; and yet they were the actors, and the burden was upon them to show that he had been guilty of some fraudulent act or omission which the statute made a barrier to his discharge. The original petition and answer thereto were intended only to put the respondent into involuntary insolvency, and they had served their purpose when that end was accomplished. Besides, the petition did not charge that the payment was made fraudulently, or for the purpose of preferring the payee, or of preventing the money from coming into the hands of the assignee, or of being distributed in satisfaction of the insolvent's debts; and the oath of the insolvent, which was in evidence, tended directly to negative these assumed facts.

The point that the application for a discharge was premature, because no assignee had qualified, is without merit. The appointment of an assignee rests with the court and creditors. The debtor has nothing to do with it. The creditors failed to appear at the time fixed for the appointment of an assignee; but this was not the fault of the respondent, and his discharge could not be hindered or delayed thereby The statute authorizes the debtor to apply to the court for a discharge from his debts at any time after the expiration of three months from the adjudication of insolvency, and there are no limitations or restrictions on his doing so. Insolvent Law, § 48.

3. The instruction which was asked by the creditors and refused by the court was misleading and erroneous. The statement that "the said James H. Harris has, under and by the pleadings in this case, admitted," etc., was not true. The pleadings in the case consisted of the specifications by the creditors of the grounds of their opposition to the discharge, and the answer of the respondent thereto; and this answer, as we have seen, fully denied all of the averments of fraud made in the specifications. The refusal to give the instruction was therefore proper.

4. There was testimony which, if believed, justified the verdict of the jury. It tended to show that the settlement with Carr was made before the respondent knew that he was insolvent, or contemplated insolvency. It also tended to show that the value of the accounts which were assigned by respondent to his attorney for the purpose of paying the expenses of the insolvency proceedings was not unreasonably large; and if this be so, it is admitted that the assignment was properly made, and that the creditors have no cause of complaint on account of it.

Looking, then, at the whole case, we see no prejudicial error, and therefore advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNE, C.; FOOTE, C.

In re CALIFORNIA MUT. LIFE INS. CO. (No. 12,929.)

MUTUAL INSURANCE COMPANIES—INSOLVENCY—STOCKHOLDERS.

1. Act Cal. April 2, 1866, relating to the incorporation of mutual insurance companies, provides (sections 8 and 9) that no company organized under the act shall transact business until it shall have obtained a guaranty fund of at least $250,000, which shall consist of the notes of solvent parties, payable to the company as prescribed by its directors, for the better security of the company's dealers, and shall be assets, liable for all its debts, next after the assets arising from premiums and other sources, exclusive of the capital stock, until the profits, together with the capital stock, shall equal the aggregate of the original guaranty fund, and the capital stock. Section 17 provides that each stockholder shall be personally liable for the debts of the company in the proportion which the stock owned by him bears to the whole amount. Held, that the claims of the stockholders of an insolvent company, organized under the act, for moneys paid by them as stockholders on matured policies, are payable out of the general assets, and not out of such guaranty fund.

2. The stockholders may join in an appeal from an adjudication on such claims.

Vincent Neale and Cope & Boyd, for appellants. Doyle, Galpin & Scripture and John H. Brewer, for respondents.

WORKS, J. Insolvent proceedings under the insolvent act of 1880. The California Mutual Life Insurance Company was organized under the act of April 2, 1866, entitled "An act to provide for the incorporation of mutual insurance companies, for the insurance of life and health and against accident." St. 1866, p. 752. In March, 1885, the corporation was regularly adjudged to be an insolvent debtor by the superior court of San Francisco; and in April following S. Prentiss Smith was elected and appointed assignee. Pursuant to notice, given as required by law, a large number of claims against the company were presented to the assignee, and among them the claim of Charles Baum and 15 others, who are the appellants here. These claims, amounting to over $5,000, were disputed by the insolvent and by the assignee, on the ground that they were for moneys paid by the appellants, as stockholders of the corporation, on account of matured policies of insurance, and as original debtors, and not as guarantors. On the trial the alleged ground of the objection to these claims was found to be true; yet the court found and adjudged the claims to be valid claims against the insolvent, but payable only out of what the court denominated the "general assets," as distinguished from and exclusive of the "guaranty fund," consisting of the "guaranty notes," made to the company as required by said act. Sections 8 and 9. What were thus called the "general assets" consisted only of a claim of the insolvent against the Republic Life Insurance Company of Illinois, which claim was unavailable, and of no apparent value, by reason of the insolvency of the last-named company. The "guaranty fund" consisted of promissory notes of solvent persons, made payable to the order of the insolvent five days after demand, according to section 9 of said act, amounting to about $140,000, and immediately available for more than $100,000, while the allowed debts of the insolvent, including those due the appellants, were found not to exceed $35,000. If, therefore, the "guaranty fund" was properly applicable to the payment of all the debts allowed by the court, the corporation would appear to have been solvent. But no objection is made to the adjudication of insolvency; and it is admitted by appellants that the petition states facts sufficient to give the court jurisdiction of the matter.

It is contended by counsel for the respondents, the assignee and note makers, in their brief, that the appeal should be dismissed on the ground that the appellants, "having no joint interest or right," joined in their notice of appeal. It is manifest, however, that the appellants have a common interest in having the decree modified in all respects prayed for by them, in the same manner, and to the same extent. Their rights and claims are of the same kind, and they are all aggrieved in the same way, and by the same portions of the decree appealed from. It would be a matter of great inconvenience and additional expense, without any corresponding compensation, to require 16 separate appeals in this case; and it seems to us that they are not required by the Code of Civil Procedure or by the insolvent act.

The counsel for appellants further contend that the guaranty fund was lawfully applicable to the payment of their claims which had been allowed by the court, and that the court erred in refusing to so apply it. Counsel for respondents deny this, and contend that the guaranty fund was not designed for the benefit of the corporation or its shareholders, but only for the benefit of the public dealing with the corporation. The eighth section of the act under which this corporation was organized, among other things, provides that "every company formed under this act shall have a capital stock of not less than $100,000. It shall not make any insurance upon any risk, or transact any other business in section 1 mentioned, until its capital stock shall have been fully paid up in cash, and until it shall have also obtained a fund, to be known as a 'guaranty fund,' of not less than $250,000, as is hereinafter provided." Section 9 provides that "the guaranty fund mentioned in section 8 shall consist of promissory notes of solvent parties, approved of by the board of directors and by each other. Such notes shall be payable to the company, or its order, and at such time or times, in such modes, and such sums, with or without interest, and shall be in all other respects, as the board of directors shall prescribe; but the amount of the note or notes given by any one person shall not exceed in the whole the sum of $5,000, exclusive of interest. Such notes shall be payable absolutely, and at all events, at the company's option, shall be negotiable, and may be indorsed and transferred or converted into cash, or otherwise dealt with by the company, at its discretion, without reference to any contingency of losses, expenses, or otherwise. Such notes, or the proceeds thereof, shall remain with the company, as a fund for the better security of its dealers, and shall be assets of the company, liable for all its debts, obligations, and indebtedness, next after its assets from premiums and other sources, exclusive of capital stock, until the net earnings of the company, over and above its expenses, losses, and liabilities, shall have accumulated in cash or securities in which the net earnings have been invested to a sum which, with the capital stock, shall be equal to the aggregate of the original amounts of the guaranty fund and of the capital stock; and thereupon the said sum, with the capital stock, shall become and remain the fixed capital of the company, not subject to division among the stockholders or parties dealing with the company, or to be expended in any manner otherwise, except when required in payment of the company's debts and actual expenses, until the business of the company shall have been closed, its debts paid, and its outstanding policies and obligations of every kind canceled or provided for; and if, from any cause, a deficiency shall at any time occur in such fixed capital, no further division of profits shall take place until such deficiency shall have been made up." The seventeenth section of the act provides: "Each stockholder of the company shall be individually and personally liable for such proportion of all its debts and liabilities as the amount of its capital stock owned by him bears to the whole of such capital stock." It does not appear that the amount of fixed capital stock, as provided in section 9, was ever obtained or declared as provided in section 10, so as to discharge the guaranty fund, or to allow the guaranty notes to be withdrawn; and the court finds that all of said 50 notes except 5 have come into the hands of the assignee; and as a conclusion of law finds "that the aforesaid guaranty notes are assets of the said insolvent, liable to be called in, so far as necessary, for the payment of debts to holders of policies, but not so liable for payment to its stockholders for moneys contributed or paid by them on account of debts due by the said company, by reason of their liabilities as such stockholders;" and further finds as a conclusion of law that the claims of the appellants for moneys paid by them as stockholders, "and because of their liability as such, are valid, * * * and are established and allowed against it, so far forth, however, only as to be payable out of the aforesaid general assets of said company, and not out of any moneys derived from the said guaranty notes, or the proceeds or the makers thereof." The judgment of the court below was clearly right. The corporation and its stockholders are primarily liable for the company's debts. Morrow v. Superior Court, 64 Cal. 383, 1 Pac. Rep. 354. The parties who executed the guaranty notes are the sureties of the company and its stockholders for the payment of these debts, and cannot be held liable, as between them and the stockholders, for the amounts paid by the latter on their own debts. To hold otherwise would be to allow a principal to pay his own debt, and then recover it back from his surety. Section 9 of the statute referred to contains a general provision that this guaranty fund shall be liable for all of the debts of the company; but this must be construed to apply to debts due from the company to parties dealing with it, and not to the right of a stockholder to recover from the corporation moneys advanced by him for the debts of the corporation. This is apparent from the fact that the provision referred to was for the protection of persons dealing with the company, and not for the protection of its stockholders, who are expressly made personally and individually liable for such proportion of the debts of the company as the amount of its capital stock owned by them bears to the whole of such capital stock. The guaranty fund provided for by the statute is an additional security to parties, over and above the liability of the company and its stockholders; and, as between the makers of these notes and the company and its stockholders, the money paid by the stockholders cannot be made a charge upon such guarantors. Judgment affirmed.

Scott v. Wood. (No. 11,894.)

CONTRACTS—EVIDENCE—BURDEN OF PROOF—INSTRUCTIONS—APPEAL.

1. In an action for several years' wages at $250 a month, the answer averred affirmatively that some time after plaintiff commenced work there was an agreement with him for $200 a month; the court instructed the jury that as defendant had admitted the length of plaintiff's employment, and that it commenced at $250 a month, "the burden of proof is on defendant to show" an agreement to change the amount of compensation; and that, unless such agreement was established "by a preponderance of testimony," the verdict must be for plaintiff. Held, that the instruction was error, as the issue raised by the pleadings was whether the contract was, for a part of the time, at $200 or $250, and the burden of proving his claim was on plaintiff; the most that could be required of defendant being that he meet any prima facie case made by plaintiff, for which purpose a preponderance of testimony was not necessary. BEATTY, C. J., and PATERSON, J., dissenting.

2. Instruction that "when a fact is once shown to exist the law presumes it to continue until the contrary is shown" is error, as it is presumed to continue only "as long as is usual with things of that nature."

3. Where there is no error in an instruction, but it is not as specific as desired by one of the parties, a request for more specific instruction should be made.

4. Counsel should not be permitted to argue to a jury that an offer to pay a certain sum in settlement of a demand is an admission that something is due, as Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 2078, expressly provides that "an offer to compromise is not an admission that anything is due."

5. Notice of intention to move for a new trial need not be made part of the record on appeal. Pico v. Cohn, 20 Pac. Rep. 706.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; WALTER H. LEVY, Judge.

Horace W. Philbrook, for appellant. G. E. Harpman, for respondent.

HAYNE, C. This action was brought to recover under a contract between the plaintiff and the firm of Hobart, Wood & Co., for services as salesman. Pending the action Hobart died, and the case was continued against Wood as surviving partner. The plaintiff had a verdict, and the defendant Wood appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying a new trial.

The respondent makes a preliminary objection to the record on appeal from the order denying a new trial, upon the ground that it does not show a notice of intention. This objection must be disallowed, upon the authority of Pico v. Cohn, 20 Pac. Rep. 706, which overrules the cases relied upon. Besides this, the points made can be considered on appeal from the judgment, and the statement used on the motion for a new trial is a record on appeal from the judgment. Code Civil Proc. § 950; Craig v. Fry, 68 Cal. 364, 9 Pac. Rep. 550. There are several errors which require a reversal of the judgment.

1. The recovery sought was for services which continued for several years. The complaint alleges that "on or about the 3d day of July, 1869, at the city and county of San Francisco, said defendants employed plaintiff as a salesman, and agreed to pay plaintiff for such services the sum of $250 per month; that under said employment and agreement the plaintiff entered into the services of the defendants on said 3d day of July, 1869, and from that time forward continued in their service under said employment, without intermission, until the 1st of April, 1885; that during all of said time the plaintiff was actively and continuously performing services for the defendants, as their salesman, under said contract of employment." The complaint further alleged that there was a balance due to plaintiff on account of said services of $755.78, which remained unpaid. The answer averred affirmatively that about the beginning of 1870 it was agreed that the salary should be $200 a month, and denied "that at any time subsequent to the agreement last herein aforesaid there was or existed any agreement of defendants to pay plaintiff for said services any greater sum than $200 per month," and denied that anything remained unpaid. The case turned upon the question whether during a portion of the period in which the defendant rendered services, his salary was $200 or $250 per month. Upon this question the evidence was conflicting. The defendant testified that the salary had been fixed at $200 a month, in the beginning of 1870, and the plaintiff testified that it had not. The court instructed the jury in relation to the matter as follows: "The jury are instructed that the defendants admit employing the plaintiff on July 3, 1869, at the rate of $250 per month, and that he worked for them continuously until the 1st day of April, 1885; and that the burden of proof is upon the defendants to show that plaintiff's compensation was changed; that, unless the defendants establish by a preponderance of testimony that plaintiff in 1870, or at some other time, agreed to work for the defendants during the years 1870 and 1871 at the monthly compensation of $200, then they must find for the plaintiff." This was excepted to, and is specified as error. We think that the court erred in telling the jury that the defendant was required to have a preponderance of testimony upon the question mentioned. The term "burden of proof" is used in different senses. Sometimes it is used to signify the burden of making or meeting a prima facie case, and sometimes the burden of producing a preponderance of evidence. These burdens are often on the same party. But this is not necessarily or always the case. And it is by no means safe to infer that because a party has the burden of meeting a prima facie case, therefore he must have a preponderance of evidence. It may be sufficient for him to produce just enough evidence to counter-balance the evidence adduced against him. This is illustrated by a very common case. Suppose that, upon an issue as to the performance of a contract sued upon, the plaintiff should testify to facts showing non-performance. "In such case, if the defendant produced no evidence, the plaintiff must prevail. This is often expressed by saying that the burden has shifted to the defendant. And so it has, in one sense. But suppose that the defendant should take the stand and deny the truth of the facts testified to by the plaintiff, oath being opposed against oath." Would it be correct to say that the defendant must have a preponderance of evidence? It most certainly would not; and this though the burden of proof had been transferred to him. Nor would it be correct to say that the burden had "shifted back" to the plaintiff, if the burden of producing a preponderance of evidence was meant; for that never was on the defendant. The two burdens are distinct things. One may shift back and forth with the ebb and flow of the testimony. The other remains with the party upon whom it is cast by the pleadings; that is to say, with the party who has the affirmative of the issue.

The distinction is illustrated by the case of People v. Bushton, 22 Pac. Rep. 127. There it was held that while, if the prosecution proved a prima facie case, the burden is upon the defendant to produce evidence tending to show a defense, yet that when this was done the rule that guilt must be proved beyond a reasonable doubt applied to every part of the case, and consequently that if the evidence of the defendant raised a reasonable doubt he was entitled to an acquittal. And the distinction has been expressly recognized in other states. In Bridge Corp. v. Butler, the supreme court of Massachusetts, per BIGELOW, J., said: "The burden of proof and the weight of evidence are two very different things. The former remains on the party affirming a fact in support of his case, and does not change in any aspect of the cause; the latter shifts from side to side in the progress of a trial, according to the nature and strength of the proofs offered in support or denial of the main fact to be established." 2 Gray, 132. So, in Heinemann v. Heard, the court of appeals of New York, per CHURCH, C. J., said: "During the progress of a trial, it often happens that a party gives evidence tending to establish his allegation,—sufficient, it may be, to establish it prima facie; and it is sometimes said the burden of proof is then shifted. All that is meant by this is that there is a necessity of evidence to answer the prima facie case, or it will prevail; but the burden of maintaining the affirmative of the issue involved in the action is upon the party alleging the fact which constitutes the issue, and this burden remains throughout the trial." 62 N Y. 455. And so in other cases. See Clark v. Hills, 67 Tex. 141, 2 S. W. Rep. 356; Atkinson v. Transportation Co., 69 Wis. 13 et seq., 31 N. W. Rep. 164; Powers v. Russell, 13 Pick. 76; Morgan v. Morse, 13 Gray, 152; Nichols v. Munsel, 115 Mass. 567; Tarbox v. Steamboat Co., 50 Me. 345; Small v Clewley, 62 Me. 157; Shepardson v. Perkins, 60 N. H. 77; Blodgett v. Cummings, Id. 116; Bank v. Doyle, 9 R. I. 78; Bank v. Seymour, 64 Mich. 72, 31 N. W. Rep. 140. In the present case, we think that the learned judge of the trial court fell into error from overlooking the distinction above pointed out. Why was the defendant required to have a preponderance of evidence? Did he have the affirmative of the issue? We think not. The plaintiff had received money sufficient to discharge his claim, if the rate of wages was $200 a month. His position was that the rate was $250 a month. It was necessary to his case that the continuance of the latter rate through the period claimed, or some part of it, should be established. If that rate did not so continue, he could not recover. The continuance of the higher rate being an essential fact in his case, the rules of pleading required him to allege it in his complaint. If he had alleged it categorically, and the defendant had denied it explicitly, it would have been entirely clear that the plaintiff had the affirmative of the issue. If anything further than the mere statement of such pleadings be required to show this, it is found in the test ordinarily used, and said to be conclusive, and embodied in our statute, viz., which side would be successful, if no evidence at all were introduced? See 1 Best, Ev. (Morgan's Ed.) § 268; 1 Phil. Ev. (4th Amer. Ed.) 812; Code Civil Proc. § 1981. Now the pleadings here are in substance the same as above stated; and it is the substance which must control on this question and not the mere form. 1 Greenl. Ev. (13th Ed.) § 74; 1 Best, Ev. (Morgan's Ed.) § 272. If the complaint be defective, the defects may, in view of the absence of a special demurrer, be overlooked. But the plaintiff is in no better position than he would be in had the pleading been free from defect. The complaint was not drawn with absolute precision. It alleged that the defendants employed the plaintiff at $250 per month, and that plaintiff "continued in their service under said employment" for a certain time, and rendered services "under said contract of employment." But it does not allege that it was agreed that the rate of wages at which the services commenced was to continue throughout the whole period, and it does not state categorically that said rate did so continue. And it might, perhaps, be argued that the phrase "under said employment" was somewhat uncertain in meaning. But we treat the complaint as sufficiently alleging that the rate did in fact continue as it commenced. This essential allegation was put in issue by the answer. It averred affirmatively a different agreement, made shortly after the one stated in the complaint, and denied that there was any subsequent agreement. This was sufficient to raise an issue as to the continuance of the rate alleged. The fact that the traverse was affirmative, and not purely negative, in form did not destroy its force nor change its essential nature.

Frisch v. Caler, 21 Cal. 75; Murphy v. Napa Co., 20 Cal. 497; Woodworth v. Knowlton, 22 Cal. 168; Gilman v. Bootz, 63 Cal. 120. The issue, though lamely made up, was the same, in substance, as if it had been made up with absolute precision. The only possible theory upon which it could be claimed that the pleadings cast the affirmative upon the defendants is that the answer admits that the rate commenced at $250, and that it must be inferred that it continued unchanged. But, as above shown, its continuance is put in issue. As a matter of evidence, it may be true that the continuance of the rate was to be inferred, in the absence of any evidence to the contrary. But when evidence to the contrary was adduced, there was no reason for saying that the defendant must have a preponderance of testimony. So to say is to overlook the distinction between the burden of meeting a prima facie case and the burden of producing a preponderance of evidence.

2. The court instructed the jury that "when a fact is once shown to exist the law presumes it to continue until the contrary is shown." This was excepted to, and was specified as error. We think that it was error. There is no such presumption, regardless of the nature of the fact. Suppose that a man was shown to be living at a certain time. Would it be presumed that he continued to live for 100 years? Or suppose that a man was shown to be insolvent at a particular time. Would it be presumed that the insolvency continued through several years? In Coghill v. Boring, 15 Cal. 219, the court, per BALDWIN, J., said: "It does not follow, because a man is insolvent on one day, that he was insolvent at any subsequent or antecedent period." The true rule, and the one established by the Code, is that the presumption is that "a thing once proved to exist continues as long as is usual with things of that nature." Code Civil Proc. § 1963, subd. 32; and compare Lux v. Haggin, 69 Cal. 418, 10 Pac. Rep. 674. In view of the evidence, the effect of the instruction was that the court told the jury that they must find that the rate of wages continued through several years at $250 per month, unless there was evidence to the contrary. But we do not think that the employment of a salesman at $250 per month is a thing of such a nature that the court can say, as a matter of law, that it continued for several years unless the contrary was proved. The continuance of the employment at the rate mentioned might be inferred as a fact by the jury, under the circumstances, but under our system the court is not allowed to instruct the jury as to what inference of fact they are to draw. Stone v. Mining Co., 52 Cal. 318; McNeil v. Barney, 51 Cal. 604; People v. Walden, Id. 589.

3. As the case must go back for a retrial on account of the errors above noticed, there are several observations which we think should be made. It was probably error for the court to allow the plaintiff's counsel to argue to the jury, against the protest of the defendant, that the offer of one of the then partners to pay a certain sum and counsel fees in settlement of the claim was an admission that something was due. It is true that the testimony as to the offer came in without objection; but the statute expressly says that "an offer to compromise is not an admission that anything is due." Code Civil Proc. § 2078. The failure to object to the admission of evidence can hardly make that an admission which the law expressly declares is not so; and our impression is that the court ought not to have allowed counsel for plaintiff, against the protest of defendant, to argue that the offer was an admission. And it did not improve matters that the court told the jury, in substance, that they must disregard the offer, if they thought it was an offer to compromise, for that was a question for the determination of the court itself. But, as the question will probably not again arise, it is unnecessary to express a positive opinion in regard to it, further than to say that in our opinion the offer was an offer to compromise.

The instruction at folios 66, 67, requested by defendant, was not quite accurate. The conversation there detailed would not of itself have effected a change in the rate of wages. But if, after the conversation, the plaintiff remained in the employment, his remaining would be taken as an assent to the change of wages. This was probably the idea of the court in adding a clause to the instruction requested. The language of the modification, however, is perhaps not sufficiently clear, when taken in connection with what preceded it.

The instruction at folio 73 was correct. It might have been more specific as to what constituted an appropriation, (Civil Code, § 1479, subd. 1,) but, if the defendant desired to have it more specific, he should have requested an instruction on that point. We advise that the judgment and order appealed from be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; FOOTE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order appealed from are reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

THORNTON, J., (concurring.) I concur in the judgment of reversal, but on the sole ground that the court erred in refusing to permit testimony of the witness Wood as to Hobart's state of mind on the days just previous to and just preceding the day of the conversation with Scott. See Estate of Toomes, 54 Cal. 516, and cases there cited. The above is the only error I can find in the record.

BEATTY, C. J., and PATERSON, J., (dissenting.) We dissent. The two instructions quoted by Commissioner HAYNE may have been technically inaccurate; but, as applied to the point in controversy in this case, and as they must have been understood by the jury, they were scarcely erroneous,—certainly not injurious. It was agreed that plaintiff commenced work at $250 per month, and that he continued in his employment right along. In the absence of any evidence to the contrary, the presumption certainly would be that the rate of wages continued as it began; and, if the evidence as to a reduction of the rate while the employment continued was exactly in equilibrio, the finding should have been against such change. This was all the instructions could have been understood to mean, and in this sense they were not erroneous. The judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

MCCORMACK et al. v. SILSBY et al. (No. 13,212.)

QUIETING TITLE—ADVERSE POSSESSION—HOMESTEAD.

1. Where a purchaser of land, believing he has a good title, tells one who is in possession that he has bought the land, and demands possession, which is given without protest, and he thereafter continues in peaceable possession for more than five years, such possession is adverse, and he thereby acquires a title which he may have quieted in an action against the party in possession at the time of his purchase.

2. A homestead is extinguished by peaceable adverse possession for more than five years.

Gray & Sexton, for appellants. Park Henshaw, for respndents.

HAYNE, C. Suit to quiet title. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendants appeal. The paper title of the parties is in a sufficiently mangled condition. On December 27, 1877, W. H. Silsby and E. D. Silsby were tenants in common of the property. On that day W. H. Silsby made a deed to Carroll and Miller, in trust to secure certain indebtedness to the Pacific Mutual Life Insurance Company. It cannot be ascertained from the record whether this deed purported to be of the whole title, or only of the grantor's interest therein, nor can the terms and conditions of the trust be ascertained further than is above stated. In April, 1878, the trustees sold the property to the insurance company. It cannot be ascertained whether this sale was properly made by the trustees or not. It is found that "a deed was subsequently, on the 19th day of April, 1879, executed to said insurance company by said trustees, and they became the owners and succeeded to the interest of said W. H. Silsby in and to said lands." In October, 1879, the insurance company made a deed of all its right, title, and interest in the property to the plaintiffs. In September, 1878, (which was after the making of the trust-deed above mentioned,) W. H. and E. D. Silsby made a deed of the property to Falkner, Morehead, and Davis, as trustees for the benefit of creditors. In December, 1878, (which was after the last-mentioned deed,) E. D. Silsby, who was then residing with his family on the property, declared a homestead thereon. In June, 1887, E. D. Silsby died, and in December of the same year the surviving trustees, for the benefit of creditors, executed a reconveyance of the property to W. H. and E. D. Silsby, (which latter person was then dead,) reciting that the deed to them was inefficient by reason of the prior deed of trust to Carroll and Miller, and that the reconveyance was made "for the purpose of clearing the title." The action was commenced in 1888 against the widow and children of E. D. Silsby.

We do not deem it necessary to consider the effect of this paper title, for the reason that, in our opinion, the plaintiffs acquired a title by adverse possession. The court finds in this regard as follows: "That on the —— day of November, 1879, said plaintiffs ousted the said E. D. Silsby from said premises, and entered into the actual possession of all of said lands, claiming all interest therein, as their own and in their own right, exclusive, and they have, ever since said date last aforesaid, continuously, notoriousy, and openly occupied, used, and cultivated the said land, under a claim of title, as their own, exclusive of any other right or interest, and hostile to the said E. D. Silsby and all the world, and have paid all the taxes, state, county, and municipal, assessed against said land and premises since said date of October, 1879; and that they had and held said land, as just stated, for more than five years continuously, to-wit, from November, 1879, to June 10, 1887, prior to the death of the said E. D. Silsby."

We think that this finding is sustained by the evidence. It appears that the plaintiffs took their deed from the insurance company without any examination of the title, and supposed that they acquired the whole title. One of them says: "I do not know that I bought only half the ranch,—bought 320 acres, more or less. I did not examine the records, or have them examined. Took it upon their say so. When I got the deed from the insurance company I did not know that I was purchasing only one-half;" and the court finds this to be the fact. Acting under this beief, they went to E. D. Silsby, who was in possession of the property, "told Silsby we had bought the land," and demanded possession. The latter seems to have been in equal ignorance of the true state of the title. He made no assertion of any right to the property. Said "he was sorry he had not been able to keep the place for a home," delivered up the keys, asked for a short time in which to move off, and actually moved away within two weeks. It is not disputed that for eight years subsequent to this occurrence the plaintiffs were in the actual possession, claiming the property as their own, and that during all this time Silsby knew that they were so in possession, but asserted no claim on his part. That such a misapprehension occurred is conceded by the counsel for the appellants, who say: "Each party appears to have been laboring under a mistaken idea of his rights. Probably a like mistake all around never took place before and never will occur again." But such mistake does not prevent the possession of the plaintiffs from being adverse. It is not material to consider what was the character of the deed under which the plaintiffs entered. That could only be material upon the question of the nature of the claim asserted by plaintiffs, and of notice to Silsby of such claim. The plaintiffs informed the occupant, in so many words, that they had bought the whole property, and that he must go. He acquiesced in the claim, and went. It matters not whether the claim asserted by the plaintiffs was well or ill founded, or whether the occupant might have made successful resistance if he had attempted to do so. The intent of the plaintiffs to claim the land as their own, and to dispute the right of the occupant, was clearly manifested, (Bath v. Valdez, 70 Cal. 359, 11 Pac. Rep. 724;) and, this being so, knowledge of the actual state of the title was immaterial. There was certainly an ouster, and the subsequent possession was clearly adverse. Sneed v. Osborn, 25 Cal. 626; Grimm v. Curley, 43 Cal. 250. This adverse possession gave the plaintiffs a title which they were entitled to have quieted.

The question to which the learned counsel have addressed the main portion of their argument is as to the validity of the homestead, it being urged on one side, and denied on the other, that under the Code a homestead can be declared upon an undivided interest. But we do not think it necessary to express an opinion upon this question. Assuming that the homestead was valid at its inception, it was extinguished, not by abandonment, but by the adverse possession of plaintiffs. Mauldin v. Cox, 67 Cal. 387, 7 Pac. Rep. 804. We therefore advise that the judgment and order appealed from be affirmed.

We concur: FOOTE, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion judgment and order affirmed.

MOORE et al. v. LENT et al. (No. 12,095.)

CORPORATIONS—CAPITAL STOCK.

Civil Code Cal. § 309, prohibiting the directors of a corporation from creating debts "beyond their subscribed capital stock," under penalty of being individually liable therefor, applies to all the subscribed capital stock, whether paid in or not, and regardless of the disposition made of it; and the debts do not include capital stock paid for corporate property.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. F. SULLIVAN, Judge.

Action by C. W. Moore and others against W. M. Lent and others. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiffs' motion for a new trial denied, and they appeal.

James A. Waymire, for appellants. McAllister & Bergin, for respondents.

PATERSON, J. This action is based upon the following provision of the Code: "The directors of corporations must not * * * create debts beyond their subscribed capital stock. * * * For a violation of the provisions of this section, the directors under whose administration the same may have happened, except those who may have caused their dissent therefrom to be entered at large on the minutes of the directors at the time, or were not present when the same did happen, are, in their individual and private capacity, jointly and severally liable to the corporation, and to the creditors thereof, in the event of its dissolution, to the full amount of the * * * debt contracted."[1] The defendants were members of the board of directors of the South Mountain Consolidated Mining Company, a corporation organized under the laws of this state, and having a subscribed capital stock of $10,000,000, divided into 100,000 shares, all of which were issued as full-paid stock, in part payment of the mines and other property of the corporation. The officers of the corporation borrowed large sums of money from the plaintiffs, who were partners in a banking business at Silver City, Idaho. All of the moneys borrowed by the corporation were repaid to plaintiffs, except the sum of $46,953.50. In February, 1876, and while this amount remained unpaid, the corporation became insolvent. A petition in bankruptcy was filed in the United States district court at San Francisco, the usual assignment was made, and the plaintiffs duly proved and filed their claim, but never received any dividends; the receipts from sales having been consumed in the payment of dividends to preferred creditors. During the months of July and August, 1875, when the indebtedness to plaintiffs was created, the corporation was in debt about $200,000. The defendants were present at all meetings of the directors when the indebtedness was incurred, and none of them caused any dissent to be spread upon the minutes. The court found that "the debt alleged in the complaint was not, nor was any debt created by said corporation, beyond its subscribed capital stock." The court held that the defendants were not liable to the plaintiffs in any amount, and, judgment having been entered in their favor, plaintiffs moved for a new trial, which was denied. The appeal is from the order and from the judgment.

The principal controversy here is as to the proper construction of the words, "beyond the subscribed capital stock." Appellants contend that when the directors purchased the mines for $10,000,000, to be paid in stock, they created a debt of $10,000,000, and when they issued all the subscribed capital stock in payment of that debt they no longer had any subscribed capital stock, and every dollar of indebtedness subsequently created was a debt created "beyond the subscribed capital stock." It is conceded that both the property of a corporation and its subscribed capital stock are trust funds for the benefit of the creditors; but it is claimed that the legislature made, or intended to make, a distinction between capital, which may consist of property of an uncertain, speculative value, and subscribed capital stock, which is payable only in money, and has a fixed, definite value; that the directors can create debts so long as there is any subscribed capital stock, but, when that is once exhausted, all debts created are at the risk of the directors. It is urged that so long as the subscribed capital stock is not fully paid up the directors and the creditors know just how much the stockholders may be compelled to contribute for the payment of debts that may be created. It is contended by respondents that, under the provisions of the section quoted above, the directors cannot be made liable until after they have created a debt of $10,000,000; that when the mines were purchased and paid for the property took the place of the subscribed capital stock, at a valuation of $10,000,000. While such laws are to be commended, as in the interest of creditors and fair dealing, they are penal in their nature, and should be strictly construed,—at least, the liability should clearly appear. The language of the statute does not, we think, indicate an intention on the part of the legislature to make the distinction contended for by appellants, and stated above. The prohibition applies to all the subscribed capital stock, whether it has all been paid in, or only part of it, and regardless of the disposition which may have been made of it Thompson, in his Liability of Stockholders, (section 11,) says: "The capital stock of a corporation, which is subject to the operation of this rule, consists of all the stock for which the members have subscribed. Treating this stock as money, it is capable of subdivision into three funds: (1) Money which has been subscribed as a part of the capital stock, and paid in; (2) money thus subscribed, but not paid in; (3) money thus subscribed and paid in, but afterwards divided among the members before all the debts of the corporation are paid. The reason why the capital stock of a corporation is deemed to embrace all the stock for which the members have subscribed, whether paid in or not, is that, since the members are not in general personally liable for the debts of the corporation, this fund is the stake held out to the public, upon the faith of which the company obtains credit." The provision under consideration was designed to operate as a check upon directors, and protect creditors from the effects of corporate recklessness and extravagance. The subscribed capital stock is the fund upon which the transactions of the corporation are to be made. It is a guaranty to creditors that all obligations up to that amount will be met, and the intention of the legislature seems to have been to control the corporate power of the directors to contract beyond that amount, and to render them individually liable to creditors when they exceed it in the amount of debts. All of the acts prohibited by the statute are voluntary acts of the members of the board of directors. The debts referred to are manifestly debts created by voluntary act of the directors; and the capital stock of the company is not such a debt, because such stock must exist before corporate debts can be created. The prohibited debts are debts beyond the subscribed capital stock. They are ordinary, subsisting debts, in excess of the subscribed capital stock, and not the aggregate of the debts of the company, created during its entire corporate existence. It may be admitted that the true construction of the phrase under consideration is not very clear or satisfactory. As said in Irvine v. McKeon, 23 Cal. 474: "This statute provides for making one person individually liable for the debts of another, and prescribes how, and under what circumstances, he shall be held thus liable. Like other statutes which create a forfeiture or impose a penalty, it is to be strictly construed; and every intendment and presumption is in favor of the defendant in such cases." Although the rule of strict construction does not apply under the Code, as we feel bound to construe the statute, to render the defendants individually liable the corporation must have been indebted in an amount in excess of $10,000,000. It is not claimed here that such an indebtedness exists. It is claimed by appellants that the defendants are liable on their own theory, because the property—the mines and mills—must be taken at its actual value, which is less than $100,000. It is sufficient to say in answer to this that we have been unable to find anything in the record to show the value of the mine at the time it was taken, except the amount that was paid for it. The court found that the indebtedness alleged in the complaint was not beyond its subscribed capital stock. This finding is conclusive, considering the contention of the appellants to be sound,—a matter which we do not decide. Our construction of the language of the section quoted above renders it unnecessary for us to notice other points made by appellants. Judgment and order affirmed.

Demand Notes—Statute of Limitations.

A promissory note payable "on demand, after date," is due at once, without an actual demand, and the statute of limitations begins to run against it immediately.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; F. W. Lawler, Judge.

Action by John O'Neil, administrator of the estate of Margaret Mahoney, deceased, against Denis Magner. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals.

P. F. Dunne, for appellant. Sullivan & Sullivan, (Matt. I. Sullivan, of counsel,) for respondent.

Works, J. Action on the following promissory note: "$12,000. San Francisco, May

1, 1887. On demand, after date, for value received, I promise to pay Margaret Mahoney, or order, the sum of twelve thousand dollars, in United States gold coin. DENIS MAGNER." Defense, the statute of limitations. The action was commenced more than nine years after the date of the note. The only question in the case is as to the time when the note matured and the statute commenced to run. The court below held that the action was barred, and rendered judgment for the defendant. The appellant concedes that, if this is a note payable "on demand," the same matured immediately, and the statute had run. But it is contended that, as the note was made payable "on demand after date," it could not have matured at once, and that therefore an actual demand was necessary to put the statute in motion. The general rule is that a note payable on demand is due immediately, without an actual demand, and that the statute commences to run at once. Brummagim v. Tallant, 29 Cal. 506; Cousins v. Partridge, 79 Cal. 228, 21 Pac. Rep. 745; Story, Prom. Notes, § 29; Ang. Lim. § 59; Wood, Lim. § 124. The language used in the note under consideration does not take it out of this rule. In Hitchings v. Edmands, 132 Mass. 338, the court said: "The words 'on demand, after date' are more nearly analogous to such an expression as 'with interest after date.' If a promissory note, payable on demand, with interest after date, is paid the next day after it is given, one day's interest is due and payable. In the case at bar, the intention of the parties to the note was apparently that it should be payable immediately, and no intention appears on the face of the note that the parties intended to stipulate for at least one day's time before a demand could be made." So it was held that the note was "an ordinary demand note, payable at once, on demand, on which an action could have been brought immediately after it was given." Fenno v. Gay, 146 Mass. 118, 15 N. E. Rep. 87. These views apply to the note we are considering, and meet with our approval. Judgment affirmed.

ARNOLD v. CITY OF SAN JOSE. (No. 12,-277.)

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—DEFECTIVE STREETS.

A municipal corporation is not liable, in the absence of an express statutory provision imposing a liability, for personal injuries caused by its negligence in leaving a street out of repair, and there is no distinction between cases arising under charters making it the duty of the city, as such, to keep streets in repair, and those making it the duty of the city council to do so. Chope v. City of Eureka, 21 Pac. Rep. 364, followed.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Santa Clara county; D. BELDEN, Judge.

Action for personal injuries by James W. Arnold against the city of San Jose. A judgment was rendered on a verdict for plaintiff. Defendant was granted a new trial, and plaintiff appeals.

Crandall & Biddle and J. C. Black, for appellant. Wm. B. Hardy and D. W. Herrington, for respondent.

PATERSON, J. This is an action to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by plaintiff by falling into a ditch which defendant had excavated in one of its streets, and negligently left open during the night, without guards or lights to warn travelers of the danger. The cause of action is of the same nature as that which was set up in Chope v. City of Eureka, 78 Cal. 588, 21 Pac. Rep. 364, in which a majority of the court, in bank, held that the corporation, in the absence of a statutory provision imposing a liability, is not liable. In that case, as pointed out by Mr. Justice WORKS, "the obstruction of the street was the direct act of the city," yet the corporation was held not liable. A distinction is made by appellant between cases arising under charters making it the duty of the city, as such, to keep streets open and in repair, and those which make it the duty of the city council to do so. We are unable to perceive any merit in the point. The corporation can act only through its agents; and what they do, within the scope of their authority, is "the direct act of the city." If the city, through its agents, in attempting to perform a lawful act, perform it in such a negligent manner that injury results to a citizen, its responsibility does not rest upon the question whether the charter, by mandatory provision, required the act to be done, or simply left it permissive. The act is lawful in both cases. It is the negligence and injury which render it liable, if at all. The distinction contended for was not approved in Winbigler v. Los Angeles, 45 Cal. 36, as claimed by appellant. The court simply said that, according to the argument of counsel, the liability would devolve upon members of the city council, as the statute imposed the duty upon them, and not upon the corporation as such. The court did not hold that the position taken by counsel was correct. The question was not involved in the case, as the work was done by a private person, for his own benefit. The cases all hold that where the work is done by a contractor or abutting owner the city is not acting through its own agents, and therefore it is not liable. That is all that could be decided in Winbigler v. Los Angeles. It results that the complaint does not state any cause of action, and it becomes unnecessary to consider other questions raised. The court below properly set aside the judgment. The order is affirmed.

WORKS, J. I concur on the sole ground that the department is bound by the decision of a majority of the court in Chope v. City of Eureka, 78 Cal. 588, 21 Pac. Rep. 364, from which decision I dissented.

FOX, J. I concur solely on the ground that the court in department is bound by the decision in Chope v. City of Eureka.

NEW TRIAL.

Denial of plaintiff's motion to disregard defendant's statement, served on his motion for a new trial after judgment for plaintiff, is not prejudicial to the latter, as his objections to the statement can be considered on the hearing of defendant's motion.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Santa Clara county; D. BELDEN, Judge.

Action for personal injuries by James W. Arnold against the city of San Jose. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant served notice of intention to move for a new trial. Plaintiff moved to disregard the statement filed by defendant. His motion was denied, and he appeals.

Crandall & Biddle and J. C. Black, for appellant. Wm. B. Hardy and D. W. Herrington, for respondent.

PATERSON, J. Plaintiff had judgment in the court below. Defendant served a notice of intention to move for a new trial, and in due time thereafter prepared and served a statement. Plaintiff served certain amendments, which the defendant did not adopt. On November 10, 1886, the statement and proposed amendments were left with the clerk. Plaintiff, believing that the statement and amendments had not been presented within the time allowed by law, orders of the court, and stipulations of counsel, asked the court to disregard defendant's statement and deny its motion for a new trial. The order appealed from reads as follows: "Motion of plaintiff to disregard defendant's statement denied, and cause ordered on the law calendar for settlement of statement, and amendments thereto."

We are unable to see how the plaintiff could be prejudiced by this order. It determines nothing against him. The objections made by him can be preserved in the statement before settlement, and the presumption is that, if they are well taken, the court below will give him the benefit of them by denying the defendant's motion for a new trial, without regard to or consideration of such motion on its merits.

No question is raised as to whether the order is an appealable one. Order affirmed.

We concur: FOX, J.; WORKS, J.

DEMAND NOTES—MATURITY—STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS.

Under Civil Code Cal. § 3130, providing that "it is not necessary to make a demand of payment upon the principal debtor in a negotiable instrument in order to charge him," suit may be brought against the maker, on a note payable on demand, with interest, at any time, without previous actual demand, and the statute of limitations runs against the maker from the execution and delivery of the note; and this rule is not changed by section 3131 et seq., concerning presentment of negotiable instruments for payment, and providing for the apparent maturity of demand paper, as these sections relate to the indorser only, and not to the maker.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; E. M. GIBSON, Judge.

Chapman & Slack, for appellant. Flournoy & Mhoon, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. C. On the 17th day of January, 1880, the defendant executed to the plaintiff his promissory note for $1,000, payable on demand, with interest at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum. In the latter part of October, or the beginning of November, 1884, plaintiff demanded payment of the note from defendant for the first time, and, it not being paid, he commenced this action on the 1st day of April, 1885, to recover the amount due thereon. The defendant pleaded payment, and that the action was barred by the provisions of section 337 of the Code of Civil Procedure. At the trial the plaintiff was nonsuited, on the ground that his cause of action was barred by the statute of limitations, and he thereupon appealed from the judgment entered against him.

It is argued for appellant that a note payable on demand, with interest, is a continuing security, and that the statute of limitations does not begin to run against it until demand for its payment has been actually made. The argument is based upon the supposed provisions of our Civil Code. Section 3131 et seq.

The argument is not sound. "It has always been the rule that suit may be brought on a note payable on demand at any time, without any previous demand; the suit itself being all the demand necessary. The rule has been occasionally criticised by judges as illogical; but it has been universally followed by courts, and is as well settled as any other rule of law that could possibly be suggested." Cousins v. Partridge, 79 Cal. 228, 21 Pac. Rep. 745. This rule applies to the maker, and not the indorser, of a note, and it is declared in the Civil Code as follows: "Sec. 3130. It is not necessary to make a demand of payment upon the principal debtor in a negotiable instrument in order to charge him," etc. It is also a well-settled rule of law that the statute of limitations begins to run when a right of action accrues. This is a general rule, and applies to all actions. Brummagim v. Tallant, 29 Cal. 504; Bell v. Sackett, 38 Cal. 407; Collins v. Driscoll, 69 Cal. 552, 11 Pac. Rep. 244. The sections of the Code invoked by the appellant apply to the indorser, and not to the maker, of a note. Section 3131 provides: "Presentment of a negotiable instrument for payment, when necessary, must be made as follows," etc.; and section 3135 provides for the apparent maturity of notes payable on demand, with or without interest. Prior to the adoption of the Codes, the law as to when notes spoken of in this section must be presented, in order to fix the liability of an indorser, was somewhat uncertain, and the section was intended to remove this uncertainty. It relates, however, only to presentment to charge the indorser, and not to the statute of limitations. Machado v. Fernandez, 74 Cal. 362, 16 Pac. Rep. 19.

It is clear that the plaintiff's cause of action was barred when he filed his complaint, and the judgment should therefore be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNE, C.; FOOTE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is affirmed.

A. H. Griffith, for appellants. W. S. Tinning, (Aylett R. Cotton and W. H. Hart, of counsel,) for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal from an order refusing to set aside an order for a writ of assistance. The order that a writ of assistance issue was a special order, made after final judgment, and therefore an appeal might have been taken from it. Code Civil Proc. § 963. "But defendants do not appeal from that order. They made a motion to set aside that order, and then appeal from the refusal to grant their motion. This is certainly not revisable. It is the mere negative action of the court, declining to disturb its first decision. It is the decision which is the proper subject of complaint, and the refusal to alter it any number of times would not make it less so." Henly v. Hastings, 3 Cal. 341; Railroad Co. v. Railroad Co., 65 Cal. 295, 4 Pac. Rep. 13. Appeal dismissed.

BAKER v. BROWN.

FRAUD—PRINCIPAL AND AGENT.

1. Defendant, a broker, sold to plaintiff, for P., lot 5, for the sum of $2,400, informing her, when offering it, that it was the same property he had sold for B. to P. for $1,800, but concealing from her the fact that lot 5 did not embrace all the property he sold to P. for said sum, and also concealing from her the fact that, in consideration of his selling lot 5 to her for $2,400, P. was to give him the balance of the property which he had bought from B., and which was worth $600. At the time of the sale to plaintiff, lot 5 was worth $2,400. The usual commission for a sale of that amount was $100. The court having found that he occupied a position of trust towards plaintiff, that he had been the agent of her husband, and since his death her agent; and that she never purchased except on his advice,—decreed that defendant pay plaintiff $2,400 on the conveyance to him by her of lot 5. Held error, as it did not appear that she had been deceived as to the quantity or quality of the land, and, besides, defendant had never agreed to purchase lot 5, nor had he received the $2,400.

2. The facts that defendant had been the agent of plaintiff's husband in his life-time, and since then had been her general agent, and that she had made purchases and sales through him, and had not made any purchases or sales except through him or on his advice, do not show that defendant was plaintiff's agent in this transaction, or that she had any right to rely on him except as a broker, she knowing that he was to receive his commission from P., though she did not know the amount of it.

Anderson, Fitzgerald & Anderson, for appellant. Haynes & Mitchell, for respondent.

PATERSON, J. B. was the owner of lot 5 and a fractional part of lot 2, block 6, of the city of Pasadena, and through the agency of the defendant sold the same to P. for the sum of $1,800. Thereafter the defendant applied to P. to purchase said fractional portion of lot 2, but P. declined to sell any portion of the property unless he could sell the whole, but then and there proposed to the defendant that if he would find a purchaser for lot 5, for the sum of $2,400, he would give to the defendant the remaining portion of the premises, to-wit, said fractional portion of lot 2. The court finds that the defendant went to the plaintiff, and offered to sell her lot 5 for the sum of $2,400, informing her at the time that it was the same property he had sold for B. to P. for $1,800, but concealed from the plaintiff the fact that lot 5 did not embrace all the property he so sold to P. for said sum, and also concealed from her the personal interest he had in effecting the sale of lot 5. The court further found that "at this time, and for a long time prior thereto, the defendant occupied towards the plaintiff a position of trust and confidence; that he had been the agent of her husband in his life-time, and since the latter's decease had been the general agent of the plaintiff; that she placed the utmost confidence in him and relied upon him as a confidential friend and adviser in her business affairs; that she had made purchases and sales of real estate, through him and upon his advice, in Los Angeles county, and had not made any purchases or sales except through him, or upon his advice, in said county, and the defendant knew that the plaintiff thus relied upon him, and placed confidence in him;" that in the purchase of the property plaintiff relied exclusively upon the advice of the defendant, and that she would not have made the purchase except for his advice; that she had no knowledge or information that defendant had received a deed or acquired a fractional portion of lot 2 until about a month before the commencement of this action. The court found, also, that the value of lot 5 at the time of the purchase by plaintiff was $2,400, the amount paid for it; that the value of the fractional portion of lot 2 was $600; that the usual commission allowed agents for the sale of real estate was 5 per cent. on the first $1,000, and 2½ per cent. on the excess over that sum. Judgment was entered in favor of plaintiff, adjudging and declaring that the sale of lot 5 was fraudulent and void, and ordering the defendant to pay the plaintiff the sum of $2,400, with interest thereon, from the 28th of November, 1887, together with costs of suit, upon the plaintiff conveying to the defendant the said lot 5.

We are not aware of any principle or authority upon which the decision can be supported. It is not pretended that the plaintiff was deceived as to the actual quantity or quality of the land she purchased. It nowhere appears that she knew anything about the extent of the property purchased by P. from B. It is found that the property was worth all that she paid for it. She knew she was purchasing lot 5. That is what was offered, and what she bought. Assuming the relation of the defendant towards the plaintiff to have been, as claimed by respondent, a position of trust, in which he had concealed from her the fact that he had a personal interest in making the sale, and made certain representations which were not true, in fact, as to the value of the land sold, the decree of the court is not supported by the findings. The court could not create a contract which never existed. It could not compel the defendant to accept a conveyance of property which he had never purchased. Nor could it require him to pay over money which he had never received. The court appears to have considered it a case in which it might follow the property acquired by an agent as held in trust by him for his principal; but such is not the case here. Defendant never acquired, or attempted to acquire, the title to lot 5, and never received any portion of the $2,400 which the court requires him to refund. If the plaintiff can recover anything from the defendant, it is the fractional portion of lot 2, or the value thereof, although it is unnecessary to decide the matter in this case; but we do not think that plaintiff is entitled to anything. The property she purchased was worth all she paid for it. The court attempted to find, apparently, that the relation of principal and agent existed between the plaintiff and defendant at the time of the purchase; that confidence was reposed in defendant by plaintiff, and by him abused. A fair construction of the finding, however, we think fails to show such a relation of trust and confidence. The facts found were that he had been the agent of her husband in his life-time, and since the latter's decease had been the general agent of the plaintiff; that she had made purchases and sales of real estate through him, and upon his advice, in Los Angeles county, and had not made any purchases or sales except through him or upon his advice. The facts found do not, we think, show the existence of an agency as to this property, or any right in the plaintiff to rely upon defendant as her agent, except as a broker or middleman between the parties. Defendant received no compensation from the plaintiff. His commissions were paid by Pierce. Plaintiff knew that defendant was acting as the agent of Pierce. But, as stated before, even if she had been damaged through the misrepresentations of the defendant, the relief granted would be improper.

We do not consider it as important that the defendant's compensation for making the sale was $600, which was a larger compensation than was usually paid for such services. Pierce had a right to pay the defendant any amount he saw fit for perfecting the trade; and, unless the plaintiff was deceived to her injury, we see no ground upon which she can complain. Judgment reversed, with directions to the court below to enter judgment in favor of defendant for his costs.

We concur: Works, J.; Fox., J.

Gardner v. Tatum et al. (No. 11,902.)

Excessive Verdict—Remittitur—Physicians—Compensation.

1. A motion by defendants for a new trial because of an excessive verdict was granted, unless plaintiff elected to remit a certain sum, and defendants would accept it as modified. Defendants refused to accept the offer, and the motion was denied; the order reciting that the verdict was sustained by a preponderance of evidence, "unless as to the amount of the verdict." Held that, as the language of the trial judge clearly showed his belief that the verdict was excessive, which belief was warranted by the evidence, the defendants were entitled to have the verdict reduced without the imposition of terms, and that a new trial should be granted.

2. Under St. Cal. 1875–76, p. 792, § 13, and St. 1877–78, p. 918, § 7, making it a misdemeanor for a person to practice medicine without having first procured a certificate from a medical board, a physician cannot recover for services rendered before the issuance of his certificate by the board, though he made application therefor before his employment began; Civil Code Cal. § 1667, making that unlawful which is "contrary to the policy of express law, though not expressly prohibited."

3. But where the services are not rendered under an express contract, and as the law implies a promise to pay for each visit as made, he may recover for services rendered the patient after the issuance of his certificate.

4. In an action to recover compensation for services rendered by a physician, plaintiff's testimony as to what discoveries he considered that he had made in skin-grafting while treating the patient, defendants' employe, is not admissible, as defendants are not liable for extraordinary services in the way of experiments; the question being also objectionable because calling for the opinion of the witness.

5. Evidence as to the result of the treatment by a physician subsequently employed is inadmissible, as his treatment could not alter the value of plaintiff's services.

Fox and Thornton, JJ., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; T. H. Reardon, Judge.

Action by H. H. Gardner against Henry L. Tatum and another to recover for services rendered as a physician in treating Frederick Cook, defendant's employe. On the trial it was not disputed that plaintiff had made 194 visits; but the evidence as to the value of his services was conflicting. The medical witnesses called by him estimated that his services were worth all the way from $2,500 to $5,000; while those called by defendants considered $2.50 per visit a fair compensation. During his examination in chief, plaintiff was asked: "What improvements and discoveries in skin-grafting do you consider you made in treating Cook?" An objection to this question was overruled. There was a verdict for plaintiff; and from a judgment thereon, and an order denying their motion for a new trial, defendants appeal.

Langhorne & Miller, for appellants. J. F. Wendell and S. G. Hilborn, for respondent.

PATERSON, J. Plaintiff, who is a physician and surgeon, was called in by defendants, and began to treat their employe Cook, on March 3, 1883. He continued to visit the patient until October 2, 1883. On September 24th he made a demand upon defendants for the sum of $2,386. Thereupon defendants notified him that they considered his charges exorbitant, and that they would not be responsible for any further services in behalf of Cook. He then brought this action to recover the sum of $2,406, alleged to be the reasonable value of his services. The jury found a verdict in his behalf for the sum of $1,800, and judgment was entered for that amount, and $318, costs and disbursements. The defendants moved for a new trial, specifying several errors of law, and claiming that the verdict was excessive. The defendants convinced the learned judge who heard and decided the motion that the verdict was excessive, and not warranted by the evidence, and he thereupon caused to be entered a conditional minute order, of which the followng is a copy: "The motion for a new trial herein will be denied, provided that plaintiff, within thirty days from this date, offer to remit the sum of $800 from the amount of the verdict herein; provided, also, that the defendants shall agree to accept said verdict and judgment so modified as a finality; said offer to remit not to be binding upon the plaintiff unless accepted by defendants as a finality. Said motion for a new trial to be granted unless said offer to remit by plaintiff be so made." In accordance with the order, plaintiff filed an offer to remit the sum of $800 from the amount of the verdict, provided the defendants should accept the verdict and judgment so modified as a finality. The defendants elected not to accept the terms of the order; whereupon the court made an order denying the motion, in the following language: "It appearing that plaintiff has offered to remit said sum as directed, and within the time directed, and no error appearing in the record, and the verdict as rendered being sustained by a preponderance of evidence, unless as to the amount of the verdict, it is hereby ordered that the motion for a new trial be, and the same is hereby, denied."

We are of opinion that the court erred in denying the motion. If the verdict was for an excessive amount, and it is made clear by the language of both orders that the court believed it was,—and the evidence, we think, fully sustains the court in such belief,—defendants were entitled to have it reduced without the imposition of any terms upon them, and without being deprived of the right to correct any errors leading to a judgment which, although supported by the evidence admitted, is nevertheless erroneous. It was not the fault of defendants that the jury found the value of plaintiff's services to be nearly double what the court thought the evidence showed it to be, and they ought not to be punished because the jury erred. The court was of opinion that no errors had been committed during the trial, but that the verdict was for $800 in excess of what the defendants justly owed the plaintiff. Hence its order, in effect, is a penalty of $800 against the defendants, if they fail to accept the rulings of the court, made during the trial, as just and final. Further along we shall find a practical illustration of the injustice which would result if this could be done.

The court admitted evidence as to the value of services for which plaintiff was not under any circumstances entitled to recover. At the time plaintiff was employed by defendants he had not procured the certificate required by the laws of this state regulating the practice of medicine,—"An act to regulate the practice of medicine," (St. 1875-76, p. 792;) and an act supplemental thereto, (St. 1877-78, p. 918.) By section 13 of the first act it is provided that "any person practicing medicine or surgery in this state, without complying with the provisions of this act, shall be punished by a fine of not less than fifty dollars, nor more than five hundred dollars, or by imprisonment in the county jail for a period of not less than thirty days, nor more than three hundred and sixty-five days, or by both such fine and imprisonment, for each and every offense." And by section 7 of the amendatory act of 1878 a person practicing medicine, without having first procured a certificate from one of the medical boards, is guilty of a misdemeanor, and subject to the penalties provided in section 13 of the act of 1876. By the terms of section 6, he is required to have his certificate recorded in the office of the clerk of the county in which he resides. The plaintiff's application was not granted by the board of examiners until March 12th, and his certificate was not received by him until March 21st. It was recorded March 29th. Under the law referred to, and the facts, we think the court erred in refusing the first instruction of defendant, to the effect that plaintiff was not entitled to recover from defendants any compensation for medical services rendered between March 3 and March 12, 1888. "The general principle is well established that a contract founded on an illegal consideration, or which is made for the purpose of furthering any matter or thing prohibited by statute, or to aid or assist any party therein, is void. This rule applies to every contract which is founded on a transaction malum in se, or which is prohibited by statute on the ground of public policy." Swanger v. Mayberry, 59 Cal. 91; Ladda v. Hawley, 57 Cal. 51. This principle is in accord with the express provision of our Civil Code, which makes that unlawful which is either contrary to the express provision of law or "contrary to the policy of express law, though not expressly prohibited." Civil Code, § 1667. In construing the acts above referred to, this court said, in Ex parte Frazer, 54 Cal. 94: "The title of the act sufficiently indicates its main purpose and design. Its general framework shows that it was intended to require, of those alone authorized to practice the profession, that knowledge of pathology, anatomy, and physiology recognized as necessary by every school of the science of medicine." And, this being the main object of the law, it must follow that it is the policy of the law to protect the public health and prevent imposition upon those in need of medical advice and care. A contract made, therefore, to render medical services with one who has not obtained a certificate showing that he possesses the necessary qualifications—who has not complied with the law—is contrary to such policy, and is therefore void. It is claimed on behalf of appellant that the contract was an entire contract, and, if void in part, was void in toto. This contention, we think, cannot be sustained. The contract was an implied one. The law implied a promise to pay for each visit as it was made. The most that can be said in support of the contention is that the law will not imply a promise to pay for services which have been illegally rendered. This objection can apply only to such services as were rendered prior to March 12th, when plaintiff obtained his certificate. There was no violation of the law in any services rendered by the plaintiff subsequent to that date, and there is no reason why the law should not imply a promise to pay for them. It is claimed by respondent that the court, under this view, should order the amount recovered for services prior to March 12th to be remitted, and sustain the judgment for the remainder. Instruction No. 1, offered by defendant and refused, shows that the case was tried in the court below upon the theory that the plaintiff could recover for services rendered during the entire period of his employment; and it does not appear with sufficient clearness, we think, what was the value of the services rendered from March 3d to March 12th. Respondent claims that the issuance to the plaintiff of a certificate on March 12th related back to the time when he made his application, which was prior to the date of his employment, and that this relation rendered the services valid. This contention, we think, cannot be sustained. Ladda v. Hawley, supra.

We think that the court erred in allowing the plaintiff to testify as to discoveries he made in skin-grafting while caring for the patient, Cook. We are unable to see what bearing upon the question of the liability of the defendants this testimony would have. They certainly could not be made liable for any extraordinary services performed in experimenting upon the patient for the purpose of discovering new and improved methods of treatment in skin grafting. The question was, furthermore, objectionable on the ground that it called for the opinion of the witness as to the discoveries made, not as to what he had actually done.

It was error, also, we think, to allow the witness Cook to state what was the result of Dr. Worth's treatment. The value of the plaintiff's services in no way depended upon the nature or value of Dr. Worth's treatment. If Dr. Worth's treatment was bad, that fact did not make Dr. Gardner's any better. Judgment and order reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

We concur: BEATTY, C J.; SHARPSTEIN, J.; MCFARLAND, J.; WORKS, J.

FOX, J. I dissent. I do not think that there is anything in the record to justify the conclusion that the court below thought the verdict excessive. The order recited in the leading opinion was an unusual one; but, taking the whole record together, the broadest construction that, to my mind, can be given to it is that the court below thought that, under the circumstances of the case, the verdict was a hardship to the defendants, and, on the other hand, the delays of a new trial and possible appeal would also work a hardship to the plaintiff, and that it would be better for both parties to settle the matter on the basis of the order, which it gave them an opportunity of doing. But the very terms of the order imply that the court did not consider the defendants entitled to that reduction as a matter of right or of law, and the weight of the evidence is against any such implication. On the contrary, the preponderance of the evidence is in favor of a much larger amount than that allowed by the verdict. If the amount of the bill was a surprise to the defendants, it was in a large degree their own fault, in utterly neglecting to ascertain the character of the case which they had committed to plaintiff's care, and to make some arrangement as to the extent of the charge to be made. The evidence shows that the case was one attended with great difficulty, requiring great skill and constant care, and that it was attended with such success as had made it phenomenal in that class of surgical cases. As to the point made on the requirements of the "Act to regulate the practice of medicine," and the act supplementary thereto, the inhibition of the statute ran against the person, and not against the business. As was said by the court in Aiken v. Blaisdell, 41 Vt. 666: "If a man engage in the kind of business referred to, he is engaged in a legal business, whether he has a license or not. If he has no license, he has no legal right to do it, and subjects himself to the penalty. The law, we think, was intended to operate upon the person, and not upon the business." In this case the plaintiff possessed every qualification required by the law, and not only proved it to the entire satisfaction of the board of examiners, but also paid his license fee, before entering upon this employment, and only failed to receive the license at the time because of a failure of the board to hold a meeting in time to grant it earlier. It was not his fault that the license was not in his possession. The cases of Ladda v. Hawley and Swanger v. Mayberry, cited in the leading opinion, are both cases of contract for stealing timber from the government of the United States,—a business unlawful per se,—and the judgments of the court refusing to enforce the contracts have no bearing in this case. I do not, therefore, think the court erred in refusing the instruction asked by defendants. Neither does it appear to me that the defendants were injured by the rulings of the court in the admission of evidence. In my opinion, the judgment should be affirmed; but, if it be determined that it should be reduced by disallowing for the service rendered before the plaintiff received his license, it is better to make that modification than to reverse the judgment and remand the case for a new trial. The record shows the number of visits made and operations performed, and the charge made for each; and it seems to me that there is no substantial difficulty in the way of making a deduction for the first nine days of that service, which shall conform to the justice of the case, if it shall be determined that such deduction ought to be made; it being understood and apparent that the jury have allowed just about 75 per cent. of the whole charge, and that the evidence of every surgeon called in the case puts the value at more than was charged.

JONES et al. v HANNA et al. (No. 11,654.)

CONTRACTS—CONSIDERATION—EXECUTORS —ACCOMMODATION INDORSER.

1. Plaintiffs agreed with defendant executrix to purchase at public sale the personal property of her testator "for her account and risk," they to receive certain compensation for purchasing and selling the same, she to give security against loss. For this purpose, she gave her note. The property was resold at a loss, and she then gave her note for the amount of the loss in place of the prior note. Held that, under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1576, providing that "no executor or administrator must directly or indirectly purchase any property of the estate he represents, nor must he be interested in any sale," and, Civil Code, § 1667, providing that "that is not lawful which is contrary to an express provision of law, or contrary to the policy of express law," the contract was unlawful and void, and recovery could not be had on the note.

2. An accommodation indorser of such note, who had full knowledge of all the facts, is not estopped by Civil Code, § 3116, providing that an indorser of a note warrants to every subsequent holder thereof that it is in all respects what it purports to be; that the signatures of all prior parties are binding upon them; and that if it is dishonored he will pay the same,—from setting up its illegality against the payees, as they took with notice, and were not bona fide holders.

THORNTON, J., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; T. K. WILSON, Judge.

Wm. M. Pierson, for appellant. H. A. Powell, for respondents.

PATERSON, J. The findings show that the defendant Hanna, while acting as executrix of the last will of Peter N. Hanna, deceased, procured an order of sale of personal property belonging to the estate. On the day of the sale she entered into an agreement with the plaintiffs that they should buy the property offered for sale "for her account and risk," and advance the purchase price; that she would pay them 2½ per cent. commission on the amount of the purchase, and 5 per cent. on the amount of sales they might thereafter make. She further agreed to "guaranty them against loss or damage," give them possession of the goods until other security was furnished, and pay them interest on the amount advanced at the rate of 9 per cent. per annum. In pursuance of this agreement the plaintiffs purchased the goods for her benefit, using the name of one Haynes as purchaser. Plaintiffs thereupon removed the property from the place of sale of deefndant Hanna's store, and began to sell the same for her benefit. On the 13th day of September, 1883, and while the greater portion of the personal property so purchased was at the Clay-Street store, undisposed of, plaintiffs required of the defendant Mary L. Hanna security under the agreement of September 6, 1883; and thereupon she made and executed her promissory note for $10,000, and procured the defendant William Bihler to indorse it, and thereafter to deliver it to the plaintiffs. Finding 11. After adding to the figures $29,957—the amount paid for the goods and advanced by plaintiffs—the commissions of plaintiffs in purchasing and selling the property, and interest on the advances, and deducting therefrom the proceeds, less the expenses of making the sales, a balance remained due the plaintiffs of $9,281.49. Upon the surrender of the prior note the defendant Hanna made, executed, and delivered the note in controversy, indorsed by the defendant Bihler, who had full notice of all the facts. The court found that "plaintiffs had actual knowledge and notice before and at the time of the execution of the agreement of September 6 1883, that the defendant Mary L. Hanna was the duly-appointed, qualified, and acting executrix of said estate; and that the object and purpose of making the said agreements and transactions was to realize as large a sum as possible for the estate, and also to make a profit to herself out of the personal property to be bought in, and which was actually bought in, at said sale." Finding 16. Judgment was entered in favor of the plaintiffs, and the defendant Bihler has appealed on the judgment roll alone.

Upon the facts stated, the judgment is erroneous, and must be reversed. The contract out of which this transaction arose is unlawful and void; void because it is in aid of an act expressly prohibited by law, and because it is contrary to the policy of express law. Section 1576 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides: "No executor or administrator must, directly or indirectly, purchase any property of the estate he represents, nor must he be interested in any sale." It is a universal rule that courts will not aid parties in the enforcement of contracts thus interdicted by the law. Our Code provides: "That is not lawful which is (1) contrary to an express provision of law; (2) contrary to the policy of express law, though not expressly prohibited or (3) otherwise contrary to good morals." Section 1667, Civil Code. Wharton says that "a contract whose object is to violate a statute will not be enforced by the courts of the state by which the statute is enacted." "A party who goes into an illegal enterprise risks all he puts in, and cannot, in case of his confederate proving untrue or the adventure miscarrying, recover back his advances." 1 Whart. Cont. §§ 354, 360. Here all the parties went into the transaction with their eyes open. The plaintiffs expected a share in the profits of a scheme prohibited by law. As said in Bowers v. Bowers, 26 Pa. St. 74, "the question here is not upon the legality of the administration, but upon the sufficiency of the consideration for the defendant's promise; and as that, in its very nature, endangered the purity of the trust, the law will not sanction it." The contract upon which the note in suit is based was made for the benefit of Mrs. Hanna and plaintiffs, although the court finds that it was made "to realize as large a sum as possible for the estate." The result to the estate in any particular transaction is immaterial. The rule is one of universal application. It is founded upon public policy, and should be rigidly enforced by courts, because it "stands upon our great moral obligation to refrain from placing ourselves in relations which ordinarily excite a conflict between self-interest and integrity." Michoud v. Girod, 4 How. 555. See, also, the following authorites: Danielwitz v. Sheppard, 62 Cal. 339; Swanger v. Mayberry, 59 Cal. 91; Edwards v. Estell, 48 Cal. 194; Gardner v. Tatum, ante, 880, (No. 11,902, filed November 30, 1889;) Porter v. Jones, 52 Mo. 399; Saltmarsh v. Beene, 30 Amer. Dec. 525; Blasdel v. Fowle, 120 Mass. 447; Trust Co. v. Trust Co., 53 Amer. Dec. 742; Slocum v. Wooley, 11 Atl. Rep. 264; Dillon v. Allen, 46 Iowa, 299; Bowers v. Bowers, 26 Pa. St. 74. The question involved is much broader than those raised in the cases to set aside probate sales and enforce trusts relied on by respondent.

Plaintiffs' contention that defendant Bihler is estopped, under section 3116 of the Civil Code, from taking advantage of the facts relied upon, cannot be sanctioned. The respondents did not take the note without notice, and they are not bona fide holders. Section 3116 of the Civil Code[1] has not added any new liability of an indorser, —certainly not in favor of those who are not bona fide holders. The note in suit was given in pursuance of the original and unlawful contract. It is "the other security" referred to in the written agreement. Under such circumstances, any defense which the maker might make may be urged by the indorser. Davis v. Seeley, 38 N. W. Rep. 901; Smith v. Silsby, 55 Cal. 470; 3 Kent, Comm. *80; 1 Daniel, Neg. Inst. § 164. There are other points made by respondents, but we do not deem it necessary to consider them in this opinion. Judgment reversed and cause remanded with directions to enter judgment in favor of defendant.

We concur: BEATTY, C. J., SHARPSTEIN, J.; WORKS, J.; FOX, J.

THORNTON, J. I dissent. In this case, I adopt the opinion of the commission, drawn up by Commissioner VANCLIEF, and concurred in by BELCHER and FOOTE, CC., when the case was before department 1 of this court, as a clear and correct exposition of the law applicable to it. That opinion is as follows:

"This action is upon a promissory note made by Mary L. Hanna to the defendant Bihler, and by him indorsed to the plaintiffs. The defendant Bihler alone answered, and from a judgment against him this appeal is taken upon the judgment-roll alone, without any bill of exceptions; and the only error assigned is that the findings of fact by the trial court do not support the judgment. The trial court found that Peter Naylor Hanna died testate in the city and county of San Francisco, December 16, 1881. That on the 21st day of January, 1882, the superior court of said city and county admitted the will of said deceased to probate, and appointed Mary L. Hanna —the widow of the testator—and Catherine N. Hanna, executrices, and John Hanna, executor of said will, all of whom qualified; but John Hanna died on the 4th day of June, 1883, and after his death Mary L. and Catherine N. Hanna continued to act as executrices, and in July, 1883, procured an order of said court authorizing a sale at auction of certain personal property of said estate, which sale was made on the 7th day of September, 1883, by Newhall & Co., who were then licensed auctioneers, and who were employed by the executrices to make the sale. On the 6th day of September, 1883, and prior to the commencement of the sale, the defendant Mary L. Hanna executed a written contract with the plaintiffs (respondents) of which the following is a copy: 'San Francisco, Sept. 6, 1883. Messrs. S. L. Jones & Co.—Gentlemen: I hereby request and authorize you to purchase for my account, at the sale of the stock fixtures, etc., of the firm of J. & P. N. Hanna, as advertised for sale by Messrs. Newhall Sons & Co., or as may hereafter be advertised for sale by them during the present month, such quantities and kind of merchandise and fixtures, and at such prices as are agreed upon by and between Wm. B. Thompson and Thomas J. Haynes. In consideration of the above, I hereby agree to pay you a commission of two and one-half per centum on the amount of said purchase, also a commission of five per centum upon the amount of any sales which you may make of the whole or any part of said merchandise or fixtures for my account; and I further authorize you to cover by fire insurance the full amount of such purchases, with twenty per centum added. Interest for money advanced for the above purposes to be at the rate of nine per centum per annum. I hereby guaranty you against all loss or damage by reason of the above request and authorization, and agree to make a full settlement with you within ninety days from date. As part security, you will please hold the goods purchased until such time as other security is furnished to your satisfaction. MARY L. HANNA. Witness: W. B. THOMPSON.' At the time of this agreement the plaintiffs were regularly licensed auctioneers, and engaged in business as such in the city and county of San Francisco. All that plaintiffs did in connection with the purchase and sale of said property, as hereinafter stated, was done under and by virtue of said written contract. In accordance with said contract, the plaintiffs, in the name of Thomas J. Haynes, one of their employes, and for the private benefit of the defendant Mary L. Hanna, individually bought at said sale certain personal property belonging to said estate, to the value of $29,957, and paid said last-mentioned sum to said Newhall & Co. Immediately after the sale the property so purchased in the name of Haynes was removed to the store of the defendant Mary L. Hanna, on Clay street, in said city, and was there exposed for sale for her private benefit, under the immediate supervision of the plaintiffs. The sale as made to Haynes, was reported to the superior court by said executrices, and was duly confirmed on the 19th day of December, 1883. In addition to the foregoing, the court made the following findings:

[1] Civil Code Cal. § 3116, provides that an indorser of a note warrants to every subsequent holder thereof that it is in all respects what it purports to be; that the signatures of all prior parties are binding upon them; and that if it is dishonored he will pay the same.

"'(11) That on the 13th day of September, 1883, and while the greater portion of the personal property so purchased was at the Clay-Street store, undisposed of, plaintiffs required of the defendant Mary L. Hanna security under the agreement of September 6, 1883, and thereupon she made and executed her promissory note for ten thousand ($10,000) dollars, and procured the defendant William Bihler to indorse it, and thereafter delivered it to the plaintiffs. (12) That upon the maturity of said note, and on the 10th day of May, 1884, the same was taken up and renewed by a similar note, made and executed by the defendant Mary L. Hanna, indorsed by the defendant Bihler, and delivered to plaintiffs. (13) That the store on Clay street was operated by the defendant Mary L. Hanna, under the supervision of plaintiffs, for about seven months; and a greater part of the property so purchased at the auction sale was sold thereat, during that time, at retail, and the proceeds thereof paid to plaintiffs. That thereafter, about the 30th day of April, 1884, the remainder of said personal property was sold at public auction by the plaintiffs, at the request and for the benefit of the defendant Mary L. Hanna. (14) That the net result of the purchase and sale of the property of said estate, as aforesaid, was this: Adding to the $29,957, the commissions of plaintiffs in purchasing and selling said personal property and interest on the advances as specified in said agreement, and deducting therefrom the proceeds, less the expenses of making the sales, a balance still remained due the plaintiffs of $9,281.49. (15) That on the 1st day of July, 1885, upon the surrender of said note of May 10, 1884, the defendant Mary L. Hanna made and executed, and the defendant William Bihler indorsed, the promissory note set forth and described in plaintiffs' complaint for the sum of $9,281.49, the same being the amount ascertained as aforesaid to be then due plaintiffs from defendant Mary L. Hanna, on account of the transactions hereinbefore set forth, and subsequently said note was duly delivered to plaintiffs. (16) That plaintiffs had actual knowledge and notice before and at the time of the execution of the agreement of September 6, 1883, that the defendant Mary L. Hanna was the duly appointed, qualified, and acting executrix of said estate, and that the object and purpose of making the said agreements and transactions was to realize as large a sum as possible for the estate, and also to make a profit to herself out of the personal property to be bought in, and which was actually bought in, at said sale. (17) That defendant William Bihler, at the date of his indorsement of the several notes above specified, had full knowledge and notice that the same were for moneys advanced and loaned by plaintiffs to Mary L. Hanna, while such executrix, to enable her to purchase the property belonging to said estate. (18) That no part of the principal sum specified in said promissory note has been paid, and that there is still due and unpaid the sum of $593 interest thereon' making in the aggregate $9,874.49 principal and interest still due and unpaid on said note.

"'And, as conclusions of law from the foregoing facts, the court finds that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover of and from the defendant William Bihler the sum of $9,874.49 and costs, in this behalf expended.'

"It is urged by counsel for the defendant that the contract between the plaintiffs and Mary L. Hanna, out of which the consideration for the note in suit arose, is in contravention of section 1576, Code Civil Proc., which provides that 'no executor or administrator must directly or indirectly purchase any property of the estate he represents, nor must he be interested in any sale.' The general principle is well established that a contract founded upon an illegal consideration, or which is made for the purpose of furthering, aiding, or assisting any matter or thing prohibited by statute, is void. Ladda v. Hawley, 57 Cal. 51; Swanger v. Mayberry, 59 Cal. 91; McGregor v. Donelly, 67 Cal. 149, 7 Pac. Rep. 422. Section 1667 of the Civil Code provides that: 'That is not lawful which is contrary to an express provision of law, or contrary to the policy of express law, though not expressly prohibited, or which is otherwise contrary to good morals.' But we are of the opinion that these rules of law are confined to contracts which appear to be directly promotive of an illegal or immoral act or object; or which are founded wholly or in part upon an illegal or immoral consideration, and do not apply to cases where the contract appears to be lawful in itself, and founded upon a consideration which is only collaterally and remotely connected with the prohibited transaction. In De Groot v. Van Duzer, 17 Wend. 170, BRONSON, J., said: 'It cannot, I think, be maintained that a contract which is in itself free from vice can be avoided on the ground that it may possibly facilitate an illegal transaction. * * * It is impossible to foresee where the doctrine would carry us, should it be held that a contract is void merely because it may have some remote connection with an illegal transaction.' Scott v. Duffy, 14 Pa. St. 18–20; Faikney v. Reynous, 4 Burrows, 2070; Hook v. Gray, 6 Barb. 398; Armstrong v. Toler, 11 Wheat. 258. The consideration for the promissory note sued on was principally money loaned by plaintiffs to Mary L. Hanna, and the remainder consisted of commissions for services in assisting her in purchasing and selling the property purchased for her at said sale. All these were lawful in themselves, since none of them is prohibited by any statute, or contrary to the policy of any express law, or otherwise contrary to good morals. The commissions on the sales of the property had no connection whatever with the transaction alleged to be illegal. The prohibition relied on (section 1576, Code Civil Proc.) is addressed solely to executors and administrators, for the benefit and protection of the heirs and others interested in the estate, which protection may be waived by the persons for whose benefit it was provided; it being well settled that a purchase of the property of an estate by the executor or administrator per interpositam personam, as in this case, is not void, but only voidable, at the instance of the parties interested. Boyd v. Blankman, 29 Cal. 33; Ives v. Ashley, 97 Mass. 198; Dunlap v. Mitchell, 10 Ohio, 117; Williams v. Rhodes, 81 Ill. 574. If all parties interested should deem it advisable, and agree that the executor should purchase the property of the estate at fair and fixed prices, would a purchase in accordance with such agreement, and entirely free from actual fraud be even voidable? Would not such an agreement be a good defense to an action by a party to it to set aside the sale on the sole ground of constructive fraud? In view of the construction given to section 1576 of the Code of Civil Procedure by this court, it would seem that it does not prohibit a purchase of the property of an estate by the executor or administrator which is satisfactory to all parties interested, and is not objected to by any of them; it being well settled that persons not beneficially interested in the estate have no right to object, and that the parties interested may waive their right to object, and may ratify the sale either expressly or by acquiescence. And it follows that what they may ratify they might have authorized in advance of the sale, since a ratification is but the equivalent of a previous authority. Taking this view of the case, the record fails to show that Mary L. Hanna, in purchasing the property of the estate of Peter Naylor Hanna, did what was prohibited by law, since it fails to show that any person interested in that estate ever objected to her purchase, and also fails to show who were interested in the estate. For aught that appears, Mary L. Hanna may have been the only heir and the only creditor. If, under any circumstances which may have existed, her purchase was lawful, and not immoral, it should be presumed to have been so until the existence of such circumstances are negatived; and the plaintiffs were entitled to act upon this presumption at the time they advanced money and rendered services in aid of her purchase, unless they had notice of facts not disclosed by the record in this case. The cases of Hotel Co. v. Wade, 97 U. S. 13, and Schermerhorn v. Talman, 14 N. Y. 123, shed much light upon the questions involved in this appeal, and furnish additional reasons for our conclusions in this case, which we have deemed it unnecessary to assign. We advise that the judgment of the court below be affirmed."

I add the following: The property which was to be sold and bought, and as to which the plaintiffs contracted herein, consisted, as described in the letter addressed to the plaintiffs, and signed "Mary L. Hanna" (which the court below found was the only contract entered into between the parties; see finding 8,) of "the stock, fixtures, etc., of the firm of I. & P. N. Hanna." In another letter, addressed by same to same, this property is described as the "entire stock, furniture, etc., of the firm of I. & P. N. Hanna." It is nowhere found that this property, belonging "to the firm of I. & P. N. Hanna," was the property of I. N. Hanna, or that I. N. Hanna was "I. & P. N. Hanna," nor can this court assume them to be the same. It would be going very far, and a bow-shot beyond the decided cases, to hold that a purchase by the executrix of I. N. Hanna, at public auction, of the property of the firm of which I. N. Hanna was a member, was utterly void. I know of no case which holds it. At most, it was only voidable, at the election of the heirs or devisees of I. N. Hanna. The rule applicable to executors is that applicable to all sorts of trustees,—to an executor as trustee for devisees and heirs,—and the rule is thus stated in Campbell v. Walker, 5 Ves. 678: "There is no rule that a trustee to sell cannot be the purchaser, but, however fair the transaction, it must be subject to an option in the cestui que trust, if he comes in a reasonable time to have a resale, unless the trustee, to prevent that, purchases under an application to the court." The questions here decided were directly adjudicated in the case cited. The above decision was by the master of the rolls, Sir RICHARD PEPPER ARDEN, afterward lord chancellor, as Lord ALVANLEY. This rule was in substance approved by Lord Chancellor ELDON, when this case came before him. Lord ELDON's decision is reported in 13 Vesey, where the case is entitled "Sanderson v. Walker." See 13 Ves. 601. The rule is fully stated in 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. §§ 958, 1049, 1077, 1078. The decision may be construed as finding that the executrix purchased at her own sale of the property of the estate of her testator, and we shall so treat it. That such a purchase is only voidable is expressly ruled in Boyd v. Blankman, 29 Cal. 34–36 et seq., where the matter is fully discussed. This decision has never been overruled, and is approved in San Diego v. Railroad Co., 44 Cal. 114. In Boyd v. Blankman, section 193 of the former probate act was construed. That section is the same as section 1576, Code Civil Proc., except that in the latter the words, "nor must he be interested in any sale," have been added. The whole question, including the effect of this section, was discussed ably and elaborately by the court, speaking by RHODES, J., and it was held that the section, as it then stood, did not render the purchase by the administrator void, but only voidable. The object of enacting this section is thus spoken of in the opinion: "An examination of the probate act will disclose the intent of section 193, and it is apparent that the object was not to declare who might or who might not become a purchaser of the property of the estate; but it was to prevent the property from being sold at a price less than its true value, which might be the case if the administrator, either directly or indirectly, prevented competition among the bidders by entering into the market, either personally or by his agents, or if, with a view of purchasing, he was tempted to undervalue the property in his proceedings respecting the sale. The protection to the estate designed by that section can be as fully secured by permitting the parties interested in the estate to set the sale aside and have the administrator declared a trustee as it would be to construe the section so as to allow strangers to impeach the sale, with the consequent risk to the bona fide purchaser without notice, from the administrator's agent, of losing the premises he purchased, relying on the apparent regularity of the probate proceedings, and the confirmation of the sale." Now, it certainly cannot be held that the words added in section 1576, Code Civil Proc., alter the effect of this statute. They are the same in legal effect. The old section was found in the probate act referring to sales and conveyances of the property of decedents, and so is the section of the Code. The title of chapter 7, in which section 1576 is found, is "of sales and conveyances of property of decedents," and the collocation of the sections in each Code of laws shows that it was inserted for the benefit of heirs and devisees, and perhaps of creditors, who can alone be injured by such conduct of the administrator or executor and who alone have a right to set it aside by appeal to a court of equity, or perhaps to the court of probate, whose equitable powers would be sufficient to deal with such a case. The fact that a court of equity has to be appealed to to set aside the sale shows that the sale is voidable only, for there is no reason to call in aid the power of equity to set aside a sale, if the sale were utterly void. If utterly void, the party aggrieved could obtain relief in an action at law. The words "void" and "voidable" are very loosely used in textbooks of approved authors, and in the judgment of courts. Discrimination must always be made in applying the rules of law stated by them on this matter. See comments in opinion of RHODES, J., in Boyd v. Blankman, 29 Cal. 37, as to the use of those words. The remarks just referred to will strike every intelligent reader as eminently true. On the question whether a sale is void or voidable, there is one test which never fails. If the title can be passed to a bona fide purchaser from the purchasing trustee, then the sale cannot be void; for, if void, no title ever passed, and the title to the property bought by Mrs. Hanna, through Haynes, would and could not pass to any purchaser from her. Nor could a purchaser from her convey title to any one. The sale being utterly void, no title to the property would pass, and Mrs. Hanna could, as executrix of P. N. Hanna, recover it from the parties to whom she sold it.

The learned author, Austin, in his lectures on Jurisprudence, (see volume 1, p. 322,) says: "The distinction in English law between void and voidable is the same as that in the Roman law between null ipso jure and ope exceptionis. The first conferred no right. The second conferred a right which might be rescinded or destroyed by some party interested in setting it aside." If the transaction must be impeached by exceptio or plea, it is voidable. If no plea is required to avoid it, it is utterly void. It is null ipso jure. In the latter case, any stranger may impeach it. In the former, there must be a party interested to set it aside; and in the case before us the devisees under the will may set the sale aside, but a stranger, like Bihler, cannot. What has Bihler to do with the sale? He had no interest in the property sold. What difference did it make to him what the property sold for, or who bought it? It was all the same to him. We cannot see how he can come in to vindicate a pretended outrage on the majesty of the law, when the sale is lawful as to all persons, the heirs or devisees not objecting. It would be novel and unprecedented law that a stranger, like Bihler, could get rid of his obligation in consequence of a sale perfectly legal to him, and concerning which he would not be listened to in any court of justice, on an application by him to set it aside. Section 1667, Civil Code, has no application here. When it does apply the contract is wholly void, as to the whole world. When the contract is unlawful the contracting parties have no standing in a court of justice. As soon as that appears the litigants are dismissed from the forum. Here the subject-matter of Bihler's complaint is only remotely and incidentally connected with the purchase by Mrs. Hanna. His contract is suretyship for Mrs. Hanna, for money borrowed by her of the plaintiffs. To enforce Bihler's contention we must hold that because Mrs. Hanna purchased property at her own sale, as executrix, without any objection by the heirs or devisees, and borrowed money of the plaintiffs to pay it to the estate, for the repayment of which Bihler became surety, Bihler's contract of suretyship never had any validity. One other matter should be recollected. The heirs or devisees cannot have the sale to Mrs. Hanna set aside without paying back to her the money she has paid for it. It is equity that it should be repaid. The heirs or devisees, asking equity, must do equity. The above is so well settled that it needs no citation of authority to support it. But see decree of court in Campbell v. Walker, 5 Ves. supra; Fox v. Mackreth, 1 Lead. Cas. Eq. 234, 257, 260. Hence, inasmuch as she lost nearly $10,000 by the transaction, she would doubtless be perfectly willing to have the sale set aside on the usual equitable terms. The parties aggrieved cannot set aside the sale without paying back the money; but, if the opinion of the majority is correct, Bihler can. A strange legal conclusion, certainly. Here a note was given, with Bihler as a party, and the plaintiff makes out his right to recover without having to prove anything of the transaction said to be illegal. "In Connecticut, in 1849," says Robinson, (5 Rob. Prac. 534,) "while admitting that, if a plaintiff requires any aid from an illegal transaction to establish his demand, he cannot recover it,—or, in other words, if he is unable to support it without relying upon an unlawful agreement between himself and the defendant, he must fail,—yet considers that, though the parties have been engaged in business either malum in se or merely prohibited by law, if the cause of action be unconnected with the illegal act, and is founded upon a distinct and collateral consideration, it will not be affected by their former unlawful conduct. Phalen v. Clark, 19 Conn. 432. Pertinent to this view is the case in the same year of Gregg v. Wyman, 4 Cush. 329, and the case before the supreme court of the United States in 1854, in which Nelson, J., delivering the opinion of the court, said: 'The assignment was subsequent, collateral to, and wholly independent of the illegal transactions upon which the principal contract was founded.' McBlair v. Gibbes, 17 How. 235, 236." We understand the above to be the well-settled rule of law. The plaintiffs herein make their claim on their note, and base no claim on the illegal transaction. The defendant cannot set it up in defense; and the cases above cited from 5 Rob. Prac. sustain this view.

This is a singular case. Mrs. Hanna lost nearly $10,000 by the transaction, all of which the parties interested in the estate got. Still it is held that the defendant got rid of his obligation because the plaintiffs lent money to Mrs. Hanna to enable her to pay for the property bought by her. I think the judgment is without error, and should be affirmed.

It should be noted that the prevailing opinion overrules the well-considered case of Boyd v. Blankman, supra, without alluding to it.

In re Walkerly's Estate. (No. 12,950.)

Homestead for Widow.

1. Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1476, provides that where a homestead has been selected during the marriage, and it is sought to have it set apart to the family after the death of the husband, there shall be a sale of the property, and payment of $5,000 to the family in lieu of the homestead, where it exceeds that amount in value, and cannot be divided; but, in determining whether it is worth more than $5,000, the value is to be fixed as of the time when it was selected. Sections 1465 and 1468, authorizing a homestead to be set apart to the family of a decedent where none has been selected before his death, contain no limitations as to the value of such homestead; nor is there any authority for paying money in lieu of a homestead, where none has been declared. Held, that where no homestead has been declared it is in the discretion of the court to set apart one worth more, at the time of decedent's death, than $5,000.

2. Decedent, who had not made any declaration of homestead during his life, left an estate worth $500,000. The homestead occupied by the family at his death was worth $18,000, and was indivisible. Held, that it was not an abuse of the court's discretion to set it apart for the family, though liberal provisions had been made for them by the will.

Beatty, C. J., and Thornton, J., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; N. Hamilton, Judge.

L. Quint, for appellants. Hall & Rogers, for respondents.

Works, J. This is an appeal by the trustees and legatees under the will of the testator from an order setting apart to the widow and child of the deceased a homestead. The whole of the property of the deceased was his separate property, and was of the value of $500,000 over and above the indebtedness. The homestead occupied by the family at his death was of the value of $18,000, and was indivisible. The court below set apart this homestead to the widow and child for a limited time. It is contended that this was error, for the reason that the court could not set apart a probate homestead greater in value than $5,000. The provisions of the Code authorizing a homestead to be set apart to the family of a decedent, where none has been selected before his death, contains no limitation as to the value of such homestead. Code Civil Proc. §§ 1465, 1468. There is such a limitation where a homestead is declared before his death. Id. §§ 1474, 1475. And in that case, where it is sought to have the same set apart to the family after his death, provision is made for a sale of the property and payment of $5,000 to the family as or in lieu of the homestead, where it exceeds that amount in value, and cannot be divided. Id. § 1476. There is no provision for the payment of money in lieu of the property where no homestead has been declared, and this court has held that it cannot be done in this class of cases. Estate of Noah, 73 Cal. 590, 15 Pac. Rep. 290. Therefore, if we hold in this case that a homestead exceeding $5,000 in value cannot be set apart, we must hold that the court is wholly without the power to set apart any homestead. Counsel for appellants rely upon the following cases as supporting their contention that the homestead set apart must be limited to not exceeding $5,000 in value: Estate of Burns, 54 Cal. 223; Kearney v. Kearney, 72 Cal. 591, 15 Pac. Rep. 769; Estate of Noah, 73 Cal. 590, 15 Pac. Rep. 290; Kingsley v. Kingsley, 39 Cal. 666. It must be conceded that some of the language used in these cases supports the position taken by the appellants, but a careful examination of them reveals the fact that they do not decide the question. In Estate of Burns, while the court remarked, in passing, that the "homestead mentioned and referred to in article 2 [which is referred to in section 1465 for the procedure to be resorted to in setting off the homestead] must not exceed $5,000," the only question decided was that the appeal was not properly taken, and the same was dismissed. It will be seen that the remark made here, that the homestead must be limited to $5,000 in value, was based upon the fact that section 1465 requires the homestead to be set apart, "in the manner provided in article 2 of this chapter, out of the real estate belonging to the decedent," and that article 2 limited the value of the homestead as stated. But the portion of article 2 of the chapter referred to, if it had the effect claimed for it, which we very much doubt, has been repealed, and can no longer be looked to as a part of the law on the subject. Estate of McCauley, 50 Cal. 545; Mawson v. Mawson, Id. 541. If, therefore, it be conceded that article 2 of the chapter had the effect to limit the value of the homestead to be set apart, it must be clear that by the repeal thereof the limitation thereby imposed was taken away, leaving section 1465 to stand alone, and without any such limitation. In Kearney v. Kearney the homestead had been appraised at $4,200, and set apart in the administration of the estate, and the action before the court was to set aside the order on the ground of fraud and want of notice to the heirs, and on the further ground that the value of the homestead could not exceed $1,000. The court, as in the other case, remarked that the "section referred to provides for a homestead of not exceeding $5,000." The point made, and the one the court was discussing, was that only $1,000 worth of land could be taken for a homestead. As the homestead in that case did not exceed $5,000, the case, so far as it can be construed as holding that a homestead, in excess of that amount, cannot be set apart, must be regarded as a mere dictum. The statement in the opinion, to that effect, should be given but little weight, for the reason that the question now presented was not in the mind of the court, and could not have been considered. The case of Estate of Noah was one in which it was held that the property, being used exclusively as business property, and of the value of $25,000, could not be set aside as a homestead. The decision rests upon the sole ground that the property was not such as "could have been selected as a homestead during the continuance of the marriage," and that for that reason it could not be set apart as such after the death of the husband. In the case of Kingsley v. Kingsley the right to the homestead was denied for the sole reason that the property was partnership property, and not within the terms of the statute.

It must be seen, therefore, that these cases cannot aid us in arriving at a conclusion upon the question now presented. As we have seen, where the homestead has been selected during the marriage there is a limitation upon its value, but this court has held that the limitation referred to relates to the time the homestead was selected, and not to the time it is set apart by the probate court, and that, if the homestead did not exceed $5,000 in value at the time it was selected, it may, as between the widow and heirs, be set off to the family, although it has increased to a value greatly in excess of that sum. Burdick's Estate, 76 Cal. 639, 18 Pac. Rep. 805. If such a construction can be placed upon a statute expressly limiting the value of the homestead, we are unable to see upon what ground it can be held that a limitation should be placed upon it when the statute contains no such limitation. It seems to us that to so construe the section under consideration would be nothing less than judicial legislation. We must consider the sections relating to probate homesteads, where none have been previously selected, without reference to the provisions relating to voluntary homesteads, if we hope to avoid confusion. Their provisions are entirely unlike, and are not in any way dependent upon each other. The appraisement provided for in section 1476 applies to a selected homestead, and the value is to be fixed as of the time the homestead was selected. Section 1465 does not, in itself, require any appraisement. So much of section 1476 as requires an appraisement cannot be applied here, for the reason that it relates to a selected homestead and to an entirely different time. Under the latter section (1476) the homestead is treated as having vested at the time of its selection. Under section 1465 it is created by the order of the court. There is strong reason for holding that under one of these sections a limitation was intended, and not under the other. In one instance the selection is made by the party himself; in the other the selection and setting apart of the homestead is by the court. While it is fair to presume that the party will select a homestead of as great a value as he can, it is equally fair to presume that the court will give the family such an one as is just and proper, considering the amount and condition of the estate. Therefore in one case a limitation was necessary; in the other, it was not.

It is insisted by the appellants that the condition of this estate was such that, considering the liberal provision made for the wife and child of the deceased by his will, so valuable a homestead should not have been allowed. But this was a matter within the discretion of the court below, and, unless it appears that such discretion has been abused, we think this court should not interfere. The estate here is a large one, and we cannot say, from the evidence before us, that the court below abused its discretion in the matter. Order affirmed.

Raisch v. Board of Education of the City and County of San Francisco. (No. 11,955.)

Mandamus—To County Boards.

1. St. Cal. 1871–72, p. 846, § 7, provides that payments from the school fund of San Francisco shall be made by the city and county treasurer only on drafts drawn on him by the board of education. Held, that a writ of mandate would issue in favor of one who had fully performed all the conditions of a contract he had with the board, but for the payment for which it refused to draw any drafts, as the only ordinary action he could maintain would be against the members of the board for neglect of official duty in not drawing the draft, which would not be as convenient, beneficial, and effective as the writ.

2. Under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1090, providing that if, in an application for a writ of mandate, a question of fact essential to the determination of the motion be raised, and affecting the substantial rights of the parties, the court may order the question to be tried before a jury, the question whether the board had a semblance of cause for rejecting plaintiff's claim is properly left to the determination of a jury, though St. Cal. 1871–72, p. 846, § 1, subd. 12, gives the board power to reject any demand against it "for good cause, of which said board shall be sole judge."

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; M. A. Edmonds, Judge.

Application for a writ of mandate by Frederick Raisch against the board of education of the city and county of San Francisco. From a judgment awarding the writ, defendant appeals. Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1090, provides: "If an answer be made [to the application for the writ] which raises a question as to a matter of fact essential to the determination of the motion, and affecting the substantial rights of the parties, * * * the court may, in its discretion, order the question to be tried before a jury."

John L. Love and George Flournoy, Jr., City and County Atty., for appellant. Otto Tum Suden, for respondent.

Belcher, C. C. This is an appeal from a judgment awarding the respondent a writ of mandate, and the case comes here on the judgment roll. The facts stated in the complaint are, in substance, as follows: The respondent and appellant, under and by virtue and authority of a statute of this state, entered into a written contract, by which respondent agreed to furnish appellant, during the fiscal year 1884–85, rubber hose of a certain description and quality, and appellant agreed to pay, or cause to be paid, to respondent therefor a sum of money equal to 35 cents for each and every lineal foot of hose so furnished, delivered, and accepted. In pursuance of this contract respondent furnished to appellant, during the year named, 1,000 feet of hose at one time, and 500 feet at another time, which was all of the kind and quality named in the contract, and was received and accepted by appellant. In due time respondent presented his claim, and demanded that appellant draw drafts in his favor upon the school fund of the city and county of San Francisco for the amounts due him for the hose according to the contract price, but appellant refused, and has ever since refused, to draw the drafts. It is further stated that respondent has no plain, speedy, and adequate remedy in the ordinary course of law. Respondent commenced this proceeding to compel appellant to draw the drafts asked for. Appellant interposed a general demurrer to the complaint, which was overruled, and then answered. After trial the court found that all the allegations of the complaint were true, and all the allegations of the answer were untrue, and by its judgment granted the relief prayed for.

In support of the appeal it is claimed that respondent had a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy by an ordinary action at law against appellant, and hence was not entitled to the remedy of mandamus. It is said: "Petitioner should first sue the board, get a judgment, (if possible,) and then have writ issued." It is admitted that appellant is a corporation created for school purposes, and that its powers and duties are defined by an act of the legislature of this state approved April 1, 1872. St. 1871–72, p. 846. Section 2 of that act, subd. 1, makes it the duty of the board of education of the city and county of San Francisco to furnish all necessary supplies for the several schools under its care, and directs how they should be obtained. Section 7 provides for the disposition of all moneys received or collected for school purposes as follows: "All moneys received or collected on account of public education in the city and county of San Francisco shall be deposited in the city treasury, and be known as the 'School Fund.' Payments from said fund shall only be made by the treasurer of the said city and county upon drafts drawn on him by the board of education, signed by the president and the superintendent of common schools, and countersigned by the auditor of said city and county; and all drafts shall be made payable to the person or persons entitled to receive the same." And section 1, subd. 12, declares that the board shall have power "to examine and allow, in whole or in part, every demand payable out of the school fund, or to reject any such demand for good cause, of which the said board shall be the sole judge."

The argument is that the board was clothed with discretionary power to allow or reject the respondent's claim, and that its discretion cannot be controlled by the courts in a proceeding like this. There can be no doubt that the board was authorized to purchase, and did purchase and receive, the hose, and that respondent fully performed all the conditions of the contract on his part. This is established by the findings, and they are not assailed. It is also clear that the respondent's claim must be paid, if paid at all, out of the school fund, and that such payment can only be made by a draft or drafts drawn by the board, and signed and countersigned by the designated officers. It is not pretended that respondent had any cause of action against the city and county. This being so, it is evident that, when the board purchased and received the hose, it became a matter of official duty on its part to pay the agreed price. And when it refused to do so the respondent must necessarily have had some remedy to enforce payment. It could not, of course, appropriate the hose, and leave the party furnishing it remediless. The only question, then, is, what was his remedy? Had he a plain, speedy, and adequate one by an ordinary action at law?

It has been held in this state that, to supersede the remedy by mandamus, the party must not only have a specific, adequate legal remedy, but one competent to afford relief upon the very subject-matter of his application, and one which is equally convenient, beneficial, and effective as the proceeding by mandamus. Fremont v. Crippen, 10 Cal. 215; Babcock v. Goodrich, 47 Cal. 508; Railroad Co. v. Railroad Co., Id. 551. The board contracted to pay respondent for the hose which he furnished, but, as it only had power to pay by drawing drafts on the school fund, its contract must be construed to be one to draw drafts, and not to pay money directly. If, then, respondent could have maintained an ordinary action, it must have been an action against the members of the board to recover damages for neglect of duty. But such an action evidently would not have been equally convenient, beneficial, and effective as the proceeding by mandamus, since it would not have compelled the board to do what it had contracted to do, and what, as we have seen, official duty required it to do.

The argument that the board had the discretion to allow or reject the claim, and that its action was final and conclusive so far as this proceeding is concerned, is without weight. It is true that, under the statute, the board may reject any demand "for good cause." But, although the board is to be "the sole judge" of what is good cause, still the rejection cannot be arbitrary or capricious. There must at least be the semblance of a cause. The board, after obtaining materials which it has ordered and needs for school purposes, cannot say: "True, the materials are of the kind and quality ordered, but we have concluded not to pay for them, and therefore reject the demand." And whether there was a semblance of cause for rejecting the claim or not, was a question which might be and was properly tried in the court below. Code Civil Proc. § 1090. If there was no semblance of cause, then it is clear that it was the duty of the board to draw the drafts, and the writ was properly granted to compel the performance of this duty. See Wood v. Strother, 76 Cal. 545, 18 Pac. Rep. 766, where the authorities upon the subject are very fully collated and reviewed. Our conclusion is that the judgment was right, and we therefore advise that it be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNE, C.; FOOTE, C.

I dissent: PATERSON, J.

FOX, J. I dissent. The contract set up in substance in the opinion was one made by competent authority on the part of a municipal corporation, for the purchase of certain goods which it has received under the contract, and now refuses to pay for. The refusal is a simple breach of contract, for which the party has an ample remedy by action. I see no reason why a municipal corporation should be treated differently from a natural person in such a case.

THORNTON, J. I dissent. The applicant for the writ in this case has never presented his claim to the board of education for their examination and allowance, and consequently he is not in a position to ask a mandate from a court to command the board of education to draw a draft in his favor for any sum payable out of the school fund of the city and county of San Francisco. Section 82 of the consolidation act provides that no payment can be made from the treasury or out of the public funds of said city and county unless the same be specifically authorized by this act, nor unless the demand which is paid be duly audited, as in this act provided, and that must appear on the face of it. Section 83 of the same act provides that "the term 'audited,' as used in the act with reference to demands upon the treasury, is to be understood their having been presented to and passed upon by every officer and board of officers, and finally allowed by law; and this must appear upon the face of the paper representing the demand, or else it is not audited." Section 84 of the same act is as follows: "Sec. 84. Every demand upon the treasury, except the salary of the auditor, and including [the] salary of the treasurer, must, before it can be paid, be presented to the auditor of the city and county to be allowed, who shall satisfy himself whether the money is legally due and remains unpaid, and whether the payment thereof from the treasury of the city and county is authorized by law, and out of what fund. If he allow it, he shall indorse upon it the word 'Allowed,' with the name of the fund out of which it is payable, with the date of such allowance, and sign his name thereto; but the allowance or approval of the auditor, or of the board of supervisors, or any other board or officer, of any demand, which upon the face of it appears not to have been expressly made by law payable out of the treasury or fund to be charged therewith, shall afford no warrant to the treasurer or other disbursing officer for paying the same. No demand can be approved, allowed, audited, or paid, unless it specify each several item, date, and value composing it, and refer to the law by title, date, and section authorizing the same." Section 85 of the act contains the following provision as to demands payable out of the school fund: "All demands payable out of the school fund must, before they can be allowed by the auditor or paid, be personally approved by the board of education, or by the president thereof, and superintendent of common schools, acting under the express authorization of said board." The school fund is kept by the treasurer of the city and county. Section 95, Consolidation Act, subd. 2. By the act of April, 1872, (St. 1871-72, p. 846,) the board of education has power "to examine and allow, in whole or in part, every demand payable out of the school fund, or to reject any such demand for good cause, of which the said board shall be the sole judge." The seventh section of the act of 1872 is as follows: "Sec. 7. All moneys received or collected on account of public education in the city and county of San Francisco shall be deposited in the city treasury, and be known as the 'School Fund.' Payments from said fund shall only be made by the treasurer of the said city and county upon drafts drawn on him by the board of education, signed by the president and superintendent of common schools, and countersigned by the auditor of said city and county, and all drafts shall be made payable to the person or persons entitled to receive the same."

Upon a consideration of these provisions of the statutes, valid in their enactment, I cannot perceive what right the applicant has for the mandate he asks. It does not appear that the demand has ever been presented to the board of education for examination or allowance. The board has had no opportunity to examine it and allow it or reject it. Non constat, that when properly presented, as required by law, i. e., with the specifications of each item, date, and value, (section 34, Consolidation Act,) it will not be allowed. It has never been presented to the auditor for his action, as the law requires. The appellant is not entitled to a draft for the amount until his demand has been audited and allowed, and this audit and allowance indorsed on the claim. Such is the distinct provision of the statute as cited above. The petition for the writ fails to aver that any of these things have been done. The averments in each count of the complaint are that the plaintiff presented to the board the certificate in writing of Edward Casserly, the duly appointed and acting storekeeper of the board, to the effect that he (Casserly) had received from plaintiff the hose contracted for, and demanded a draft. This is not a presentation of the demand which the statute requires, and is insufficient. The findings show no ground for ordering the writ to issue. The law does not enjoin on the board of education the duty of drawing a draft in favor of a claimant until his demand has been presented and allowed, as required by law, by the board. The conclusion reached in the prevailing opinion is not sustained by Wood v. Strother, 76 Cal. 545, 18 Pac. Rep. 766. That case was entirely different from this, as a perusal of it will demonstrate. The conclusion here arrived at is sustained by Purdy v. Sinton, 56 Cal. 133; Christie v. Sonoma Co., 60 Cal. 164. If the writ was granted in this case it would control the discretion vested by law in the board of education. This cannot be done. Clune v. Sullivan, 56 Cal. 249; Cosner v. Colusa Co., 58 Cal. 274; Rhodes v. Spencer, 62 Cal. 43. It may be as well to add that, if the mandate asked for here issues, the treasurer would not be justified by law in paying it. The board has had no opportunity here to act, and it is therefore unnecessary to say what would be the remedy of plaintiff, if the board, on its presentation, rejected the claim. It will be in order to consider that question when the claim has been presented to the board and been rejected by it. In my opinion, the judgment of the court below is erroneous. The petition does not state facts sufficient to justify the issuance of the writ, and the demurrer to it should have been sustained The cause should be remanded, with directions to the court below to deny the writ and dismiss the application.

HUMPHREYS et al. v. HOPKINS. (No. 12,626.)

RECEIVERS—EXTRAJURISDICTIONAL POWERS.

Receivers, appointed by an order which does not vest the title to the property in them, but merely directs them to take possession of and preserve it, cannot, when they have sent it into a foreign jurisdiction, reclaim it as against a sheriff who has seized it on attachment at the suit of citizens of the foreign jurisdiction to enforce their demands against the owner of the property. THORNTON and MCFARLAND, JJ., dissenting.

On rehearing. For former report, see 20 Pac. Rep. 713.

Frank M. Stone, for appellant. T. Z. Blakeman, for respondents.

BEATTY, C. J. The plaintiffs in this action are receivers of the road and other property of the Wabash, St. Louis & Pacific Railway Company. They were appointed by the United States circuit court for the eastern district of Missouri, May 25, 1884, by an order made in an action to which the railway company was a party, and were thereby authorized to take possession of said road, to manage, control, and operate it, and preserve and protect all its property. At the date of their appointment a certain freight-car belonging to the company was at Toledo, in the state of Ohio, where, on the 29th of May, 1884, it came into their possession. It was subsequently brought by them, in the course of their business as receivers, to the city of St. Louis, in the state of Missouri, a place within the jurisdiction of the court by which they were appointed. On the 16th of March, 1885, they loaded the car with freight consigned to San Francisco, intending that when the freight was unloaded at San Francisco the car should be returned to St. Louis. While the car was in San Francisco it was attached by the defendant, as sheriff of San Francisco, in a suit brought by Henry Payot and Isaac Upham against the railway company. Payot and Upham were citizens of California, resident and doing business in San Francisco. This action was thereupon commenced by the plaintiffs to recover the car so attached. The judgment of the superior court was in their favor. Defendant appeals.

The question presented by the appeal is whether a receiver appointed in a foreign jurisdiction to take possession of the property of a railway corporation, and carry on its business, and who in pursuance of his authority as such receiver has taken the property into his actual possession within the jurisdiction of the court by which he was appointed, can hold such property against the claim of a citizen of this state who, upon finding the property here, has, in pursuance of our laws, caused it to be attached as security for his just demands against the railway company. Counsel for appellant contends for the proposition that a foreign receiver has no capacity to sue in his official character in our courts, but we do not understand the authorities to sustain this extreme view. The question, however, need not be decided in this case, for the plaintiffs, besides being receivers of the road, had an actual and lawful possession of the property at the time of its seizure, and by virtue of that possession could undoubtedly have recovered it from a mere trespasser. But their mere possession of the property of a foreign debtor cannot be held to exempt it from the claims of attaching creditors. A debtor cannot, by placing or allowing his property to be in the possession of a third party, screen it from attachment. However lawful the possession of the bailee, the property is still subject to attachment or garnishment at the suit of a creditor of the owner. Such rights as the bailee may have to the use or possession of the property, and such liens as he may have upon it, will, of course, be protected, but, saving the rights of the bailee, the creditor may take it. The question in such cases, therefore, is not as to the lawfulness of the bailee's possession, or his right to recover the property from a mere trespasser; it is a question as to which right is superior,—his or the attaching creditor's. And such is the question here. Conceding, as we think must be conceded, that these plaintiffs could have recovered the car in controversy from a mere wrong-doer, by virtue of their lawful possession at the date of the seizure, if not by virtue of their office, still it remains to be decided whether they could reclaim it from the defendant, who justifies under a writ of attachment issued at the suit of citizens of the state of California to enforce a just demand against the owner of the property. The solution of this question depends upon the effect to be given to the order of the court of Missouri, under whose appointment the plaintiffs are acting. For, we repeat, the mere possession by the plaintiffs of the debtor's property, however lawful, does not screen it from attachment. To show a right superior to that of creditors they must fall back upon the order appointing them receivers, and must depend upon the comity of this state as to the effect to be allowed that order.

The substance of that order has been already stated. It does not pretend to vest the title to the property of the railroad company in the receivers; it merely directs them to take possession of and use the property for the benefit, presumably, of creditors of the company who have resorted to that particular forum for the enforcement of their debts. The authorities as to the effect to be given in other jurisdictions to such orders are collected in a note to the case of Alley v. Caspari, reported in 6 Amer. St. Rep. 185, 14 Atl. Rep. 12. The result is summed up by the editor (page 189) as follows: "We deduce, therefore, from a thorough examination of the cases and text-books upon the subject, that the great weight of authority is, and should be, in keeping with the decision rendered by Mr. Justice WAYNE, in Booth v. Clark, 17 How. 334, that a foreign receiver has no right to sue in another state; but that, on the ground of comity, the court will, in a just and proper exercise of a sound legal discretion, permit such suits to be maintained for the purpose of thereby doing justice, where the good of a larger number would demand it, by recognizing the orders and judgments of the courts of a sister state. But in none of the cases is such right to sue conceded, or the suit permitted to be maintained by the foreign receiver, where the claim sought to be enforced conflicts with the rights of citizens or creditors in the state where the suit is brought." We think that the effect of the decisions is correctly stated in this extract from Mr. Freeman's note, and we think that in this case justice to our own citizens requires that we should not extend the principle of comity so far as to award this property to the representatives of creditors residing in other states, and who are seeking to hold it for their own exclusive benefit. The judgment and order appealed from are reversed, and cause remanded.

We concur: FOX, J.; WORKS, J.; PATERSON, J.

THORNTON, J., (dissenting.) Action to recover a car. Trial by the court, and judgment in favor of plaintiffs. Motion of defendant for a new trial, which was denied. Appeal by defendant from judgment and order denying the motion for a new trial.

It is conceded that on the 25th day of May, 1884, the plaintiffs were, by an order of the United States circuit court for the eastern district of Missouri, wherein the Wabash, St. Louis & Pacific Railway Company was a party, appointed receivers of the railroad, and all the property of the company, with power and instructions to take possession of the railroad, and to manage, control, and operate it, and preserve and protect all its property. It further appears that the car in suit came into the possession of the receivers above named at Toledo, Ohio, on May 29, 1884, when it was delivered by the company to the plaintiffs, as receivers, and that the receivers have used this car in carrying on the business of the railroad from that day until it was attached, as appears in this action, on the 1st day of April, 1885. After the car came into the possession of the receivers it was by them brought, in the course of their business as receivers, to the city of St. Louis, state of Missouri, a place within the jurisdiction of the court by which the plaintiffs were appointed. The receivers, on the 16th day of March, 1885, loaded the car with freight, destined for the city of San Francisco, and sent it so loaded to San Francisco, with the intent that the freight of said car might be delivered at San Francisco, and that the car might then be returned to St. Louis. The car was brought to San Francisco, and while there was attached by Henry Payot and Isaac Upham, citizens of the state of California, in an action wherein said Payot and Upham were plaintiffs, and the above-named railroad company was defendant. Under this attachment the defendant, as sheriff of the city and county of San Francisco, justifies.

It is argued that the plaintiffs, suing as receivers, cannot maintain this action, inasmuch as a receiver cannot maintain an action out of the jurisdiction of the court which appointed him. It may be conceded that this is the general rule, and still the plaintiffs can maintain this action. The right to sue and maintain the action is founded on the possession of the car, delivered to the plaintiffs as receivers by the railroad company, in May, 1884, at Toledo, Ohio, and its being taken from that place by plaintiffs in the course of their management, carrying on, and control of the business of the company, to St. Louis, where it was loaded and sent to the city of San Francisco. This possession was given by the owner of the car, the railroad company, in pursuance of the order of the court, and was never afterwards disturbed by the company. The possession of the car remained in the receivers, unchanged and never interfered with, until it was attached in this state, on the 1st of April, 1885. The plaintiffs, under the undisputed authority of the court making the appointment, and without challenge by the railroad company, were, during the period of this possession, using this car in carrying on the business of the railroad company. The taking possession of the car by the plaintiffs, as receivers, was lawful, and their continued possession was also lawful, and such possession vested in them as individuals a special property, on which title they can as individuals maintain this action. This conclusion is supported both on principle and by authority.

The case of Railway Co. v. Packet Co., 108 Ill. 317, is directly in point. There the contest was between a receiver of the property and effects of the Northern Line Packet Company, regularly appointed by the circuit court of St. Louis, Mo., in an action brought against that company, and an attaching creditor on a writ brought in the circuit court of Adams county, state of Missouri. The court held that the title of the receiver was good against the attaching creditor in the state of Missouri, and judgment was accordingly rendered in favor of the receiver. The court, speaking to the point, said: "The general doctrine that the powers of a receiver are co-extensive only with the jurisdiction of the court making the appointment, and particularly that a foreign receiver should not be permitted, as against the claims of creditors resident in another state, to remove from such state the assets of the debtor, it being the policy of every government to retain in its own hands the property of a debtor until all domestic claims against it have been satisfied, we fully concede; and were this the case of property situate in this state, never having been within the jurisdiction of the court that appointed the receiver, and never having been in the possession of the receiver, it would be covered by the above principles, which would be decisive against the claim of the appellee. But the facts that the property at the time of the appointment of the receiver was within the jurisdiction of the court making the appointment, and was there taken into the actual possession of the receiver, and continued in his possession until it was attached, take the case, as we conceive, out of the range of the foregoing principles. We are of opinion that, by the receiver's taking possession of the barge in question within the jurisdiction of the court that appointed him, he became vested with a special property in the barge, like that which a sheriff acquires by the seizure of goods in execution, and that he was entitled to protect this special property while it continued, by action, in like manner as if he had been the absolute owner. Having taken the property in his possession, he was responsible for it to the court that appointed him, and had given a bond in a large sum to cover his responsibility as receiver, and to meet such liability he might maintain any appropriate proceeding to regain possession of the barge which had been taken from him. Boyle v. Townes, 9 Leigh, 158; Singerly v. Fox, 75 Pa. St. 114. It is well settled that a sheriff does, by the seizure of goods in execution, acquire a special property in them, and that he may maintain trespass, trover, or replevin for them." The court concludes its observations on this point as follows: "By taking the barge into his possession within the jurisdiction of the court that appointed him, a special property in the barge became vested in the receiver; and it is the established rule that, where a legal title to personal property has once passed and become vested in accordance with the law of the state where it is situated, the validity of such title will be recognized everywhere." Citing Cammell v. Sewell, 5 Hurl. & N. 728; Clark v. Peat Co., 35 Conn. 303; Taylor v. Boardman, 25 Vt. 581; Crapo v. Kelly, 16 Wall. 610; Waters v. Barton, 1 Cold. 450. Cagill v. Wooldridge, 8 Baxt. 580, is to the same effect. In that case the contest was also between the receiver and an attaching creditor. The case was ruled in favor of the receiver.

A receiver of an important manufacturing company, appointed by a court of New Jersey, who took possession of its assets for the purpose of completing a bridge which the corporation had contracted to build in Connecticut, purchased iron with the funds of the estate, and sent it into that state, and it was held that the iron was not open to attachment in Connecticut by a creditor residing there. Pond v. Cooke, 45 Conn. 126.

In McAlpin v. Jones, 10 La. Ann. 552, and in Hurd v. City of Elizabeth, 41 N. J. Law, 1, receivers were allowed to maintain actions without the jurisdiction of the court appointing them. In the case cited from 10 La. Ann. the receiver had been appointed by a chancery court in Mississippi. He there took possession of the property, under the order of the appointment. A portion of the property, viz., four slaves, were stolen from the possession of the receiver, and came into the state of Louisiana. The owner brought suit in the latter state, and its highest court adjudged that he could recover. It may be observed that the property sued for in this case was in the possession of the receivers, within the jurisdiction of the court appointing them. The receivers got their possession in Ohio by delivery from the owner, and took the car to St. Louis, where it was within the jurisdiction of the circuit court of the United States for the eastern district of Missouri. The fact that they got possession of the car out of the jurisdiction of the appointing court cannot make any material difference, when the property was at once carried into such jurisdiction, and therein retained in their possession. That it cannot affect the right of plaintiff to recover that the car was afterwards sent by the receivers in the course of their duty, and in the prosecution of the business which they were appointed to carry on, see Railroad Co. v. Packet Co., 108 Ill. 323, 324.

In the same line of decision with the foregoing are Low v. Burrows, 12 Cal. 188, and Lewis v. Adams, 70 Cal. 403, 11 Pac. Rep. 833. In Low v. Burrows the action was brought by the assignee of a judgment recovered in New York. The assignment was made by an administrator in New York. It was contended that the administrator in New York had no right to assign the judgment, the debtor residing at that time beyond the state of New York. This contention was based on the ground that the authority of the administrator did not extend beyond the state in which the letters were granted. The court disposed of this contention adversely to counsel presenting it, and it was held that the administrator, having recovered the judgment, owned it, and could assign it. In Lewis v. Adams, supra, the action was brought on a judgment recovered by the plaintiff, as the executor of the last will of one Nat Lewis against the defendant, P. T. Adams, in the district court for the county of Bexar, state of Texas. In the complaint in this suit the plaintiff described herself as executrix of Lewis, and it was contended that she having been appointed executrix by a Texas court, her authority was confined to the state of Texas, and that she could not maintain any action in this state. It was held that the judgment recovered in Texas vested the title in her; that she was accountable to the court in Texas from which she received her appointment; and that she could maintain the action here on her own title as an individual. The whole subject is ably and fully discussed, and the authorities cited, in the opinion of Justice McKinstry. See 70 Cal. 406, 407, 11 Pac. Rep. 833.

In the same line of decisions is Wilkinson v. Culver, 25 Fed. Rep. 639, where a judgment was recovered by a receiver of a corporation appointed by a New Jersey court, and the receiver, as owner of the judgment in his individual capacity, was allowed to recover on it in an action brought in the United States circuit court for the southern district of New York. See, also, Biddle v. Wilkins, 1 Pet. 686, and Talmage v. Chappel, 16 Mass. 71; Trecothick v. Austin, 4 Mason, 34, 35; Barton v. Higgins, 41 Md. 539; Cherry v. Speight, 28 Tex. 503; Rucks v. Taylor, 49 Miss. 552. The three cases last cited were actions brought by foreign administrators on judgments which they had recovered as such administrators in their own states, and they were allowed to sue upon the judgments in their own names in the other states. See, also, Morton v. Hatch, 54 Mo. 408.

On this subject Justice Story, in his able work on Conflict of Laws, makes the following observations: "516. And here it may be necessary to attend to a distinction important in its nature and consequences. If a foreign administrator has, in virtue of his administration, reduced the personal property of the deceased, there situated, into his own possession, so that he has acquired the legal title thereto, according to the laws of that country, if that property should afterwards be found in another country, or be carried away and converted there against his will, he may maintain a suit for it there in his own name and right personally, without taking out new letters of administration; for he is, to all intents and purposes, the legal owner thereof, although he is so in the character of trustee for other persons. In like manner, if a specific legacy of personal property is bequeathed in a foreign country, and the legatee has, under an administration there, been admitted to the full possession and ownership by the administrator, he may afterwards sue, in his own name, for any injury or conversion of such property, in another country where the property or wrongdoer may be found, without any probate of the will there. The plain reason in each of these cases is that the executor and the legatee have, each in his own right, become full and perfect legal owners of the property by the local law; and a title to personal property, duly acquired by the lex loci rei sitæ, will be deemed valid, and be respected as a lawful and perfect title in every other country. 517. The like principle will apply where an executor or administrator, in virtue of an administration abroad, becomes there possessed of negotiable notes belonging to deceased, which are payable to bearer; for then he becomes the legal owner and bearer by virtue of his administration, and may sue thereon in his own name, and he need not take out letters of administration in the state where the debtor resides in order to maintain a suit against him. And for a like reason it would seem that negotiable paper of the deceased, payable to order, actually held and indorsed by a foreign executor or administrator in the foreign country, who is capable there of passing the legal title by such indorsement, would confer a complete legal title on the indorsee, so that he ought to be treated in every other country as the legal indorsee, and allowed to sue thereon accordingly, in the same manner that he would be if it were a transfer of any personal goods or merchandise of the deceased situate in such foreign country." Story, Confl. Laws, §§ 516, 517. To support the statements of the text, the learned author cites decided cases in the notes to the sections quoted. The cases above referred to are all governed by the rule that a title to personal property, once vested and duly acquired by the lex rei sitæ, will be deemed valid, and be respected as a lawful and perfect title in every other country. Id. § 384.

There is nothing in the foregoing in conflict with what is laid down in Booth v. Clark, 17 How. 322. In that case the action was attempted to be maintained in the circuit court for the District of Columbia on the mere order of a chancery court of the state of New York appointing a receiver

Booth, who was so appointed, failed to show that he had ever had possession of the claim, or the evidences of the claim, the proceeds of which the plaintiff (Booth) endeavored to recover. On the contrary, the claim had always remained in the possession of Clark until it went into the hands of his assignee in bankruptcy, and came back to Clark's possession under a purchase by Clark at a sale made by his assignee. The court dwells on the delay of the receiver to take steps to get possession of this claim as a material fact in the case. After pointing out the means by which, through the aid of the court, he could have obtained possession of this claim, it is observed in the opinion: "Such, however, was not the course pursued in this case, though the debtor was then a resident of the state of New York, and amenable to the jurisdiction of the court. No motion was made to force Clark to comply with the injunction which Camara had obtained under the creditor's bill. The matter was allowed to rest for seven years, Camara being aware that Clark had a pecuniary claim upon the republic of Mexico, at least as early as in the year 1843. The receiver during all that time took no action."

The essential nature of the action in Booth v. Clark is correctly set forth in the opinion of the court in Hazard v. Durant, 19 Fed. Rep. 477. It was there characterized, and properly characterized, as an action by a receiver, a mere officer and servant of the court appointing him, and having no title to the fund by assignment or conveyance, or other lien or interest than that derived from his appointment. It may be well conceded that such an officer, on such a showing of title, cannot recover in a foreign jurisdiction. If Booth, the receiver in Booth v. Clark, had, after his appointment as receiver, got possession of the Mexican claim prior to its coming to the hands of Clark's assignee in bankruptcy, and such had been made to appear in his action, the court, would, no doubt, in accordance with the principle of its rule laid down in Biddle v. Wilkins, 1 Pet., supra, have held in favor of Booth. Booth would then have shown an individual and personal right to recover. The cases cited by the counsel for appellant, which follow Booth v. Clark, are like it in the material feature above pointed out. The receiver in all such cases relied on his order of appointment merely, to recover. It cannot escape observation that if this court sanctions the contention of appellant's counsel it will authorize the taking of property from the hands of a court, having ample jurisdiction, which has, through the agency of a receiver, (its own instrument,) gotten lawful possession of property, and whose possession was lawful, when this property was attached here.

The statements made in the note referred to in the prevailing opinion relate merely to a suit by a receiver in a foreign jurisdiction, where he has never reduced the property to possession, and relies solely on the order of appointment to recover, as a careful perusal of the note will make evident. There is no case cited in the note which holds that a receiver, after he has reduced the property of the litigant to possession, and it is taken from him, cannot sue for it in any jurisdiction where he can find it. The title vests in the appointed receiver when he has reduced the property to possession, and on this title he can recover. His right to recover rests on his right and title procured in the mode above pointed out, and is not allowed in any consideration of comity. Title vests, and in consequence a right to recover in the courts of every civilized country, as a matter, not of comity, but of right. No court has the right to take the property of one person and give it to another, or have it sold for the benefit of another. Considerations of comity only arise where the receiver sues in a foreign jurisdiction on the mere order of appointment. Considerations of comity allow such suit, where there is no legal policy which forbids it, and it does not affect the rights of creditors or other persons, citizens of the jurisdiction where the suit is brought. Such is Hurd v. Elizabeth, 41 N. J. Law, 1, where the suit was allowed to be maintained on considerations of comity. The special property vested in the receiver gives him a title on which he can recover anywhere. A sheriff gets only a special property where he has levied an execution, and on such title he can sue and recover anywhere. If a sheriff of this state seizes horses under a writ of attachment or execution within its limits, and the horses escape into the state of Nevada, and were taken possession of by a third person, we cannot see why he cannot recover in a suit in a Nevada court, even against an attaching creditor there.

The title of the receiver vested when he reduced this car to possession by the consent of the corporation. He sent it out of the state of Missouri, where he had it, for a lawful purpose. Why has a creditor a right to attach it? It was not the property of the corporation when it was attached, but of the receiver of the court, of which the receiver is the hand and instrument. I cannot conceive how a creditor can attach the property of one person to pay a debt due him by another. The statement in the complaint that the plaintiffs were appointed receivers by the court of Missouri shows the origin of plaintiffs' right; but it is further alleged that the plaintiffs took possession of the car, and held it in possession until such possession was interfered with by the defendant, as afterwards stated in the complaint. The plaintiffs count specially on their own possession. We see nothing herein to prevent the plaintiffs from recovering on their individual rights. The averment as to their being receivers may be regarded as descriptio personæ, and may be rejected as surplusage, in accordance with the rule laid down in Lewis v. Adams, 70 Cal. 411, 412, 11 Pac. Rep. 833. I find no error in the record, and think that the judgment and order should be affirmed.

McFARLAND, J. I dissent, and concur in most of the views expressed in the dissenting opinion of THORNTON, J.

ROGERS v. BORCHARD. (No. 13,216.)

DEEDS—EVIDENCE.

A deed purporting to convey all of defendant's "right, title, and interest" in certain premises is not admissible in evidence to show compliance with an agreement by defendant to execute to plaintiff "a good and sufficient deed of bargain and sale to said property, free and clear of all incumbrances," and it is immaterial that the trial is by the court without a jury.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Ventura county; B. T. WILLIAMS, Judge.

Action by E. F. Rogers against Johanas Borchard. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff's motion for a new trial denied, and he appeals.

Hall & Poplin, (W. C. Stratton, of counsel,) for appellant. McKeeby & Smith and N. C. Bledsoe, (W. H. Wilde, of counsel,) for respondent.

SHARPSTEIN, J. The plaintiff and defendant entered into a written agreement, wherein the defendant agreed to sell and convey to plaintiff lands in Ventura county, and, upon certain payments being made, to execute and deliver to plaintiff a good and sufficient deed of bargain and sale of the premises, free and clear of all incumbrances. The plaintiff was to and did pay defendant $1,200 at the time the agreement was entered into, but made no other payment; claiming, among other things, that defendant did not have title to a large portion of the land. Plaintiff brought this action to recover the $1,200 paid to defendant as above stated. On the trial plaintiff introduced in evidence the agreement set forth in the complaint, in which, for the consideration mentioned therein, the defendant promised to execute and deliver to plaintiff "a good and sufficient deed of bargain and sale to said property, free and clear of all incumbrances." To prove that he had executed such a deed the defendant offered in evidence a deed which purported to grant, bargain, and sell and convey unto the plaintiff, and to his heirs and assigns, forever, all the right, title, and interest of the defendant in and to certain tracts and parcels of land therein described. Plaintiff objected to its introduction on the ground that it is not such a deed as the agreement called for, (1) because it is not a grant, bargain, and sale deed; (2) because it does not purport to convey the land described in the complaint, or any part thereof, or interest therein, except such as the defendant had at the time of the execution of the deed; that it is a quitclaim deed; (3) because the land described in it is not the same land described in the complaint. Objection overruled, and plaintiff excepted.

The principal question being, did the defendant comply with his agreement? any evidence that shows, or tends to show, that he did was admissible. He agreed to execute and deliver to plaintiff a good and sufficient deed of bargain and sale to the premises, conveying the same free and clear of all incumbrances. To prove a compliance with that agreement, a deed was offered in evidence, which purported to convey all the right, title, and interest of the defendant in and to said premises, which clearly did not prove, or tend to prove, a compliance with the agreement. Respondent's counsel replies, admitting this to be so, but asserts that it became the duty of the court when the deed was offered in evidence to construe it, and that "in order to construe it, the deed must first be admitted in evidence." We think otherwise. When the deed was offered in evidence, and objection made to its introduction, it became the duty of the court to examine it sufficiently to enable it to determine whether it was admissible or not, and, if not, to sustain the objection to its introduction in evidence. As was said in Mason v. Wolf, 40 Cal. 246: "We think this evidence inadmissible, and none the less so because the case was tried by the court without a jury." Order denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial reversed.

Thornton, J. I concur.

McFarland, J. I concur in the judgment, because it appears that the deed erroneously admitted in evidence must necessarily have entered largely into the considerations which moved the court to give judgment for respondent. I do not think that Judge Temple intended to say, or did say, in Mason v. Wolf, 40 Cal. 249, that a judgment must be reversed for every abstract error committed in ruling upon the admissibility of evidence, when the case is tried without a jury; and I fear that the leading opinion in the case at bar might bear that construction. Greenleaf on Evidence says (volume 1, § 49) as follows: "In trials of fact without the aid of a jury, the question of the admissibility of evidence, strictly speaking, can seldom be raised; since, whatever be the ground of objection, the evidence objected to must, of necessity, be read or heard by the judge, in order to determine its character and value. In such cases the only question, in effect, is upon the sufficiency and weight of the evidence." While this language may state the principle too strongly, still, in my opinion, a judgment in a case tried without a jury should not be reversed for the erroneous admission of one piece of evidence, unless the error shows that the case was tried upon a wrong theory, or appears to have been in some way material, important, and clearly prejudicial to the rights of the losing party.

In re Grider's Estate. (No. 12,840.)

Wills—Devise to Widow—Rights of Children.

1. Under Civil Code Cal. § 1307, providing that, where a testator dies leaving children unprovided for by his will, it not appearing that such omission was intentional, they shall take as if he had died intestate, a widow to whom her husband devised all his property, without mention of his children, takes only as a tenant in common with the children.

2. Under a decree of distribution adjudging that the petitioner has succeeded to all the right, title, and interest of the widow, and is entitled to the share of said estate described in his petition, and further decreeing that said estate is hereby finally distributed and set apart to said petitioner, the petition alleging that petitioner has succeeded by deed from the widow to a certain part of the real estate left by said decedent, and to all the interest of said devisee, the petitioner takes only the widow's interest in common with the children, though all the real estate left by decedent was described. Beatty, C. J., and Works, J., dissenting.

3. Pending the administration of the estate, an assignee of the interest of a co-tenant cannot acquire title against his co-tenants by limitation.

McGee & Barnham, for appellants. J. C. Bates, for respondents.

Fox, J. H. C. Grider died May 29, 1872, seised of the lands involved in this proceeding. He left a widow, Sarah or Sallie Grider, and three children, N. G. Grider, T. S. Grider, and E. E. Grider then aged, respectively, 14, 12, and 8 years. He also left a will, making his widow sole devisee, and wholly omitting all provision for or mention of his children, or either of them. On or about the 24th day of June, 1872, said will was admitted to probate by the probate court of the county of Lake, and letters testamentary issued to said Sallie Grider. Administration of the estate has never been closed.

The present proceeding is one inaugurated in the superior court of that county, sitting in probate, by petition filed by said children under section 1664 of the Code of Civil Procedure, under which such proceedings have been had as that R. D. Merritt, the respondent herein, appeared and set up a claim that he was the sole owner in fee of the real estate described in the record, the same having been acquired through a chain of mesne conveyances from Sarah Grider down to himself, and a decree of partial distribution of said estate of H. C. Grider, made to him as successor in interest of said Sarah Grider by the said probate court on the 22d day of December, 1875. Upon this claim issue was joined, and a trial had, resulting in a judgment in favor of said Merritt from which, and from an order denying a new trial, this appeal was taken.

The court finds the facts in regard to the death of said Grider, his seisin in the land, his survivors, the making and probate of the will, and the terms thereof, as hereinabove stated. It fails to find whether or not said Sarah Grider ever conveyed her interest, or any interest, in the real estate described in the complaint, to any person, or whether or not there is any conveyance, or chain of conveyances, connecting the title claimed by this respondent with the said Grider title. But it does find, and recites in the fifth finding, that on 22d of December, 1875, in the probate court, and on the petition of said respondent, a judgment was entered in the matter of said estate, which judgment it sets out in hæc verba. That judgment, after reciting the jurisdictional facts, some of which are not otherwise proved in the record, proceeds to adjudge and determine that the petitioner R. D. Merritt "has succeeded to all the rights, title, and interest of said Sallie Grider, the sole devisee of the last will and testament of said H. C. Grider, deceased, and is entitled to the share of said estate in his petition and hereinafter described." And it further proceeds to decree that the real estate described in the petition, describing the same, (and being the same described in the complaint in this cause,) "be distributed to the said R. D. Merritt, upon his giving bond," etc., and finally adjudges: "It is adjudged and decreed that the estate hereinbefore described is hereby finally distributed and set apart to said petitioner R. D. Merritt, free and clear from further administration in said estate." The court further finds that the plaintiffs herein have never had set apart or distributed to them any part or parcel of said estate. In the sixth finding, after reciting the will, the court finds "that the said petitioners, appellants herein, are not, nor is either of them now, or at the time of filing their petition herein were, entitled to have any share or interest in the land and premises described in the petition herein set apart or distributed to them, or either of them." In the seventh and last finding of fact the court finds that the respondent here "claims" and "has a title to the land and premises described in the petition herein, and the whole thereof, from a separate and independent title from that of H. C. Grider, deceased, as follows," and then proceeds to set out that on the 14th of August, 1872, the said R. D. Merritt entered into the possession of the premises under an instrument in writing purporting to convey to him the premises, and the fact of his continuous, notorious, uninterrupted, and exclusive possession and enjoyment since that time, paying the taxes, etc.; that such possession has been adverse to the petitioners, and to all the world; and, as a conclusion of law, the court finds that the plaintiffs' or petitioners' cause of action is barred by the statute of limitations.

One of the provisions of the section of the Code under which the proceeding is brought is "that all appeals herein must be taken within sixty days from the date of the entry of the judgment or the order complained of." This appeal was not taken until more than 60 days after the date of the entry of the judgment. It follows that the appeal from the judgment is too late, and the case can only be considered on the appeal from the order denying the motion for new trial.

On the trial, the plaintiffs or petitioners having made out a prima facie case on their part and rested, the respondent offered in evidence, separately, the petition for partial distribution, filed by him in 1875, and the order of distribution made thereon; to each of which the plaintiffs objected, the objection was overruled, exception taken, and upon such exception error is assigned. If the ground of objection had been properly stated, we should have no hesitation in holding that it was error to admit either of these papers in evidence. But it is doubtful whether the ground of objection stated was sufficient, and as the error, if one, was not prejudicial to the appellants, it is unnecessary to pass upon that question.

The motion for new trial was also made upon the ground of insufficiency of evidence to justify the decision. The first specification of insufficiency reads as follows: "There is no evidence to justify that part of the sixth finding wherein it is found 'that the petitioners are not, nor is either of them now, or at the time of filing their petition herein were, entitled to have any share or interest in the land described in the petition herein set apart or distributed to them, or either of them,' in that the evidence shows that said last will of said deceased, by its terms, devises the whole of said lands of deceased to said Sallie Grider, and that deceased wholly omitted to provide therein for either of petitioners, and that such omission was not intentional, and that said petitioners, and each of them, are entitled to have and receive the same share of said lands as if deceased had died intestate." This specification is not artistically drawn, but it is sufficient, and the point made by it is, in our judgment, well taken. There is no conflict in the evidence establishing the fact that Grider died seised of this land, and leaving a widow and three children, the petitioners in this case, leaving a will in which he attempted to devise all his property to his said widow, and making no mention whatever of his said children or either of them. There is an entire failure to show that the omission to provide for them was intentional. Under these circumstances, the law gave to the children the same interest in the estate as if the father had died intestate. Civil Code, § 1307; Pearson v. Pearson, 46 Cal. 610; Estate of Wardell, 57 Cal. 484. The widow, therefore, became only a tenant in common with her children in this real property, all taking subject to administration, the exact proportion of the interest of each depending upon whether the real property was community property, or the separate property of the decedent,—a question of fact upon which no light is thrown in this record. The undisputed evidence offered and given by the respondent himself is that he entered into possession, claiming title, in 1872, under a conveyance from Mrs. Grider to one Gibson, and from said Gibson to himself, and he testifies that it has been fenced, cultivated, and pastured ever since Gibson got it from Mrs. Grider. The petition and order introduced by him show that in 1875 the estate under which he entered and claims was still in probate, and this proceeding is based upon the fact that it is still in probate. The law charges him with notice of its own provisions, and that, under it, his grantor, Mrs. Grider, was not the sole owner of the property, but only a tenant in common with her children, and that the property was subject to administration. He acquired no right except such as she had,—that of a tenant in common,—and entered as such. His possession was, and has ever since been, that of a tenant in common only, and, if his moiety was relieved from administration, it was only so because he had given bonds to pay his proportion of the debts and expenses of administration.

Our attention is called by respondent to the fact that the fifth finding is not attacked by any of the specifications. This is probably for the reason that, with the exception of the concluding sentence, which is that the petitioners here have never had any portion of the estate distributed to them, the finding is entirely of probative, and not of ultimate, fact, and, as it is a mere repetition of evidence which is undisputed, it was not the subject of attack.

But the probative fact here recited is the corner-stone upon which the whole superstructure of ultimate fact found in the seventh finding rests, and is insufficient to support that superstructure. The fifth finding, with the exception of the concluding sentence above referred to, consists of a recital of the alleged decree of distribution in favor of respondent. It is upon the faith of this decree and the conveyances from Sallie Grider to Gibson, and from Gibson to Merritt, that the court bases the ultimate conclusion of fact found in the seventh finding, that said Merritt "has title to the land described in the petition herein, and the whole thereof," and these facts do not support that finding. As before said, under his deeds he got no greater interest in the land than Sarah Grider had. Under the said order or decree of distribution the court "adjudged, decreed, and determined" that said petitioner Merritt "has succeeded to all the right, title, and interest of said Sallie Grider, * * * and is entitled to the share of said estate in his petition and hereinafter described." And after describing the land, fixing the bond to be given, etc., "it is further adjudged and decreed that the estate hereinbefore described is hereby finally distributed and set apart to said petitioner R. D. Merritt," etc. What estate? The interest of the said Sallie Grider in the land described. And this conclusion is strengthened by reference to the petition, to which the order itself refers, where the petitioner declares that he has "succeeded to a certain part of the real estate left by said decedent" by deed from said Sallie Grider. It not appearing that any real estate was left by said decedent, except that described in his petition and decree, the words "a certain part" can have no other meaning than "a certain interest in." In another part of his petition he says he "has succeeded by mesne conveyance to all the interest of said devisee," etc. Nowhere in the petition does he claim that his succession is to the entire interest in the property.

If this decree of distribution is to be construed in any other form than as simply a decree recognizing the petitioner therefor as having succeeded to the interest of Sallie Grider, and distributing to him the interest in this realty to which she was entitled, it is a nullity; for that is all that the court, in that proceeding and under that petition, had the power to do. Whether good or bad, the only purpose it serves in this proceeding is to show the respondent here entered as tenant in common with these appellants. The administration of the estate into which he entered as successor in interest to one of the distributees has never been closed, and he cannot, pending the administration, acquire title against his co-tenants by limitation, as the court has found that he did do. The seventh finding, in addition to what has already been said of it, finds that respondent has acquired a title independent of the Grider title, and proceeds to show how. But that showing is purely under the statute of limitation, after entry under the Grider title, as hereinbefore stated. Entering as he did, as a tenant in common with them, under the same common title, he has not brought himself by his proof within any rule which would enable him to acquire a title by limitation against a co-tenant, even if such a thing could be possible in favor of one distributee of an estate against another distributee, pending administration. The order denying a new trial is reversed, and the cause remanded.

We concur: McFarland, J.; Sharpstein, J.; Thornton, J.

Beatty, C. J. I dissent. As I construe the decree of December 22, 1875, it distributes the whole of the property in controversy to the respondent, and, if valid, invests him with the title. No doubt the decree was erroneous, as being founded upon an erroneous conclusion as to the effect of Henry C. Grider's will, but, never having been reversed on appeal, the decree is binding upon the appellants if, as to them, the court acquired jurisdiction to make it. As to this it seems to me that upon collateral attack, in the absence of any evidence to impeach it, the recitals in the decree of due notice, etc., are conclusive.

Works, J. I concur in the dissenting opinion of the Chief Justice.

Spring Val. Water-Works v. City and County of San Francisco et al. (No. 13,411.)

Water Companies—Regulation of Rates.

1. Const. Cal. art. 14, § 1, provides that the rates of compensation for the use of water supplied to any city, county, town, or inhabitants thereof, shall be fixed annually by the board of supervisors, or other governing body, of such city, county, or or town, by ordinance or otherwise, in the manner that other ordinances or legislative acts or resolutions are passed by such body, and shall continue in force one year, and no longer. Any such body failing so to do within the proper time shall be subject to peremptory process to compel action, at the suit of any one interested. Any one collecting water-rates otherwise than as so established shall forfeit his franchises and water-works for the public use. Section 2 provides that the right to collect such water-rates is a franchise, and cannot be exercised except by authority of, and in the manner prescribed by, law. Held, that the constitution did not make the board of supervisors part of the legislative department of the state, but that the power granted to it was to fix reasonable rates and just compensation.

2. Where such board of supervisors have arbitrarily, without investigation, and without any exercise of judgment or discretion, fixed these rates without any reference either to what they should be, without reference either to the expense necessary to furnish the water or to what is a fair and reasonable compensation therefor, so as to render it impossible to furnish water without loss, and so low as to amount to a practical confiscation of the property invested in the business, it is within the jurisdiction of a court of equity to set aside such ordinance and direct the board to fix such rates as the constitution provided for.

3. In an action to set aside such an ordinance, it is not necessary that the mayor of the city should be made a party defendant.

4. It is not necessary that the board should give notice to parties furnishing water of an intention to fix the rates, the notice not being provided for by the constitution; but it is the duty of the board to obtain all information necessary to act intelligibly and fairly.

5. An ordinance is not objectionable for uncertainty, in that it gives every householder the option to require a meter, and to pay for the water used at water-rates which are different from house-rates, as the rates are fixed.

6. It is not an unreasonable regulation that the meter should be supplied by the party furnishing water.

WORKS, J. This action is brought to set aside and declare void an ordinance of the board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco fixing water-rates to be charged for water to be furnished to said city and its inhabitants for the year commencing July 1, 1889. The complaint, after alleging the plaintiff's corporate existence, and its object and purpose, viz., to furnish water to said city and county, and other preliminary and technical matters, avers that it has, for the purpose mentioned, "constructed aqueducts and pumping and other works, and laid many miles of water-pipe for distributing water to its consumers, and that its aforesaid lands, water-rights, works, buildings, and improvements necessary to enable it to fulfill the said purposes of its incorporation, are of very great value, to-wit, of a value exceeding $25,000,000." That it has projected, and has now in course of construction, large additions to its works, necessary to meet the demands of said city and its inhabitants, and, in order to meet the wants of said city and its inhabitants, and "to meet the expenses and pay the cost of the said additions to its works and improvements, it will be necessary for the plaintiff to lay out and expend, during the year ending June 30, 1890, very large sums of money, amounting in the aggregate to more than $1,500,000." That for these purposes it has borrowed large sums of money, amounting, in the aggregate, to more than $9,600,000, and has an aggregate interest-bearing indebtedness, secured by mortgage on its property, of $9,000,000. That the interest which will accrue and have to be paid during the year ending June 30, 1890, will amount, in the aggregate, to $498,000. That the operating expenses of the plaintiff's business for said year will amount to $390,000, and the taxes to be paid by it will amount to $70,600. That its capital stock is $10,000,000, is divided into 100,000 shares, and held by more than 1,100 shareholders, and that the holders of said stock are reasonably entitled to receive, in dividends upon their said stock, not less than 7 per cent. per annum upon the par value of said stock. That the plaintiff is entitled to receive a reasonable and just compensation for the services rendered, "and that, if so fixed, its aggregate annual income from such rates would be sufficient to pay the interest on its indebtedness, the taxes upon its property, and its operating and other fixed expenses, and to pay dividends to its stockholders amounting to at least 7 per cent. upon the par value of their stock; and that to this end it was and is entitled to have its rates for the year commencing July 1, 1889, and ending June 30, 1890, so fixed and established that its gross income for said year will amount to at least $1,670,000." That, as required by law, the plaintiff furnished said board of supervisors, and filed with the clerk thereof, a detailed statement, verified by the oath of the president and secretary of the plaintiff, showing the name of each water-rate payer, his or her place of residence, the amount paid by each such water-rate payer during the year preceding the date of such statement, and also showing all revenue derived by said plaintiff from all sources during said year, and an itemized statement of expenditures made by plaintiff for supplying water during said time. "That from said statement it appeared, and so the fact is, that the receipts and expenditures made by the plaintiff from furnishing and for supplying water during said time were as follows, viz.: Receipts—From water-rates, $1,421,751.39; from other sources, $12,498.25; total, $1,434,249.64. Disbursements—For operating expenses, $361,653.65; for interest, $443,257.85; for taxes, $70,624.40; for dividends, $600,000; total, $1,475,535.90. Balance, expenditures over receipts, $41,286.26." The complaint further alleges: "That said board of supervisors did not, during said month of February, 1889, so fix and prescribe said rates for said year, and have not at any time lawfully or duly fixed or prescribed any rates whatever for supplying fresh water to said city and county, and its inhabitants, during said year; that on the 28th day of February, 1889, the said board of supervisors assumed and pretended to pass a certain pretended ordinance or order, purporting to fix the maximum rates to be charged for furnishing fresh water to said city and county, and its inhabitants, for the said year commencing July 1, 1889, and ending June 30, 1890, a true and full copy of which said ordinance or order is hereto annexed, marked 'Exhibit A,' and made a part of its complaint. That the said ordinance or order purports to fix the rates to be charged for supplying fresh water to said city and county, and its inhabitants, for said year; but that the same is, in fact, null and void, and of no effect, and that the rates pretended thereby to be fixed are wholly illegal and unauthorized. That the said ordinance or order was passed, or pretended to be passed, without any notice or opportunity to be heard against it on the part of the plaintiff or other person interested. That said order was first introduced in said board of supervisors without any previous notice to plaintiff or hearing accorded to plaintiff with reference to the subject-matter thereof, at a meeting of said board of supervisors held on the 21st day of February, A. D.

1889, and was thereafter called up for final passage at a meeting of said board of supervisors held on the 28th day of February, A. D. 1889. That the first information which the plaintiff received thereof was through the public newspapers, and on said 21st day of February, and that the first opportunity which the plaintiff had to object to said order, or to offer to introduce evidence before said board of supervisors, showing that said order was unreasonable and unjust, was at said meeting of February 28, A. D. 1889. That at said meeting, and at the first opportunity, and before the passage of said order, the plaintiff offered to produce and introduce evidence and testimony before said board showing that said order was unreasonable and unjust, in that it would not allow the plaintiff to collect sufficient revenue to pay its necessry operating expenses, interest on its indebtedness, and taxes; but that the said board of supervisors would not and did not allow the plaintiff to introduce, and refused to hear evidence offered by the said plaintiff, to show that the said ordinance or order was, and that the rates pretended to be fixed thereby were, unreasonable, unjust, and oppressive, and refused to allow, and did not allow, any evidence whatever to be introduced respecting the reasonableness and justice of the said ordinance or order, and of the rates purported to be fixed thereby, but immediately passed and adopted said order, without giving the plaintiff any opportunity to be heard whatever. That the rates purporting to be fixed by said ordinance or order were fixed arbitrarily, at random, and by mere guess-work, without any consideration of or regard to the right of plaintiff to a reasonable compensation for supplying water to the said city and county, and its inhabitants, or to a reasonable income, or any income, upon its investment, and without any consideration of, or regard to, the value of the plaintiff's works and property, or the amount of its interest-bearing indebtedness, and the annual interest charge thereon, or its operating expenses, or the amount of taxes which it would be required to pay, or the right of the plaintiff's stockholders to reasonable or any dividends upon their stock, and without any reference to, or consideration of, the actual cost of supplying said water, but in total disregard of all such matters; and that in the passage or pretended passage of said ordinance or order the said board of supervisors acted wholly without jurisdiction, power, or authority, and in excess of their lawful jurisdiction, power, or authority. That the said ordinance or order is, and the rates purporting to be prescribed and fixed thereby are, grossly unjust, unreasonable, and oppressive. That said rates do not permit of nor provide for a just or fair or reasonable compensation for the water to be supplied during said year by this plaintiff to said city and county, and the inhabitants thereof; and that if said ordinance or order is enforced, and if the plaintiff is prevented from charging and collecting any other or greater rates than those prescribed, its gross income from the said rates for the year commencing July 1, 1889, and ending June 30, 1890, will not and cannot possibly exceed the sum of $750,000; and it will be wholly insufficient to pay the interest on plaintiff's indebtedness, its operating expenses, and taxes; and not only will not and cannot yield any dividend to its stockholders, but will render it necessary to levy heavy assessments upon said stockholders, to pay said interest, expenses, and taxes." It is further averred that the defendants are about to enforce said ordinance; that its passage has already impaired the plaintiff's credit and depreciated the value of its property, and, if enforced, it will greatly impair, if not entirely destroy, the plaintiff's credit, as well as the value of its property and capital stock, and prevent it from constructing and completing the work necessary to supply water to the city and its inhabitants; and that the ordinance operates, and will operate, to take away the plaintiff's property without due process of law, and deprive the plaintiff of the equal protection of the laws, and that the plaintiff has no adequate remedy at law. There are other allegations in the complaint, but they need not be particularly noticed.

The prayer of the complaint is as follows: "Wherefore, the plaintiff prays the judgment and decree of this court: (1) That the said pretended ordinance or order of the board of supervisors of said city and county is utterly null and void, and of no effect in law. (2) That the plaintiff is entitled to have the rates for supplying fresh water to said city and county and its inhabitants, for the year commencing July 1, 1889, and ending June 30, 1890, and for other years, so fixed that they will, in the aggregate, afford a reasonable and just compensation for the service rendered, and will yield a sufficient annual income to pay the interest on its indebtedness, its running expenses and taxes, and to the plaintiff's stockholders a dividend of not less than 7 per cent. per annum upon the face value of their stock. (3) That the court issue its mandatory injunction or other peremptory process requiring the said board of supervisors forthwith to fix the rates for supplying water to said city and county, and its inhabitants, for the year commencing July 1, 1889, and ending June 30, 1890, in accordance with the foregoing principles; to give plaintiff and all other persons interested due notice and an opportunity to be heard before the said board prior to the final adoption of any order fixing such rates; and to allow the plaintiff and others interested to introduce evidence respecting the reasonableness and justice of such proposed order; and to make, by their counsel, such argument upon the subject as they may see fit. (4) That each and all of said defendants be personally enjoined from any attempt to enforce, or to cause to be enforced, the said pretended ordinance or order, or from bringing, or causing to be brought, any action or suit against the plaintiff in law or in equity, to enforce any forfeiture of the plaintiff's franchise or works, or for any other purpose, for any refusal or failure of the plaintiff to obey the said pretended ordinance or order, or to conform to the rates thereby prescribed, and from any attempt, directly or indirectly, to compel the plaintiff to furnish water at any other rates than those fixed by the board of supervisors, in obedience to the decree and mandate of this court. (5) That the plaintiff's rights in the premises be forever quieted against each and all of the defendants. (6) That the plaintiff have such other and further relief as to the court may seem meet and conformable to equity and good conscience, together with the costs of this suit." There was a demurrer to the complaint, which was overruled, and, the defendants declining to answer, judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff, that the rates and compensation "are grossly unreasonable, unjust, and oppressive, and amount to the taking of the property of the plaintiff for public use without just compensation, and without due process of law;" that said ordinance "is outside and in excess of the jurisdiction of the board of supervisors, as conferred by article 14, § 1, of the constitution of the state of California, and not a compliance with the provisions of said article and section, and is, and ever has been, illegal, unauthorized, and void." It was further decreed that the ordinance be set aside and vacated, that the defendants be enjoined from enforcing the same, and that they be enjoined from bringing any action against the plaintiff to enforce any forfeiture of its franchise and works on account of any past or future refusal to obey said pretended ordinance, or to conform to said rates, or any of them, quieting plaintiff's rights in the premises, and directing that the board of supervisors proceed forthwith to fix said rates and compensation as provided by the constitution.

The appellants having seen fit to rest their case upon the facts as stated in the complaint, instead of answering and attempting to show that the board of supervisors had endeavored to comply with the provisions of the constitution by an honest and fair effort to ascertain and fix a fair and reasonable rate for water to be furnished, the only question for us to determine is whether, under the allegations of the complaint, which are by the demurrer admitted to be true, the plaintiff is entitled to any relief. If so, the judgment must be affirmed. The appellants take the broad ground that the constitution has conferred upon the board of supervisors the absolute and exclusive right to fix water-rates, and that under no circumstances have the courts any jurisdiction to interfere with or control such authority; while the respondent contends that there is a limitation on the power of the board which compels the board to fix reasonable rates or compensation, and that whether the rates or compensation fixed by such board are reasonable or not the courts have the power and jurisdiction to determine. The constitution (article 14) provides: "Section 1. The use of all water now appropriated, or that may hereafter be appropriated, for sale, rental, or distribution, is hereby declared to be a public use, and subject to the regulation and control of the state, in the manner to be prescribed by law: provided, that the rates or compensation to be collected by any person, company, or corporation in this state, for the use of water supplied to any city and county, or city or town, or the inhabitants thereof, shall be fixed, annually, by the board of supervisors, or city and county, or city or town, council, or other governing body of such city and county, or city or town, by ordinance or otherwise, in the manner that other ordinances or legislative acts or resolutions are passed by such body, and shall continue in force for one year, and no longer. Such ordinances or resolutions shall be passed in the month of February of each year, and take effect on the 1st day of July thereafter. Any board or body failing to pass the necessary ordinances or resolutions fixing water-rates, where necessary, within such time, shall be subject to peremptory process to compel action at the suit of any party interested, and shall be liable to such further processes and penalties as the legislature may prescribe. Any person, company, or corporation collecting water-rates in any city and county, or city or town, in this state, otherwise than as so established, shall forfeit the franchises and water-works of such person, company, or corporation to the city and county, or city or town, where the same are collected, for the public use. Sec. 2. The right to collect rates or compensation for the use of water supplied to any county, city and county, or town, or the inhabitants thereof, is a franchise, and cannot be exercised except by authority of and in the manner prescribed by law." The first point made as to the jurisdiction of the court below is that, conceding the complaint states a cause of action, no jurisdiction to hear and determine the question raised thereby is vested in the superior courts by the constitution or laws of this state. There is no force in this contention. If any cause of action is stated in the complaint, it is an equitable one, and of such cases superior courts are given jurisdiction in the broadest terms, by the constitution of this state. Const. art. 6, § 5.

We pass, therefore, to the only real question in the case, viz., whether there is any power on the part of any court, no matter how broad and comprehensive its grant of jurisdiction may be, to review, interfere with, or set aside the action of the board of supervisors, or whether the power and authority of such board is exclusive and beyond the reach of the courts, under any and all circumstances. It must be conceded, in the outset, that the use of water for sale is a public use, and that the price at which it shall be sold is a matter within the power of the board of supervisors to determine. Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 113; Water-Works v. Schottler, 110 U. S. 347, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 48. Indeed, this is not controverted by the respondent. The constitution does not, in terms, confer upon the courts of the state any power or jurisdiction to control, supervise, or set aside any action of the board in respect to such rates. It may also be conceded, for the purposes of this case, that when the board of supervisors have fairly investigated and exercised their discretion in fixing the rates the courts have no right to interfere on the sole ground that in the judgment of the court the rates thus fixed and determined are not reasonable. That such is the case is attested by numerous authorities. Nesbitt v. Board, 14 Moak, Eng. R. 287; Davis v. Mayor, 1 Duer, 451–497; Munn v. Illinois, supra; Water-Works v. Schottler, supra; Railway Co. v. Dey, 35 Fed. Rep. 866.

But it seems to us that this complaint presents an entirely different question from this. The whole gist of the complaint is that the board of supervisors have not exercised their judgment or discretion in the matter; that they have arbitrarily, without investigation, and without any exercise of judgment or discretion, fixed these rates without any reference to what they should be, without reference either to the expense to the plaintiff necessary to furnish the water, or to what is a fair and reasonable compensation therefor; that the rates are so fixed as to render it impossible to furnish the water without loss, and so low as to amount to a practical confiscation of the plaintiff's property. If this be true, and the demurrer admits it, a party whose property is thus jeopardized should not be without a remedy. If the action of the board of supervisors was taken as the complaint alleges, they have not in any sense complied with the requirements of the constitution, and their pretended action was a palpable fraud, which might result injuriously either to the plaintiff or the city and its inhabitants, and would almost certainly work injustice to one or the other. The constitution does not contemplate any such mode of fixing rates. It is not a matter of guess-work or an arbitrary fixing of rates without reference to the rights of the water company or the public. When the constitution provides for the fixing of rates or compensation, it means reasonable rates and just compensation. To fix such rates and compensation is the duty, and within the jurisdiction, of the board. To fix rates not reasonable or compensation not just is a plain violation of its duty. But the courts cannot, after the board has fully and fairly investigated and acted, by fixing what it believes to be reasonable rates, step in and say its action shall be set aside and nullified because the courts, upon a similar investigation, have come to a different conclusion as to the reasonableness of the rates fixed. There must be actual fraud in fixing the rates, or they must be so palpably and grossly unreasonable and unjust as to amount to the same thing. The right of the plaintiff to dispose of the water collected in its reservoirs, at reasonable rates, is the only value it has, and is the only thing that can bring the plaintiff any return for the money expended for reservoirs for its storage and pipes for its distribution. Not only reservoirs, pipes, and other works and improvements necessary to carry out the objects of its incorporation, but the water itself, is property which cannot be taken without just compensation. The fact that the right to store and dispose of the water is a public use, subject to the control of the state, and that its regulation is provided for by the constitution of this state, does not affect the question. "Regulation," as provided for in the constitution, does not mean "confiscation," or a taking without just compensation. If it does, then our constitution is clearly in violation of the constitution of the United States, which provides that this shall not be done. The ground taken by the appellant is that the fixing of rates is a legislative act; that by the terms of the constitution the board of supervisors are made a part of the legislative department of the state government, and exclusive power given to them, which cannot be encroached upon by the courts. In other words, the board of supervisors, for the purpose of fixing these water-rates, is a part of one of the co-ordinate and independent departments of the state government, and as such beyond and independent of any control by the judicial department. This court has held that the fixing of water-rates is a legislative act, at least to the extent that the action of the proper bodies clothed with such power cannot be controlled by writs which can issue only for the purpose of controlling judicial action. Water-Works v. Bryant, 52 Cal. 132; Water-Works v. City and County of San Francisco, Id. 111; Water-Works v. Bartlett, 63 Cal. 245. There are other cases holding the act to be legislative, but whether it is judicial, legislative, or administrative is immaterial. Let it be which it may, it is not above the control of the courts, in proper cases. It has also been held that where a power is vested in an officer of the state, involving the exercise of discretion and judgment on his part, such discretion and judgment cannot be controlled by the courts by mandamus. Berryman v. Perkins, 55 Cal. 483. The right and jurisdiction in this respect is fully and accurately stated in Davis v. Mayor, 1 Duer, 451–497, as follows: "Notwithstanding these observations, the question still remains, has this court, or any court of equity, the power to interfere with the legislative discretion of the common council of this city, or of any other municipal corporation? And to this question I at once reply, certainly not, if the term 'discretion' be properly limited and understood; and, thus understood, I carry the proposition much further than the counsel who advanced it. This court has no right to interfere with and control the exercise, not merely of the legislative, but of any other discretionary power, that the law has vested in the corporation of the city, and hence I deem it quite immaterial whether the resolution in favor of Jacob Sharp and his associates be termed a 'by-law,' a 'grant,' or 'contract,' or whether the power exercised in passing it be termed 'legislative,' 'judicial,' or 'executive;' for, if the corporation had the power of granting at all the extraordinary privileges which the resolution confers, the propriety of exercising the power, and, perhaps, even the form of its exercise, rested entirely in its discretion. Nor is this all. A court of equity has no right to interfere with and control in any case the exercise of a discretionary power, no matter in whom it may be vested,—a corporate body, or individuals, the aldermen of a city, the directors of a bank, a trustee, executor, or guardian; and I add that the meaning and principle of the rule, and the limitations to which it is subject, are, in all the cases to which it applies, exactly the same.

The meaning and principle of the rule are that the court will not substitute its own judgment for that of the party in whom the discretion is vested, and thus assume to itself a power which the law had given to another: and the limitations to which it is subject are that the discretion must be exercised, within its proper limits, for the purposes for which it was given, and from the motives by which alone those who gave the discretion intended that its exercise should be governed."

We are not inclined to the doctrine asserted by the appellants in this case, that every subordinate body of officers to whom the legislature delegates what may be regarded as legislative power thereby becomes a part of the legislative branch of the state government, and beyond judicial control. In the case of Davis v. Mayor, supra, it is said: "It is this construction, therefore, that I adopt; and, for the purposes of this opinion, I shall treat the resolution as an ordinance or by-law, and its reconsideration and adoption as properly acts of legislation, in the fullest sense in which the term 'legislation' can be justly applied to the acts of a corporate body. Making these concessions, the denial of the jurisdiction of this court amounts to this: that a court of equity, of general jurisdiction, has no power, in any case or for any purpose, to restrain the legislative action of a municipal corporation, nor in any manner to interfere with or control its legislative discretion, no matter to what subject the action may be directed, nor how manifest and gross the violation of law, even of the provisions of its own charter, that it may involve, and no matter by what motives of fear, partiality, or corruption its discretion may be governed, nor how extensive and irreparable the mischief that in the particular case may be certain to result to individuals or the public from its threatened exercise. If this be true, as a proposition of law, then the injunction order of this court, from the want of jurisdiction manifest on its face, was wholly void. If the proposition be not true, the order was valid, and should have been obeyed. * * * In reply to a question put by the court, it was expressly affirmed by one of the counsel, that should the common council attempt, by an ordinance, and from motives manifestly corrupt, to convey, for a grossly inadequate or merely nominal consideration, all the corporate property of the city, neither this nor any other court would have power to suppress by an injunction the meditated fraud, or, when consummated, to rescind the grant, or punish its authors, or divest them of its fruits. There could be no remedy, we were told, but from the force of public opinion, and the action of the people at an ensuing election; and all this upon the ground that neither the propriety nor the honesty of the proceedings of a legislative body, nor, while they are pending, even their legality, can ever be made a subject of judicial inquiry. This, it must be confessed, is a startling doctrine. We all felt it to be so when announced, and I rejoice that we are now able to say, with an entire conviction, that, applied to a municipal corporation, it is just as groundless in law as it seems to us it is wrong in its principle, and certainly would be pernicious in its effects. The doctrine, exactly as stated, may be true when applied to the legislature of the state, which, as a co-ordinate branch of the government, representing and exercising, in its sphere, the sovereignty of the people, is, for political reasons of manifest force, wholly exempt in all its proceedings from any legal process or judicial control; but the doctrine is not, nor is any portion of it, true, when applied to a subordinate municipal body, which, although clothed to some extent with legislative and even political powers, is yet, in the exercise of all its powers, just as subject to the authority and control of courts of justice to legal process, legal restraint, and legal correction as any other body or person, natural or artificial. The supposition that there exists an important distinction, or any distinction whatever, between a municipal corporation and any other corporation aggregate, in respect to the powers of courts of justice over its proceedings, is entirely gratuitous, and, as it seems to me, is as destitute of reason as it certainly is of authority. The counsel could refer us to no case, nor have we found any, in which the judgment of the court has proceeded upon such a distinction, nor, in our researches, which have not been limited, have we been able to discover that, by any judge or jurist, the existence of such a distinction has ever been asserted or intimated." Pages 494, 495. This case was affirmed by the court of appeals of New York, in People v. Sturtevant, 9 N. Y. 263, and the doctrine announced meets with our approval.

Counsel for appellants rely, mainly, in support of their position, on the decision of the supreme court of the United States in what are known as the "Granger Cases," the leading one of which is the case of Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 113; but, while there may be some language used in the opinion in that case tending to maintain their contention, there was no such question presented as we have here, and the point made in this case was not decided. The question there presented is clearly stated by the learned chief justice in his opinion: "The question to be determined in this case is whether the general assembly of Illinois can, under the limitations upon the legislative power of the states imposed by the constitution of the United States, fix by law the maximum of charges of the storage of grain in warehouses at Chicago and other places in the state having not less than one hundred thousand inhabitants, 'in which grain is stored in bulk, and in which the grain of different owners is mixed together, or in which grain is stored in such a manner that the identity of different lots or parcels cannot be accurately preserved.'" Page 123. See, also, for a statement of the questions passed upon in this case, Railway Co. v. Illinois, 118 U. S., 557-568, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 4. It will be observed from this statement that the only question there was whether the power to regulate prices rested in the legislature of the state of Illinois at all, and not whether, if it did exist, it was exclusive, and beyond judicial inquiry and control. That there was no intention to decide that the courts have no jurisdiction to interfere in this class of cases, upon a proper showing, is clearly indicated by what is said by the same court in later decisions, and by judges of other federal courts. In the case of Water-Works v. Schottler, 110 U. S. 347, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 48, Chief Justice WAITE, who delivered the opinion in Munn v. Illinois, said: "That it is within the power of the government to regulate the prices at which water shall be sold by one who enjoys a virtual monopoly of the sale, we do not doubt. That question is settled by what was decided on full consideration in Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 113. As was said in that case, such regulations do not deprive a person of his property without due process of law. What may be done if the municipal authorities do not exercise an honest judgment, or if they fix upon a price which is manifestly unreasonable, need not now be considered, for that proposition is not presented by this record. The objection here is not to any improper prices fixed by the officers, but to their power to fix prices at all. By the constitution and the legislation under it, the municipal authorities have been created a special tribunal to determine what, as between the public and the company, shall be deemed a reasonable price during a certain limited period. Like every other tribunal established by the legislature for such a purpose, their duties are judicial in their nature, and they are bound, in morals and in law, to exercise an honest judgment as to all matters submitted for their official determination." 110 U. S. 354, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 51. Again, in Stone v. Trust Co., 116 U. S. 307–331, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 334, 388, 1191, Chief Justice WAITE said: "From what has thus been said, it is not to be inferred that this power of limitation or regulation is itself without limit. This power to regulate is not a power to destroy, and limitation is not the equivalent of confiscation. Under pretense of regulating fares and freights, the state cannot require a railroad corporation to carry persons or property without reward; neither can it do that which in law amounts to a taking of private property for public use, without just compensation, or without due process of law. What would have this effect we need not now say, because no tariff has yet been fixed by the commission, and the statute of Mississippi expressly provides 'that in all trials of cases brought for a violation of any tariff or charges, as fixed by the commission, it may be shown in defense that such tariff, so fixed, is unjust.'" 110 U. S. 331, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 345. See, also, Dow v. Beidelman, 125 U. S. 680, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1028. In the case of Banking Co. v Smith, 128 U. S. 174–179, 9 Sup Ct. Rep. 47, Mr. Justice FIELD sums up the former decisions of that court as follows: "It has been adjudged by this court, in numerous instances, that the legislature of a state has the power to prescribe the charges of a railroad company for the carriage of persons and merchandise within its limits, in the absence of any provision in the charter of the company constituting a contract vesting in it authority over those matters, subject to the limitation that the carriage is not required without reward, or upon conditions amounting to the taking of property for public use without just compensation; and that what is done does not amount to a regulation of foreign or inter state commerce." 128 U.S. 179, 9 Sup.Ct. Rep. 48. It will be observed that in all the decisions of the supreme court of the United States, while the power of the state to regulate these charges is recognized, the power is so limited as to authorize just what it is contended should be done by the court in this case. This same limitation, so necessary to the rights and property of corporations and individuals vested with a public use, is fully recognized by BREWER, J., now one of the justices of the supreme court of the United States, in Railway Co. v. Dey, 35 Fed. Rep. 866, 877. After reviewing the Granger Cases, and other cases above cited, he says: "It is obvious from these last quotations that the mere fact that the legislature has pursued the forms of law in prescribing a schedule of rates does not prevent inquiry by the courts; and the question is open, and must be decided in each case, whether the rates prescribed are within the limits of legislative power, or mere proceedings, which, in the end, if not restrained, will work a confiscation of the property of complainant. Of course, some rule must exist, fixed and definite, to control the action of the courts; for it cannot be that a chancellor is at liberty to substitute his discretion as to the reasonableness of rates for that of the legislature. The legislature has the discretion, and the general rule is that, where any officer or board has discretion, its acts, within the limits of that discretion, are not subject to review by the courts. Counsel for complainant urged that the lowest rates the legislature may establish must be such as will secure to the owners of the railroad property a profit on their investment at least equal to the lowest current rate of interest, say 3 per cent. Decisions of the supreme court seem to forbid such a limit to the power of the legislature in respect to that which they apparently recognize as a right of the owners of the railroad property to some reward; and the right of judicial interference exists only when the schedule of rates established will fail to secure to the owners of the property some compensation or income from their investment. As to the amount of such compensation, if some compensation or reward is in fact secured, the legislature is the sole judge." Page 878. See, further, as supporting this view, Railroad Co. v. State, 5 South. Rep. 833. Counsel on both sides have shown great industry and research in the presentation of this case, and many authorities are cited bearing more or less directly on this question, but we cannot extend this opinion by noticing or even citing them all. We have cited sufficient, we think, to sustain fully our view that the court below had jurisdiction, and that the complaint presented a case sufficient to call for the interposition of the court in the matter. The conclusion we have reached on this question is decisive of the case, but there are other points made and argued in the briefs which it is proper we should notice.

On the part of the appellant, it is contended that a part of the allegations of the complaint necessary to make out a cause of action are of mere conclusions of law, and should not be considered. We think, however, that the allegations referred to, or enough of them to entitle the plaintiff to the relief demanded, are well pleaded. There are other objections to the form of the complaint, and the manner of alleging the facts, which are equally groundless. It is further claimed that the mayor of the city should have been made a party, but we do not regard this as necessary.

On the part of the respondent, it is contended, in support of the decision of the court below, that notice to the plaintiff of an intention to fix the rates was necessary, and that without such notice being given the action of the board was a taking of its property without due process of law. But the constitution is self-executing, and, as it does not require notice, we think no notice was necessary. It does not follow, however, that, because no notice is necessary, the board are for that reason excused from applying to corporations or individuals interested to obtain all information necessary to enable it to act intelligibly and fairly in fixing the rates. This is its plain duty, and a failure to make the proper effort to procure all necessary information from whatever source may defeat its action. Both the corporation and the individuals furnishing the water, as well as the public, who must pay for its use, are entitled to a careful and honest effort on the part of the board to obtain such information and to have it act accordingly.

It is objectd to the ordinance that it gives every householder an option to require a meter upon his premises, and to pay for the water furnished at water-rates which are different from the house-rate. It is contended that this does not fix the rate as the constitution requires, but leaves it indefinite and uncertain. We do not think the ordinance is defective in this respect. The rates are definitely fixed, and the fact that there may be one price for the consumer who has a meter and a different price for one who has none does not render the ordinance uncertain. It is also contended that the requirement that meters shall be furnished by the plaintiff is unreasonable, and cannot be enforced; but we think otherwise. The requirement that the party furnishing water shall provide the means necessary for its measurement, so that the quantity furnished and to be paid for may be known, is not an unreasonable regulation The expense of the meter could not be imposed on the consumer. Steam-Ship Co. v. Jersey City, 45 N. J. Law, 246. There are other objections to the ordinance which we need not notice specifically. It is enough to say that, in our opinion, none of them are well taken.

Finally, we are asked by the respondent to lay down some basis upon which the board must proceed in fixing rates. But we do not feel that we should attempt to lay down such a rule in advance. This must be left to the board to determine. Judgment affirmed.

PEOPLE v. BOWMAN. (No. 20,549.)

ARRAIGNMENT AND PLEA—EVIDENCE OF GOOD CHARACTER.

1. Where one is arraigned and offered an opportunity to plead, but does so only through his attorney, no error can be predicated of the court's ordering the plea of not guilty to be entered; it being the duty of the court so to do where the prisoner stands mute, under Pen. Code Cal. § 1024.

2. An instruction, in a trial for murder, that "the defendant has introduced evidence tending to show his good character as a man of peace and quiet, and for honesty and integrity. If in the present case the good character of the defendant for these qualities is proven to your satisfaction, then such fact is to be kept in view by you in all your deliberations, and it is to be considered by you in connection with the other facts in the case; and if, after a consideration of all the evidence in the case, including that bearing upon the good character of the defendant, the jury entertain any reasonable doubt of the defendant's guilt, then it is your duty to acquit him,"—contains all that defendant is entitled to have on the point.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Humboldt county; J. J. DE HAVEN, Judge.

G. D. Murray and T. H. Selvage, for appellant. Atty. Gen. George A. Johnson, for the People.

FOOTE, C. The defendant was tried and convicted, upon an information, of murder in the first degree, in the killing of one Samuel Dunn. From the judgment therein rendered and an order refusing a new trial, he has appealed.

One of the grounds upon which he bases his contention that a new trial should be awarded him is that the evidence does not show he committed the murder with which he is charged; and, conceding that any killing is shown to have been done by him, it does not appear that murder in the first degree was committed. It is undoubtedly the law, as he claims, that, in order to convict of murder in the first degree, the defendant must be shown by the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, to have killed the person with whose murder he is charged, with the deliberate, premeditated, and malicious intent so to do. People v. Cox, 76 Cal. 282, 286, 18 Pac. Rep. 332; Pen. Code, § 189. But it is the province of the jury to determine, from all the facts and circumstances in evidence, whether the killing is accompanied by all the ingredients which go to make up the crime charged. In this case a very strenuous argument is made upon all the evidence which was adduced, both direct and circumstantial, that the defendant is not proved to have been guilty as charged beyond reasonable doubt, and that the jury have found him guilty by inferring material facts not in evidence from facts in evidence which only amount to inferences. When counsel proceed by argument to elaborate their views on the matter, they seem to advance no further than to the point that the circumstantial evidence in the case is insufficient to show the identity of the body found with that of the deceased; that the defendant killed him, and that he did it maliciously, with premeditation and deliberation. There are many facts and circumstances appearing in the record before us which tend strongly to show that the defendant, and none other, was the slayer of Dunn; that the purpose of the killing was plunder, to obtain possession of the property which Dunn had and the defendant lacked; that the murder was accomplished by, first, a shot in the head, and then by the crushing of the disabled man's skull with a rock; that the murderer then left the body of his mutilated and whilom trusting friend, to be the prey of wild beasts. There was proof that the defendant took Dunn's watch and other property, and endeavored to prevent inquiry by asking a witness not to tell that he had a companion or partner on the "Summit." The body of Dunn was found decomposed in a secluded place, with the skull in the condition above mentioned, and the hat identified as being his lying near, with a bullet hole in it. These things, and many other matters which were disclosed by the evidence, were duly weighed by the jury, under the instructions of the court, and we cannot say their conclusions were manifestly wrong. They must have given each fact or circumstance, whether for or against the defendant, proper consideration; and this is not a case where we can declare that the evidence is such that the jury should have acquitted, or only found the defendant guilty of murder in the second degree. They saw and heard the witnesses, and were in possession of all that was said orally by them, whether the statement of a fact or circumstance. They looked upon the mute evidence in the case,—the shoes with peculiar pegs, the handkerchief, the watch, the gun, the hat, the pieces of skull, and the rock. They have declared by their verdict that they believe, from all the evidence in the case, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the defendant is guilty of murder in the first degree. We do not feel called upon to say their verdict is unwarranted.

It is further argued that the judgment cannot stand because the defendant, although arraigned and offered an opportunity to plead, only did so through his counsel, and not in person. Conceding that the plea by counsel amounted to no plea at all, and then the matter stands as if the defendant, when called on to plead to the information, stood mute. It then became the duty of the court to order the plea of not guilty to be entered for him. If the defendant is properly arraigned, and is given the opportunity to enter his plea, and he evades it either by standing mute, or having his counsel enter his plea for him of not guilty, we can see no material injury to him in the court ordering his plea of not guilty to be entered as the law requires it to be done, when none is entered by the defendant in person. The case of People v. Corbett, 28 Cal. 328, is not in point. There the prisoner had not been arraigned and given an opportunity to plead. "Not only did the defendant not plead, but, inasmuch as the statutory opportunity for pleading was never extended to him, he was never under any obligation to plead." Id. 331. Here the opportunity was extended, and the defendant was under an obligation to plead, but did not fulfill his obligation, and the plea of not guilty was entered by the court, at the instance of the defendant, through his attorney. As heretofore said, he was in no worse condition than if he had stood mute. His attorney had entered no plea for him, and the court had fulfilled its obligation under the law by entering the plea of not guilty Pen. Code, § 1024.

It is further claimed that the court erred in refusing an instruction for the defendant as follows: "The defendant has introduced evidence of his good character as a man of peace and quiet, and for honesty and integrity. If in the present case the good character of the defendant for these qualities is proven to your satisfaction, it is to be considered by you in connection with the other facts in the case, and it may be sufficient to create in your minds a reasonable doubt of his guilt, although no such doubt would have existed but for such good character." But the court gave in place of the refused instruction another, which reads: "The defendant has introduced evidence tending to show his good character as a man of peace and quiet, and for honesty and integrity. If in the present case the good character of the defendant for these qualities is proven to your satisfaction, then such fact is to be kept in view by you in all your deliberations, and it is to be considered by you in connection with the other facts in the case; and if, after a consideration of all the evidence in the case, including that bearing upon the good character of the defendant, the jury entertain any reasonable doubt of the defendant's guilt, then it is your duty to acquit him." The defendant was not prejudiced. The last instruction was a clearer enunciation of the law than the first, and contained all that the defendant was entitled to have on the point. Good character must be considered in connection with all the other evidence in the case, and if then the jury have a reasonable doubt of the defendant's guilt they must acquit. Thomp. Trials, § 2444.

There was no error in permitting the witnesses Day and Nichols to relate what the defendant said about "his partner" going to Scott's valley. The evidence tended to show that Dunn and he were partners at the "Summit" in hunting, and as to what hides and meat they got; that they bought the mule they had jointly, that they slept together in Dunn's blankets, and it is evident that the word "partner," as used, referred as much to the companionship of the two men as to their business relations. Upon the whole case, as presented by the record, we perceive no prejudicial error, and advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; VAN CLIEF, C.

BULLOCK et al. v. ROUSE. (No. 12,027.)

PUBLIC LANDS—HOMESTEAD ENTRIES—SURVEY.

1. Act Cong. March 3, 1853, § 7, "for the survey of public lands in California, the granting of pre-emption rights therein, and for other purposes," provides "that where any settlement, by the erection of a dwelling-house or the cultivation of any portion of the land, shall be made upon the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections, before the same shall be surveyed, or where such sections may be reserved for public uses, or taken by private claims, other land shall be selected by the proper authorities of the state in lieu thereof." Under Rev. St. U. S. § 2395, the government survey of public lands is made by running and marking the lines of the townships and sections, and by marking the corners of the townships, sections, and quarter sections. Held, that the state could not acquire lands in the sixteenth or thirty-sixth sections prior to survey, and that the purchaser of such land from the state, before all the lines and corners of the section were run and marked by an approved survey, took no title.

2. Fences and natural barriers may constitute such inclosure of public lands as to give actual possession to one making or using the inclosure, and another cannot acquire a pre-emption or homestead claim thereto by intruding upon such possession; but, where the fences are dilapidated and down in places, and it does not appear that anything has been done to repair them, or that herders or other means are employed to prevent the escape of stock pastured on the land, or the intrusion of other stock, another may make valid settlement on, and acquire title to, the land, under the homestead law.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Humboldt county; JOHN J. DE HAVEN, Judge.

Chamberlain & McGowan, for appellants. Ernest Sevier, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. C. This action was brought to determine an adverse claim to a piece of land described as the S. ½ of the S. E. ¼ of a certain thirty-sixth section. The plaintiffs claim the land under a certificate of purchase issued by the proper officers of the state; and the defendant claims it under a certificate of homestead entry issued by the proper officers of the United States. The court below gave judgment for the defendant, and the plaintiffs appeal. The case is brought here on the judgment roll.

It appears from the findings that prior to the 21st of December, 1871, the greater part of the exterior lines of the township in which the land in question is situated, had been run and established by the United States, and some of the sections therein had been ascertained and established. Lines had also been run on the north, south, and west sides of section 36, and section corners had been established at the ends of each of these lines, and quarter section corners at the middle of each one of them. But the east line of this section had not been run, and no quarter section corner had been established upon it; and on the plat of the survey of the township, filed in the local land-office, the whole of the east half of section 36 was marked and returned as unsurveyed. With the survey in this condition, one Robert Lowery made application to purchase from the state the land in controversy, and, on the 21st of December, 1871, a certificate of purchase of the land, in due form, was issued to him by the state. Subsequently, one Joseph Russ, the plaintiff's testator, acquired by purchase and conveyance all the right, title, and interest of Lowery in and to the land. After his purchase, and prior to June, 1884, Russ erected a fence upon the east and west sides of the land, which, connecting with gulches and timber, served to inclose the land sufficiently to keep stock out; that is to say, the fences and natural barriers answered, for all practical purposes, as an inclosure. The land was grazing land, and was used by Russ for the pasturage of his stock; but in June, 1884, the fences had become somewhat dilapidated, and in places were down for a few feet. Neither Russ nor his grantor ever made any other improvements upon the land. In June, 1884, the defendant, with notice of all the facts above stated, made a peaceable entry upon the land, and erected a dwelling-house thereon, in which he thereafter, peaceably and without molestation, continued to reside up to the time of the trial, asserting all the time a claim to the land by virtue of his settlement. After his entry, defendant, at his own expense, procured the United States to complete the survey of the section by running the east line thereof, and marking the quarter corner thereon; and such survey was duly approved by the United States surveyor general for California, and the plat thereof was filed in the local land-office on the 19th of February, 1885. On the 3d of March, 1885, the defendant, then possessing all the qualifications necessary to entitle him to enter land as a homestead under the laws of the United States, filed in the land-office his application, in due form, to enter the land in controversy as a homestead. Upon these facts, two questions arise: First. Was the survey made prior to the issuance of the certificate of purchase to Lowery by the state sufficient to vest the title to the land in the state, as a portion of a thirty-sixth section? Second. Was the inclosure and possession of Russ, at the time of defendant's entry, sufficient to bring the case within the rule declared in Atherton v. Fowler, 96 U. S. 513; Davis v. Scott, 56 Cal. 165; and other cases following in the same line?

1. Whatever title the state has to the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections is acquired under and by operation of the act of congress approved March 3, 1853, and entitled "An act to provide for the survey of the public lands in California, the granting of pre-emption rights therein, and for other purposes." 10 U. S. St. 244. The seventh section of this act provides "that where any settlement, by the erection of a dwelling-house or the cultivation of any portion of the land, shall be made upon the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections, before the same shall be surveyed, or where such sections may be reserved for public uses, or taken by private claims, other land shall be selected by the proper authorities of the state in lieu thereof." Under this provision, it has been held by the supreme court of the United States "that whenever, at the time these sections are ascertained by the government survey, there is either a dwelling-house or the cultivation of any portion of the land on which some one is residing and is asserting claim to it, the title of the state does not vest, but the alternative right to other land, as indemnity, does." Mining Co. v. Mining Co., 102 U.S. 175. It has also been said, by the supreme court of this state: "It may be admitted that, by virtue of the act of congress of 1853, the state became entitled to an amount of land equal to two sections in each congressional township; yet, as the state did not, by virtue of that act, acquire the title to any specified tract of land, and could not acquire it until the survey had been made under the authority of congress, it necessarily follows that, prior to such survey, she had no power or authority to confer upon a purchaser from her any right, title, or interest in any specified parcel of such lands." Grogan v. Knight, 27 Cal. 522. The government survey of the public lands is made by running and marking the lines of the townships and sections, and by marking the corners of the townships, sections, and quarter sections. Rev. St. § 2395 et seq. It is not necessary that a whole township be surveyed at one time, and often different parts of a township are surveyed at different times. But no survey of any part is complete until the lines and corners about that part are run and established as required by the statute. "Even after a principal meridian and a base line have been established, and the exterior lines of the townships have been surveyed, neither the sections nor their subdivisions can be said to have any existence until the township is subdivided into sections and quarter sections by an approved survey. The lines are not ascertained by the survey, but they are created." Robinson v. Forrest, 29 Cal. 325. "There is, in fact, no such tract of land as that described in the petition, until it has been located within the congressional township, by an actual survey and establishment of the lines under the authority of the United States, and the survey has been approved by the proper United States surveyor general. A person may approximate to the lines that may be run,—may surmise the precise lines,—but the tract has no separate legal identity until the survey is made and approved under the authority of congress." Middleton v. Low, 30 Cal. 605. When Lowery obtained his certificate of purchase, the east half of the section had not been fully surveyed and marked out as required by law. And it was returned by the surveyor general, and shown on the map of the township, filed in the land-office, as unsurveyed land. Under these circumstances, and in the light of the authorities above cited, we think it must be held that the title to the land in controversy had not vested in the state.

2. It is settled law that, when one person is in the actual possession of a parcel of public land, another person cannot forcibly or surreptitiously intrude upon his possession, and thereby acquire a right to the land by filing thereon a pre-emption or homestead claim. Atherton v. Fowler, 96 U. S. 513; Hosmer v. Wallace, 97 U. S. 575; Trenouth v. San Francisco, 100 U. S. 251; Mower v. Fletcher, 116 U. S. 381, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 409, Davis v. Scott, 56 Cal. 165; Smer v. Duggan, Id. 257; McBrown v. Morris, 59 Cal. 64; Goodwin v. McCabe, 75 Cal. 584, 17 Pac. Rep. 705. It is also settled that fences and natural barriers may constitute a sufficient inclosure to give actual possession of land. Brumagim v. Bradshaw, 39 Cal. 25; Southmayd v. Henley, 45 Cal. 101; Conroy v Duane, Id. 603. And one who uses land for the pasturage of stock may have actual possession thereof, without any inclosure, if he employs herders to keep his own stock on the land and other stock off. Goodrich v. Van Landigham, 46 Cal. 603; Sheldon v Mull, 67 Cal. 301, 7 Pac. Rep. 710; Webber v. Clarke, 74 Cal. 11, 15 Pac. Rep. 431. But whether one who claims possession of a particular piece of land, has actual possession of it or not is a question of fact; and the burden is upon him to establish the fact by competent evidence. It was found by the court below that the land involved in this case had been inclosed by Russ; but the fences had become somewhat dilapidated, and were down in places, when defendant entered. It does not appear how long the fences had been down, nor that anything had been done to repair them. Nor does it appear that any herders, or other means, were employed by Russ to prevent the escape of his stock, or the intrusion of other stock. This being the condition of things when the defendant entered and erected his dwelling-house on the land, the court held that his entry was not unlawful, or in contravention of the rule declared in the above-cited cases. This conclusion seems to us correct; for, while the fences were down, they did not constitute an inclosure, and could not show actual possession. We therefore advise that the judgment be affirmed.

We concur: VAN CLIEF, C.; HAYNE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is affirmed.

HUMBOLDT SAV. & LOAN SOC. v. WENNERHOLD et al. (No. 11,674.)

BONDS—PRINCIPAL AND SURETY.

1. Civil Code Cal. §§ 1636, 1641, provide that "a contract must be so interpreted as to give effect to the mutual intention of the parties as it existed at the time of contracting, so far as the same is ascertainable and lawful," and that "the whole of a contract is to be taken together, so as to give effect to every part, if reasonably practicable, each clause helping to interpret the other." Sections 2836, 2837, provide that "a surety cannot be held beyond the express terms of his contract;" and that, "in interpreting the terms of a contract of suretyship, the same rules are to be observed as in the case of other contracts." The bond of the secretary of a savings society was conditioned that he should, "during all the time he shall hold said office, well and truly serve said corporation as such secretary," and "well, truly, and honestly perform and discharge all his said duties as such officer, and do all things required of him by the by-laws of said corporation." The by-laws required him to keep on hand all the moneys, securities, or property received by him on account of the society until the same were disposed of by direction of the board of directors, and that he should not use, loan, exchange, or otherwise dispose of the same. Held, that the provisions of the by-laws relating to the secretary entered into the contract of the sureties, and that they were liable for all moneys received by him on account of the society, and not merely for such as he was required as secretary to collect. BEATTY, C. J., and WORKS, J., dissenting.

2. The sureties were not liable for money taken by the secretary from bags, in the society's vault, which had been set aside for borrowers who had executed notes and mortgages for its payment, and who were being charged interest thereon by the society, there being no entries of the money as that of the society.

3. Though the secretary was chosen by the directors, the tenure of his office did not depend on their official term, which was one year; but as they were authorized by the by-laws to fix his term of office, and to summarily dismiss him, they could, by electing him once, without further action, continue him in office indefinitely, and during such continuance his sureties were liable.

On rehearing. In bank. For opinion on hearing in department, see 20 Pac. Rep. 553.

Manuel Eyre, for appellants. A. H. Loughborough, for respondent.

THORNTON, J. In April, 1870, one Adolph Hartmann was appointed secretary of the plaintiff, an incorporated savings bank. This corporation was formed for the purpose of aggregating the funds and savings of the members thereof and others, and the preservation and safe investment of the same for the common benefit of all. It received money on deposit, and lent such money at interest. Hartmann's appointment was made by the board of directors by virtue of the by-laws of the corporation. The duties of the secretary were prescribed by the by-laws. These duties were as follows: "The secretary shall keep, or cause to be kept, such books as the business of the society shall require, subject to the approval of the board of directors. He shall attend all the meetings of the society and of the board of directors, shall serve or cause to be served all notices of meetings, and keep accurate record thereof. He shall further collect all moneys due to the society, and shall keep the same in the mode prescribed by the board of directors." Although, under the by-laws, the board of directors was empowered to prescribe the term of office of the secretary, no term was ever fixed. Hartmann held the position of secretary from his appointment, above mentioned, until September 18, 1883, when he was dismissed. During this period, from April, 1870, until September 18, 1883, Hartmann received and paid out the money of the bank. There was no one acting as "teller" by that name, and no one acting as cashier by the name of "cashier." On the 2d day of January, 1880, Hartmann was required by the board of directors to give a bond for the faithful performance of his duties as secretary, in the sum of $5,000, with sureties, and on the same day he executed such bond, with the defendants and others as sureties. The condition of this bond, with a preliminary recital, was as follows: "Whereas, the above-named Adolph Hartmann has been chosen and appointed secretary of said corporation; and whereas, he may hereafter, from time to time, be re-elected, rechosen, and reappointed or continued in said office, or suffered to hold the same: Now, the condition of this obligation is such that if the said Adolph Hartmann shall, during said term, and during all the time he shall hold said office, well and truly serve the said corporation as such secretary so long as he shall continue and be continued in said office, and well, truly, and honestly perform and discharge all his said duties as such officer, and do all things required of him by the by-laws of said corporation which may be now in force, or which may be hereafter enacted by said corporation, and shall well and truly and faithfully perform all the duties which shall be required of him, and obey all orders and directions given him by the board of directors of said corporation, then this obligation to be void; otherwise to be and remain in full force and effect."

This action was brought against some of the sureties to the above-mentioned bond for alleged defalcations by Hartmann, committed while he acted as secretary of the plaintiff. The defalcations appear to be as follows: First. While acting in the employ of plaintiff, he (Hartmann) received in the plaintiff's bank certain sums of money from depositors, who came to deposit money in the bank, entered the sums so received in the pass-books of the depositors, but did not enter them in the books of the bank. These sums amounted to $3,695. Second. Certain persons deposited money, filling out the deposit tags. Hartmann received the money, signed or indorsed the tags with his name as secretary, and returned them to the depositors as their vouchers, but failed to enter the amounts in the books of the bank. These sums amount to $5,344.50. Third. Hartmann took from bags deposited in the vault and safe of the plaintiff's bank money set apart for persons who had borrowed the same from the bank, amounting to $3,800. Fourth. He took from the bank certain sums, filing a check or receipt to which he forged the name of V. Chapman, so that it appeared that the money had been paid by him to Chapman, whereas he had paid her nothing, in sums amounting to $5,245.36. All of the foregoing amounts of money were, during the period above mentioned, taken by Hartmann, and converted to his own use.

It is argued that the defendants only agreed to become responsible for money received by Hartmann as secretary; that as secretary he was "to collect all moneys due to the society," and "to keep the same in the mode provided by the board of directors;" that the moneys due to the society he was as secretary to collect consisted of interest on loans due to the corporation, amounts due on a levied assessment, rents of their building, and the principal of a loan, when repaid. It is clear that none of the moneys converted by Hartmann came within either of the classes just named, and, if the obligation of the defendants extended no further than to such moneys, the defendants cannot be charged in this action. But the by-laws, in defining the duties of the secretary, provided that he should keep on hand all the moneys, securities, or properties received by him on account of the society, until the same be disposed of under the direction of the board of directors, and that he shall not use, loan, exchange, or otherwise dispose of any funds of the society. Of these provisions of the by-laws, which were in existence when the society received the bond, it must be held that the defendants were aware. These provisions of the by-laws went into the contract of the sureties, and constituted a part of it. They must be considered as having been inserted in the bond.

The Civil Code provides that, "in interpreting the terms of a contract of suretyship, the same rules are to be observed as in the case of other contracts." Civil Code, § 2837. The rules for the interpretation of contracts will be found in the Civil Code in sections 1636 to 1661, both inclusive. "A contract must be so interpreted as to give effect to the mutual intention of the parties as it existed at the time of contracting, so far as the same is ascertainable and lawful." Id. § 1636. "The whole of a contract is to be taken together, so as to give effect to every part, if reasonably practicable; each clause helping to interpret the other." Id. § 1641. It should be remarked, however, that all the foregoing sections, including section 2837, must be read in connection with section 2836 of the Civil Code, which provides that "a surety cannot be held beyond the express terms of his contract." So far as the words of this latter section limit and control the other sections referred to, they must be regarded. This court, in speaking of bonds like the one under consideration, said, of the matters to which they relate, that they are subjects of private contract, in regard to which the parties may bind themselves in any manner or to any extent not violative of public policy or positive statute. Hubert v. Mendheim, 64 Cal. 226; Enterprise Co. v. Allen, 67 Cal. 508, 8 Pac. Rep. 59. We cannot see why the sureties here have not bound themselves by that portion of the provisions of the by-laws above set forth, as constituting a part of their bond. The obligation is not limited to the moneys due to the society, which the secretary was to collect and keep, but extends also to other moneys of the society received by him which he is to keep on hand, and which he is not to use, loan, exchange, or otherwise dispose of. For these duties of the secretary, common prudence, and that knowledge of the law which we must presume the defendants had when they executed the bond, prompted and counseled them to look to the by-laws of the society; and, if they had examined them, they would have ascertained that these duties were prescribed as stated above, and they would have then found that the duties which are prescribed in the by-laws to be discharged by the secretary are not merely clerical, nor are they limited, as contended by counsel for appellants here, to the moneys due to the society, which he is to collect and keep in the mode prescribed by the board of directors. Having regard to the rules above referred to, provided by the Civil Code for the interpretation of contracts, we cannot, in ascertaining what is the true meaning of the contract of the defendants, confine the examination to the recital which precedes the condition, but the whole must be taken together, inasmuch as "the whole of a contract is to be taken together, so as to give effect to every part, if reasonably practicable." Civil Code, § 1641, supra. We should be disregarding this rule solemnly enacted for our guidance, as well as the dictates of a sober judgment, did we confine our consideration, in ascertaining what the parties meant by the words employed in their contract to express their intent, to the recital, as regards the duties of secretary, above referred to.

It is argued that as the board of directors was elected for only one year, their appointment of Hartmann as secretary existed during the year for which they were chosen; and as the defalcations, except to the amount of $600, occurred subsequent to that year, that the defendants cannot be held responsible for them. We do not think that such contention is maintainable. It is contrary to several well-considered cases, to which we refer: Bank v. Ledoux, 3 La. Ann. 674; Anderson v. Longden, 1 Wheat. 91; Bank v. Ridgely, 1 Har. & G. 432; Bank v. Chickering, 3 Pick. 340. In the foregoing cases the point was distinctly made, argued, and determined. In the case first cited one Duplessis had been appointed note clerk in the Louisiana State Bank. He was appointed to continue in office during the will of the present or any future board of directors of the bank. It was so recited in the bond. The court there said: "The argument presented is mainly deduced from the provisions of the charter with regard to the election of directors. It provides that the directors of the bank shall be annually elected, and forbids the re-election of more than two-thirds of the directors in office at the time of each annual election, permitting no director to hold his office more than three years out of five in succession. But it does not follow, from this legislation with regard to the board of directors, that the mere clerks and servants of the corporation should hold their appointments by the same tenure. If these clerks and servants were to be considered the mere clerks and servants of the directors who appoint them, the conclusion might be a reasonable one. But we do not so regard them. They are the clerks and servants of the corporation, and the limited term of service of the directors does not control the duration of such appointments. It is proper to add that there is nothing in the by-laws of the bank limiting the duration of the place of note clerk, and his appointment itself was general."

In the case of Anderson v. Longden, supra, where a similar point was presented, Chief Justice MARSHALL pointed out the difference in a sheriff's bond, given under the statute of Virginia. "The case of the sheriff's bond," said the chief justice, "is very different. The commission of sheriff, in Virginia, is annual. Of course, his sureties are bound for one year only. It is true the directors of this company are elected annually, but the company has not said that the agent shall be for one year only; his appointment is during pleasure. The sureties do not become sureties in consequence of their confidence in the directors, but of their confidence in the agent whose sureties they are." The question was also discussed in Bank v. Ridgely, supra. This decision will be found on page 432 of 1 Har. & G.

The office of secretary of the plaintiff was not an annual office. It does not appear that the charter or constating papers of the corporation made such office an annual one. Nor is there any by-law or regulation of the society which made such office annual. Though a power was given to the board of directors to fix the term of office of the secretary, it appears that it was never done. The board might have fixed it at one or two or three years. They never did define such term. Of this the defendants were informed by the language of the bond. The bond set forth that "whereas, Hartmann has been chosen and appointed secretary; and whereas, he may hereafter, from time to time, be re-elected, rechosen, and reappointed, or continued in said office to hold the same: now, if said Hartmann shall, during said term, and during all the time he shall hold said office, well and truly serve the said corporation as secretary, so long as he shall continue and be continued in said office, well and truly," etc. The board of directors had power invested in them, under the bylaws, to dismiss the secretary summarily, and it might have made the appointment of secretary for an indefinite period; subject, always, to the power of the board to dismiss him summarily. We can see no reason why the defendants could not contract to be responsible for the conduct of Hartmann, so long as he should continue in the office of secretary. This, we think, they clearly did do. There was no law in existence when they executed the bond which prohibited them from so contracting.

On this point, Hughes v. Smith, 5 Johns. 167, is in point, and, as was observed of it in Hubert v. Mendheim, 64 Cal. 223, "is worthy of much consideration, because the decision in that case has the sanction of the honored name of Chief Justice KENT. There the bond (on which the action was brought) was given to the sheriff by a deputy, conditioned for the due execution of the office of deputy-sheriff during his continuance in such office. The sheriff having taken on himself the office on the 16th of September, 1801, pursuant to an appointment in August, was reappointed in March, 1803. The defendants (who were sureties on the bond) pleaded that the sheriff had sustained no damages in consequence of any act of defendants previous to his taking upon himself the office under his reappointment in 1803. It was held the plea was no answer to the declaration." "The bond" said the court, "was that Smith should execute well the office of under-sheriff during his continuance in such office, and he was equally in that office after as before the reappointment of the plaintiff. There was no interval between the one appointment and the other in which the plaintiff was not sheriff, and it was not necessary to reappoint Smith in order to constitute him under-sheriff." 5 Johns. 172. We are of opinion that by the terms of the bond the defendants made themselves responsible for the defaults of Hartmann so long as he continued to be secretary.

It is contended that the sixteenth finding is not sustained by the evidence as to the sum of $3,800, which, it is found, was taken from the safe of plaintiff while the same was in his custody as secretary of said corporation. The defendants were not responsible for any moneys converted by Hartmann which were not the funds of the society. The defendants, as sureties, "cannot be held bound beyond the express terms of his contract." Civil Code, § 2836. The terms of their contract do not include any moneys not belonging to the society, and the evidence on this point does not show that these moneys were the moneys of the society. The question of the ownership of these sums is left in doubt by the evidence, and under such circumstances we cannot hold that they were such moneys as the defendants as sureties are chargeable with under their contract. This sum of $3,800 was made up of sums of money lent, of which $2,000 was lent to I. H. Bostwick, $1,000 to C. Jones, and $800 to H. Nieman. The entire testimony as to these losses comes from the president of the society, and is as follows: "During the time that Hartmann was secretary, the custom in making 'building loans,' so-called, was when a loan was granted one or more payments were made on account, on the architect's certificate. Then, when we entered the amount of the loan in the ledger, we set aside the balance. We took the note and mortgage from the borrower in the first instance. We made these advances, and then, at a certain period, we charged up the whole loan, and put the balance of the whole loan, less the advances made, in a bag, and put it in the safe, with a tag showing the borrower's name. From that time he paid interest on it, and no further entries were made on the books. When any money was taken from the bags, a memorandum would be made on the tag attached to the bag." The witness testified to the absence of the amounts, already set out herein, from the bags of Bostwick, Jones, and Nieman, discovered after Hartmann's death; that nobody except himself and Hartmann had access to those bags; and that he did not take any of the money. The money has since been made good by the bank. Afterwards, in answer to the court, the witness gave an instance of money deposited in a bag in the safe, thus: "June 5th, Nieman gave his note and mortgage for $7,500; July 7th, he was given $500; again, in July, $1,500; and July 21st, $1,500, of which no entries were made; but on that day the balance of $4,000 was placed in a bag, with a tag on it giving Nieman's name, and the amount in the bag, and then an entry was made, and interest charged to him. The architect's certificate and Nieman's money order were our vouchers, which we filed with his note, but no entry was made in the books until the balance was placed in the bag, and then the whole was charged. The Court. Then it appeared on the books that he had received his money,—as if he had received $7,500, and taken it away with him? Yes, sir; set it aside. The Court. The fact that he left this money with you in your safe, in a bag,—special deposit,—would not be entered on the books at all?"

It seems to us that it might well be held that the money placed in the bags belonged to the borrowers, and not to the society.

It would be strange that the borrower should be paying interest to the society on money which he had borrowed, and the payment of which he had secured by note and mortgage, if it was not his own money. Further, no entries of such moneys in bags was made at all in the books of the bank. If the money was left as a special deposit, it seems to have been left as the money of the borrower, and no entry was allowed to be made of it as a special deposit by any one in the bank's books. The course of dealing with this money, as above stated, we infer from the testimony, was the course approved by the directors of the bank. If the bank became the custodian of specific sums of money in bags which were the moneys of other persons, we are of opinion that the defendants, as sureties, cannot, under the terms of this bond, be held responsible for them. We find no evidence of such negligence on the part of directors of the bank as to release the defendants from liability on the bond in suit. We find no other error in the record than the one above pointed out as to the sum of $3,800, but for such error the judgment must be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial. So ordered.

We concur: SHARPSTEIN, J.; MCFARLAND, J.; FOX, J.; PATERSON, J.

WORKS, J., (dissenting.) I dissent. In my opinion, the judgment should have been for the defendants. None of the moneys received and misappropriated by Hartmann were received by him as secretary, nor were they in any way covered by the terms of the bond of the defendants. To hold them liable for any part of these moneys is to render the defendants liable beyond the plain terms of their contract.

I concur in the above: BEATTY, C. J.

BARNUM v. BRIDGES. (No. 12,582.)

SCHOOL LANDS—APPLICATIONS TO PURCHASE.

1. Pol. Code Cal. § 3498, provides that all applications to purchase school land, filed in the surveyor general's office, must be retained by him 90 days before approval, and must be approved by him (when there is no conflict) at the end of six months, subject to the requirements of sections 3406, 3407, which relate to the acceptance by the United States of the land as part satisfaction of the grant to the state; and all applications not approved after six months, where approval has not been demanded, or the contest referred to the court, or demand for reference made, as provided for by section 3414, shall be null and void. Held, that the provision invalidating applications six months after filing, when no demand for approval is made, refers to applications in contest cases only, as no demand for approval is necessary where there is only one application.

2. In a trial by the court, the opinion of one shown to have ordinary knowledge as a farmer and logger, as to what it would cost to clear land and prepare it for the plow, is not necessarily improper, as the court understands the extent of the witness' knowledge, and can fairly estimate the weight of his evidence.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Humboldt county; J. J. DE HAVEN, Judge.

Pol. Code Cal. § 3398, provides that the surveyor general is the agent of the state for the location in the United States land-offices of the unsold portion of the 500,000 acres, and the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections granted to the state for school purposes, and lands in lieu thereof. Sections 3406, 3407, provide that the surveyor general must, when application is made to him for lands mentioned in section 3398, communicate with the United States land-office, and ask that the lands described in the application be accepted in part satisfaction of the grant under which it is sought to be located; and, when the acceptance of the register of the United States land-office is obtained, he must give the party applying a copy of his approval. Section 3414 provides that when a contest arises concerning the approval of a survey before the surveyor general, or concerning a certificate of purchase or other evidence of title before the register, the officer may, where the contest involves a question of fact, proceed to hear and determine it; but where a question of law is involved, or either party demands trial in the state courts, the officer must make and enter an order referring the contest to the district court of the county in which the land is situated.

Chamberlain & McGowan and A. W. Hanna, (Wilson & Wilson, of counsel,) for appellant. J. H. G. Weaver and G. D. Murray, for respondent.

FOOTE, C. This action was brought to determine whether Barnum or Bridges had the better right to purchase a certain half section of school land from the state, the same being a part of the thirty-sixth sections of land donated to the state of California by the congress of the United States for school purposes. Judgment was rendered in favor of the defendant, from which, and an order denying a new trial, the plaintiff appeals.

The first ground claimed to militate in favor of the appellant's contention seems to be that the evidence, viewed in the light of the principles enunciated by the appellate court of the state in the case of Manley v Cunningham, 72 Cal. 240, 13 Pac. Rep. 622, is plainly, and without conflict, conclusive of the fact that the land was suitable for the cultivation of ordinary crops, and was therefore agricultural, and not timber, land; which latter kind the decision of the trial court defined and adjudicated it to be. The evidence on the one side, as it seems to us, is contradictory to some extent, at least, to that given in favor of the adverse party, and the decision of the lower court upon the point should be upheld.

But the further contention is made by the appellant that the respondent could not be permitted to succeed in the controversy, because his application to purchase the land was made more than six months before any demand for the surveyor general's approval of such demand had been made. The trial court seems to have been of the opposite opinion, even conceding, as was the fact, that no such demand had been made within the statutory period just adverted to; the basis of the conclusion being, that the statute in question did not intend to visit the penalty it provided for upon those about whose application to purchase there was no contest, that tribunal being of the opinion "that the section (Pol. Code, §3498) does not apply in a case where only one application is on file, where no approval could be had by reason of the land being covered with pre-emption filings, and but for which it is made the duty of the surveyor general to approve without other demand than is implied in the application itself." The section of the Political Code, supra, is: "All applications, under whatsoever act, filed in the office of the surveyor general, must be retained ninety days before approval, and must be approved (when there is no conflict) by the surveyor general at the expiration of six months, subject, however, to the provisions of sections 3406 and 3407 of this Code, and all unapproved applications which have been on file over six months, wherein the approval has not been demanded, and wherein the contest has not been referred to court, or a demand made for an order of reference, as provided in section 3414 of the Political Code, shall be null and void." We think that the learned judge below was right in his conclusion. The duty of the surveyor general seems to be clearly defined. In the first clause of the statute, in cases where there is but one application to purchase school lands, the title to which has passed to the state from the United States, and which are subject to be granted to purchasers from the state, he is obliged by law to approve the application, without reference to any further demand than that contained in the application to purchase. The other part of the statute requires that, when there is a contest, "all unapproved applications which have been on file over six months, wherein the approval has not been demanded, and wherein the contest has not been referred to court, or a demand made for an order of reference, as provided in section 3414 of the Political Code, shall be null and void." Thus a marked distinction is drawn between the necessity for a demand for an approval of the application to purchase in cases where there is only one applicant and no contest, and those where there is more than one application, where a contest exists as to the right to purchase, and where either there has been no order of reference, or a demand made for such an order. In the instances last mentioned, if more than six months elapse from the date of filing, before a demand for approval is made, the application becomes null and void. In the case in hand no other demand for approval was necessary beyond the application to purchase.

It is further urged that the court below committed error in allowing the witness Mr Dahle to answer this question: "In your judgment, what would it cost an acre to clear this land off, take the timber off, stumps and roots, and put it in a condition to run a plow through?" the objection being that the witness was not an expert in clearing this kind of land. While the witness may never have actually cleared any land just like that in dispute here, yet his testimony shows that he had an ordinary knowledge, as "a farmer and logger," of land and its qualities; and the court, being possessed of the extent of his knowledge upon the general subject of the qualities of various kinds of lands, was in a position fairly to estimate the weight which should be given to his evidence, and should not have excluded it altogether. It tended to show some knowledge of the subject about which the witness was called on to testify, and whether weak or conclusive in its nature was for the court to consider and determine, but it was not necessarily improper for that tribunal to hear. For these reasons we advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; VAN CLIEF, C.

QUAY v. PRESIDIO & F. R. Co. (No. 12,595.)

PRINCIPAL AND AGENT—POWER OF ATTORNEY—RATIFICATION.

1. A power of attorney authorized the agent, among other things, "to exchange [the principal's] old issues or certificates of stock, and to receive new issues or certificates in lieu thereof;" but it nowhere gave any authority to sell or mortgage the principal's property. It concluded with the general words: "And, generally, to manage and control to my best interest and advantage * * * all my property, and to transact all business * * * which may be requisite or proper to effectuate all or any of the premises," etc. Held, that this created a special agency, within the meaning of Civil Code Cal. § 2297, defining "special agents," and did not authorize a corporation, on the presentation of a certificate of stock indorsed by the agent, to cancel it, and issue a new one in the name of a third person.

2. Nor is the act of the corporation justified by Civil Code Cal. § 2317, which provides that "ostensible authority is such as a principal, * * * by want of ordinary care, causes or allows a third person to believe the agent to possess," since more than ordinary care was taken to define the powers of the agent.

3. The connection in which the word "exchange" is used in the power of attorney shows that it was limited to an exchange of old certificates for new ones, and did not authorize a transfer of the property represented by the certificates.

4. The fact that the principal afterwards told another of his agents that he would not hold him responsible for delivering the certificate to the first agent does not amount to a ratification of the transfer by the corporation.

5. The principal having received no benefit from the act of his agent, the case does not come within Civil Code Cal. § 2310, providing that, where an oral authorization would suffice, a ratification can be made by accepting or retaining the benefit of the act.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; F. W. LAWLER, Judge.

Action by John M. Quay, executor, etc., of John G. Kellogg, deceased, against the Presidio & Ferries Railroad Company, for the unlawful conversion of 100 shares of decedent's stock. From a judgment in plaintiff's favor, and an order denying its motion for a new trial, defendant appeals. Civil Code Cal. § 2297, provides: "An agent for a particular act or transaction is called a 'special agent.' All others are 'general agents.'" Section 2310 provides that, where an oral authorization would suffice, a ratification can be made by accepting or retaining the benefits of an agent's act, with notice thereof.

Jarboe, Harrison & Goodfellow, for appellant. E. J. Pringle, for respondent.

FOX, J. John G. Kellogg, respondent's testator, was the owner of 200 shares of the stock of the corporation defendant, evidenced by certificate No. 27, issued in the name of said Kellogg, May 3, 1882. On June 17, 1884, Kellogg was absent from this state, and A. W. Bowman and Joseph M. Quay each held powers of attorney from him, in full force, and each was acting as his attorney in fact in the conduct of his business. When he went away Kellogg left this certificate in possession of Quay, and on or about the said 17th of June Bowman went to Quay and asked Quay to let him have the certificate, as "he wanted to sell 100 shares, and he did not want to have it appear on the books that he was selling his own stock." Quay delivered the certificate to him, as requested, and thereupon Bowman indorsed the certificate, "JOHN G. KELLOGG, by A. W. BOWMAN, his Attorney in Fact," and sent it to the office of the company, where, in pursuance with his request, two new certificates were issued in lieu thereof, each for 100 shares, one in the name of said Kellogg, and the other in the name of George F. Bowman, trustee. The new certificate issued in the name of Kellogg was delivered to A. W Bowman, and by him delivered to Kellogg after the latter's return. The certificate issued in the name of George F. Bowman, trustee, was delivered to him, and by him sold to one Bradley, for the benefit of A. W. Bowman, the certificate therefor being numbered 363. After Kellogg's return he had a conversation with Quay, in which the latter informed him of the transaction between himself and Bowman, when Kellogg said: "Personally, Quay, I don't hold you responsible. Had Bowman asked me to loan him the stock, my relations were such with him that I would have let him have it." This action was brought by Kellogg against the corporation defendant for the sum of $6,500 damages, for the unlawful conversion of the hundred shares of stock, part of the said 200 shares, so represented by said certificate No. 363. Kellogg died pending the suit, and Quay, his executor, was substituted as plaintiff. Plaintiff had judgment, motion for new trial made and denied, and defendant appeals from both the judgment and order.

On the appeal two points are made:

First, that the court erred in denying defendant's motion for nonsuit. The case upon this point depends upon the construction to be given to Bowman's power of attorney. The by-laws of the company, as is usual in such cases, provided that stock could be transferred on the books of the company by the delivery of the old certificate, properly indorsed, and the issue of new certificate or certificates therefor, the old certificate to be at the same time canceled. The certificate in this case was delivered, as before stated, indorsed, "JOHN G. KELLOGG, by A. W. BOWMAN, his Attorney in Fact." Before canceling that certificate, and issuing new ones in its place, it was the duty of the corporation to know whether it was properly indorsed; in other words, to know whether Bowman held a power of attorney authorizing him to make such indorsement, and, if he did, whether there was any limitation as to the purpose for which he was authorized to make it. An inspection of the power of attorney shows that it was not general, but special. It created, not a general, but a special, agency, within the meaning of section 2297, Civil Code, cited by appellant. Under it he had authority to do many things, but no authority to do anything except such as was therein specially mentioned, or those things necessarily incident to the execution of the powers specially mentioned. So far as relates to the powers granted in dealing with corporations, and with the stocks thereof, it reads: "For me, and in my name, and on my behalf, * * * at any and all meetings of stockholders of companies or corporations in which I now have or may hereafter have stock, to appear and vote on such number of shares as I may at such time be entitled to vote; to exchange old issues or certificates, and receive new issues or certificates in lieu thereof." And it gives like special power in reference to many other things, among them to the recovery of the possession of and leasing of lands, collection of rents, the payment of taxes, and the like. But it nowhere, either in express words or by implication, gives any power to sell, mortgage, or hypothecate, or otherwise transfer, any of the property of his principal. It does conclude with these general words: "And generally to manage and control, to my best interest and advantage, all my property, real and personal, to transact all business, make, execute, acknowledge, and deliver all contracts, deeds, writings, assurances, and instruments which may be requisite or proper to effectuate all or any of the premises, with the same power, and to all intents and purposes with the same validity, as I could if personally present." It will be observed that these words, although general in form, and full as to the designation of papers which may be executed, expressly limit the execution of such papers to such as "may be requisite or proper to effectuate all or any of the premises." What premises? It can be none other than such as were thereinbefore mentioned. These included, among other things, not before mentioned, the power to make compromises and releases in certain cases, but none of them included power of sale or transfer of property, real or personal. When, therefore, certificate No. 27 was presented to the defendant, it was properly indorsed to authorize its cancellation, and the issue of new certificates in lieu thereof, but it was not properly indorsed to authorize the transfer of the stock which it represented to any other person. The only authority which that indorsement gave to the company was to cancel that certificate, and issue one or more new ones, representing the same number of shares, to John G. Kellogg; and it was just as incumbent upon the corporation to know this fact as it was to know that Bowman had authority to indorse for any purpose.

Section 2317, Civil Code, is cited in justification of the company in acting as it did in allowing that transfer of the hundred shares of stock, but we do not think it covers the case. It reads: "Ostensible authority is such as a principal, intentionally, or by want of ordinary care, causes or allows a third person to believe the agent to possess." In this case more than ordinary care was taken to define the powers of the agent, and the company, with that written limitation of his powers before it, (for it must be presumed to have seen and examined the power, else it would not have acted at all,) aided and assisted the agent in exceeding his powers, and allowed a transfer of stock which it was wholly unauthorized to do.

A point is made on the use of the word "exchange," as found in the power of attorney; but the very connection in which it is used shows that it was limited to an exchange of old certificates for new ones, and did not authorize an exchange or transfer of the property represented by the certificate. The cases cited in this connection are therefore not in point. It must be held that this power, while it authorized the exchange of old certificates for new ones, did not authorize a transfer of the property. Lord v. Sherman, 2 Cal. 498; Billings v. Morrow, 7 Cal. 171; Treat v. De Celis, 41 Cal. 202.

The remaining point is that the transfer was ratified by Kellogg, when he told Quay that he would not hold him responsible, etc. We cannot so regard the effect of that conversation. In it no reference was made whatever to the act of either Bowman or the company in transferring the stock. The sole subject of consideration at that time was the act of Quay in delivering the certificate to Bowman. The act of Quay for which Kellogg said that he would not hold Quay responsible, was simply the act of delivering certificate No. 27 to Bowman, another attorney in fact of Kellogg's, and one who, as shown by the two powers of attorney, both of which are given in the transcript, had more ample powers than Quay himself; for the powers of both were limited, and those of Quay were limited to a less number of subjects than those of Bowman; in fact, Quay had no power except that of making collections, and giving receipts and acquittances for moneys collected. The conversation had no relation whatever to the disposition which had been, or might have been, made by Bowman of the stock, or to Bowman's power in the premises, or to the act of the company in making a transfer of the stock on its books not authorized by the owner thereof, either in person or by attorney.

It cannot be held that there was an implied ratification by acts in pais, for the principal received no benefit from the act of his agent. The case does not come in any sense within the provisions of section 2310, Civil Code, on the subject of ratification. The case of Treadwell v. Davis, 34 Cal. 605, cited by appellant, is not in point. That is the case of two lienholders, each holding as security for debt. The holder of the first lien received his money from the holder of the second lien, and assigned over his claim, so that the latter held the property for both amounts. Afterwards the debtor said it was all right; he was glad the arrangement had been made; and that was held to be a sufficient ratification of the assignment. There the debtor lost nothing, but rather gained an advantage by the transaction, in the way of forbearance on the first debt. So with the other cases cited by appellant; they do not seem to have any application to the facts of this case. Nothing in the record in this case implies a ratification of the unauthorized act of Bowman, or of the act of the defendant, done in contravention of law, and of its own by-laws, in transferring on its books, to a stranger, the title to 100 shares of its stock, without proper indorsement and surrender of the old certificate for the same shares. Judgment and order affirmed.

In re OHM'S ESTATE. (No. 13,232.)

APPEALABLE ORDERS.

No appeal lies from an order that the administratrix of an estate allow her name to be used as plaintiff in an action to recover property alleged to have been fraudulently conveyed by decedent in his life-time, though Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 963, subd. 1, provides for an appeal from a final judgment in special proceedings; as Const. Cal. art. 6, § 4, provides that "the supreme court shall have appellate jurisdiction * * * in all such probate matters as may be provided by law," and Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 963, subd. 3, providing for appeals in probate matters, makes no provision for an appeal from such an order.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. V. COFFEY, Judge.

Petition by Susan E. Judge against Anne A. Ohm, administratrix, etc., praying that the administratrix be compelled to allow her name to be used as plaintiff in an action to recover property conveyed by decedent in his life-time in fraud of the petitioner, one of his creditors. From an order granting the prayer of the petition the administratrix appeals. Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 963, subd. 1, provides: "An appeal may be taken to the supreme court * * * from a final judgment entered in * * * special proceedings commenced in a superior court."

W. C. Belcher, for appellant. J. M. Kinley, for respondent.

VAN CLIEF, C. This is a proceeding in the probate department of the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, on the petition of Susan E. Judge, based on sections 1589, 1590, and 1591 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and stating, substantially, that the deceased, in his life-time, owned a large amount of valuable real estate, which was community property of himself and his wife, Augusta L. Ohm, and which he had conveyed to his wife without consideration, for the purpose of defrauding his creditors, of whom the petitioner was one, in the sum of $5,000; that the petitioner, in due time, presented to the administratrix of the estate, for allowance, her claim for said sum of $5,000, which was rejected by the administratrix, and that petitioner had commenced an action in the superior court against the administratrix for the recovery of the same, which action is still pending and undetermined, that there are not sufficient assets of said estate to pay the claim, if judgment shall be recovered therefor; that the petitioner requested said administratrix to commence and prosecute an action against Augusta L. Ohm to recover said property so fraudulently conveyed, offering to defray all expenses of such action, and that the administratrix refused to commence such action. The prayer of the petition is that the court order the administratrix to allow her name to be used as plaintiff in an action against Augusta L. Ohm to set aside said fraudulent conveyance made to her by the decedent in his life-time, and to have the property so conveyed adjudged to be the property of the estate, subject to the payment of its debts. On the hearing the court "ordered that said petitioner, Susan E. Judge, be, and she hereby is, allowed to sue for said real estate in the name of Anna A. Ohm, said administratrix; and said Anna A. Ohm, administratrix, is hereby ordered to allow her name to be used in any such suit for the recovery thereof for the benefit of said estate, and the creditors thereof, and any such suit to be prosecuted to final judgment, on the condition that said petitioner, Susan E. Judge, defray all expenses and costs of such suit, and save the said administratrix harmless therefrom." From this order the administratrix appeals, and the only point made by counsel for respondent is that the order is not an appealable order. The appellant's counsel contends, however, that the order appealed from was made in a "special proceeding commenced in a superior court," and is the "final judgment entered" therein, in the sense of the first division of section 963 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and is therefore appealable. Whether this proceeding is a "special proceeding" or not, it certainly is a "probate matter." Its purpose is to control the official action of the administratrix in the matter of collecting and applying alleged assets of the estate. The constitution provides that "the supreme court shall have appellate jurisdiction * * * in all such probate matters as may be provided by law." Article 6, § 4. The only provisions of law, as to appeals in probate matters, are contained in the third sudivision of section 963 of the Code of Civil Procedure, in which is to be found no provision for an appeal from such an order as that appealed from in this case. In Estate of Montgomery, 55 Cal. 210; Estate of Sbarboro, 70 Cal. 147, 11 Pac. Rep. 563; and Estate of Keane, 56 Cal. 407,—it was decided that an appeal does not lie from an order denying a petition for the revocation of letters of administration, because such order is not included in the section 963 of the Code of Civil Procedure. In Estate of Carpenter, 73 Cal. 202, 14 Pac. Rep. 677, it was held, for the same reason, that an appeal does not lie from an order appointing a special administrator; and in Estate of Poten, 72 Cal. 576, 14 Pac. Rep. 209, that an appeal does not lie from an order refusing to compel the clerk of the court to pay over money in his hands, belonging to the estate, to a special administrator. Were not the proceedings in which the orders appealed from were made, in all the cases here cited, special proceedings in the same sense that the proceeding in the case at bar is a special proceeding?

This question, however, need not be answered here, further than to say that the construction by this court of the constitutional provision above quoted excepts final orders in special probate proceedings, if any such there be, from the operation of the Code rule, that appeals lie from "a final judgment entered * * * in a special proceeding commenced in a superior court;" and this construction was probably given in view of the maxim, expressio unius, est exclusio alterius. The constitutional expression that appeals lie "in all such probate matters as may be provided by law" excludes appeals in probate matters not provided for by law. At all events, this is the effect of the cases above cited, and upon their authority I think the appeal should be dismissed.

We concur: HAYNE, C.; FOOTE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the appeal is dismissed.

CITY OF EUREKA v. ARMSTRONG. (No. 12,565.)

DEDICATION—ACCEPTANCE—ABANDONMENT.

1. A deed given by defendant to a third person, wherein the description recites that the boundary lines of the property conveyed were to run "to and along Twelfth street," which was then an open public street to the east of, but not extended westerly through, defendant's property, constitutes a dedication of, or an offer by defendant to dedicate, land for the purpose of a street.[1]

2. An order of the common council that "all streets * * * which have been dedicated by the owners thereof * * * are hereby accepted and declared to be public streets," is sufficient acceptance of streets which have been dedicated by duly-recorded deeds, without specifying them by name.[1]

3. The mere fact that an official map, adopted after the dedication of a street, has a line drawn across the mouth of the extension of such street, does not deprive the public of their right thereto.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Humboldt county; J. J. DE HAVEN, Judge.

McQuaid & Wheeler, for appellant. J. N. Gillett and J. H. G. Weaver, for respondent.

HAYNE, C. This was an action of ejectment brought by the city of Eureka to recover a portion of an alleged street called "Twelfth Street," of which the defendant was in possession. The trial court gave judgment for the plaintiff, and the defendant appeals.

It may be doubted whether ejectment is the proper action for the assertion of a right to an easement; but the appellant has not made any objection on this ground, and we infer that he desires to waive questions of form in order to have the question as to the existence of a street determined on its merits. Twelfth street was an open public street for some distance to the east of the property in controversy, which would be covered by the street if extended westerly In order to prove that it was so extended the plaintiff put in evidence a deed to one Bowman made in 1883 by the defendant, who was then the owner of the property The description in this deed was as follows: "Beginning at the S. W. corner of Twelfth and F streets, running thence S., along the W. line of F street, 55 feet; thence W., parallel with Twelfth street, 120 feet, thence N., parallel with F street, 55 feet, to Twelfth street; and thence E., along the S. line of Twelfth street, 120 feet, to the place of beginning." The portion of "Twelfth street," to and along which those lines were run, was the extension claimed by the plaintiff here. If the deed did not constitute a dedication, (see Kittle v. Pfeiffer, 22 Cal. 489,) it was at least an offer to dedicate; and the offer must be construed to relate to the whole block, and not merely to 120 feet thereof, for it will not be presumed that the intention was to make a cul-de-sac.

[1] In general, as to what constitutes a dedication of land to public use as a street, and its acceptance by the public, see Baker v. Vanderburg, (Mo.) 12 S. W. Rep. 462, and note; City of Eureka v. Croghan, (Cal.) 22 Pac. Rep. 693; note to City of Eureka v. Croghan, (Cal.) 19 Pac. Rep. 485.

The appellant contends that an acceptance was necessary to complete the dedication; and we so understand the law. People v. Reed, 22 Pac. Rep. 474. But we think that there was such acceptance. In 1885, which was less than two years after the deed above mentioned, the city council passed the following order. "All streets and alleys within the corporate limits of the city of Eureka, which have been dedicated by the owners thereof for the use of the public, are hereby accepted and declared to be public streets of the city of Eureka." We are unable to see why this was not a sufficient acceptance. The common council must be the proper body to accept a dedication. If not, who is there that can give a formal acceptance? And if the order had in terms applied to Twelfth street there could have been no doubt. The only questions that can be raised are whether it was necessary to mention by name the street to be accepted, or whether a general reference to it is sufficient, and whether this is a sufficient reference. We think that a general reference is sufficient, and that, inasmuch as the deed in question was recorded, the municipal authorities must be presumed to have been aware of it, and to have intended the general reference to apply to it. The case of Harding v. Jasper, 14 Cal. 649, is not in conflict with the foregoing. In that case there was no dedication, or offer to dedicate, by the owners. There was therefore nothing for the supervisors to accept. And as a matter of course they could not by their mere fiat make a road without reference to the rights of the owners. In the case before us there was a dedication, or offer to dedicate, and the acceptance was within a reasonable time, and before any attempt at revocation by the owner.

The land having been duly dedicated, and accepted as a public street, the subsequent adoption of an official map, having a line across the mouth of the extension of the street, is not sufficient to divest the public of their right. Even if the local board had power to effect such a result, the mere drawing of a line upon a map is not an exercise of the power. There was no material error in the admission or rejection of evidence. Nor do we see any error in the instructions; but, if there had been, it would have been immaterial, for, the above facts being uncontradictable, the court might properly have instructed the jury to find for the plaintiff. We therefore advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; VAN CLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are affirmed.

THORNTON, J. I concur in the judgment, and generally in what is said in the opinion, but do not wish to be understood as approving what is said in People v. Reed, referred to in the opinion.

In re AH YOU. (No. 20,586.)

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—POLICE COURTS—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW.

St. Cal. 1865–66, p. 193, (Act March 10, 1866,) established a police court in the city of Oakland, and provided for the election of a police judge. St. 1885, p. 213, (Act March 18, 1885,) vested the judicial power of cities having 30,000, and less than 100,000, inhabitants (Oakland being such city) in a police court to be held by the city justices, or by one of them, to be designated by the mayor. On February 14, 1889, a charter framed and adopted in accordance with Const. Amend. No. 16, approved March 10, 1887, (St. 1887, p. 88,) became the organic law of Oakland, under which charter a police court was organized, and a judge thereof duly elected. Held, that under Const. Cal. 1879, art. 11, § 6, providing that "cities or towns heretofore or hereafter organized, and all charters thereof framed or adopted by authority of this constitution, shall be subject to and controlled by general laws," the act of March 18, 1885, was a "general law," was intended to embrace the city of Oakland within its provisions, and was an implied repeal of the act of March 10, 1866; and that the charter of February 14, 1889, was subject to said act of 1885, and therefore the police court organized under such charter had no legal existence. Following People v. Henshaw, 18 Pac. Rep. 413. Fox, J., dissenting.

Application for habeas corpus.

M. C. Chapman and E. C. Chapman, for petitioner. Geo. W. Reed, (J. E. McElrath, of counsel,) for respondent. Harvey S. Brown, amicus curiæ.

PER CURIAM. This is a proceeding upon habeas corpus. The facts out of which the case arises are stipulated as follows: "(1) That on the 14th day of February, 1889, a charter framed and adopted in accordance with Const. Amend. No. 16, approved March 10, 1887, (St. 1887, p. 88,) became, and ever since has been, and now is the organic law of the city of Oakland. (2) That at a muncipal election duly and regularly held in the city of Oakland, under the provisions of said charter, one Alexander Laidlaw received certain votes, being a majority of all the votes cast for police judge, was thereafter, by the muncipal council of the said city of Oakland, declared elected police judge of the police court provided for in said charter. Thereupon the said Alexander Laidlaw filed a bond as such police judge as required by the said charter, took the oath of office, and has ever since been, and now claims to be, the police judge of the police court provided for in said charter. (3) That on the 24th day of July, 1889, the said Ah You was brought before the said police court, so as aforesaid created and organized, and before the said Alexander Laidlaw, so as aforesaid claiming to be judge thereof, and was, by said court and judge, tried and convicted of a misdemeanor, and thereafter, on the said 26th day of July, 1889, was, by the said court and by the said judge thereof, sentenced to imprisonment in the city jail of the said city of Oakland for the period of six months, and adjudged to pay a fine of $500, and, under commitment issued from said court by said judge thereof, was and is imprisoned in said city jail. (4) That said police court, and said judge thereof, derive whatever of power, jurisdiction, or authority they, or either or both of them, possess solely or wholly from, and pursuant to, the provisions of the said charter of the said city of Oakland. (5) That said police court, established, organized, existing, and set in operation under, and in pursuance of, the provisions of said charter, is not a police court provided for or existing and in pursuance of the general act of March 18, 1885, and said Alexander Laidlaw, the police judge aforesaid, is not now, and never has been, either a judge de jure or de facto of any police court established or organized under and in pursuance of said act of March 18, 1885, in said city of Oakland." These being the facts, the only question to be decided is whether the police court established by the freeholders' charter of the city of Oakland (see Appendix to St. 1869, p. 535) has a legal existence. If it has no legal existence, it is conceded that its judgment is void and that the petitioner must be discharged. The city of Oakland was a municipal corporation prior to the adoption of the constitution of 1879. It had a police court established by act of March 10, 1866, (St. 1865–66, p. 193.) Section 6, art. 11, of the constitution of 1879, is as follows: "Corporations for municipal purposes shall not be created by special laws; but the legislature, by general laws, shall provide for the incorporation, organization, and classification, in proportion to population, of cities and towns, which laws may be altered, amended, or repealed. Cities and towns heretofore organized or incorporated may become organized under such general laws whenever a majority of the electors voting at a general election shall so determine, and shall organize in conformity therewith; and cities or towns heretofore or hereafter organized, and all charters thereof framed or adopted by authority of this constitution, shall be subject to and controlled by general laws." March 18, 1885, the legislature passed an act entitled "An act to provide for police courts in cities having 30,000, and under 100,000, inhabitants, and to provide for officers thereof." St. 1885, p. 213. By this act it was provided that one of the city justices, to be designated by the mayor, should be the judge of the police court, and the powers and the jurisdiction of the court were prescribed and regulated. Notwithstanding the passage of this act, a police judge (Daniels) was elected under the provisions of the act of 1866, and he assumed, and undertook to exercise, the duties of the office, upon the theory that the act of 1885 was unconstitutional, or, if constitutional, that it did not supersede the act of 1866; that act being, as it was contended, a part of the old city charter, and, as such, exempt from the operation of any special or general law relating to the government of municipal corporations. At the same time one Henshaw claimed to be police judge, by virtue of the provisions of the act of 1885.

In this state of the case an action entitled People v. Henshaw was instituted for the purpose of testing the right to the office, wherein it was held by this court (76 Cal. 436, 18 Pac. Rep. 413), that the act of 1885 was a general law; was in all respects constitutional; that it repealed the act of 1866, and in so far superseded the old charter of the city Oakland. If that case was correctly decided,—if the old charter was superseded by the law of 1885,—there can be no question that the freeholders' charter, since adopted, is also subject to the same act. The last clause of section 6, art. 11, of the constitution, will admit of no other construction. "Cities and towns heretofore or hereafter organized, and all charters thereof framed or adopted, by authority of this constitution, shall be subject to and controlled by general laws." The freeholders' charter of Oakland was "framed and adopted by authority of this constitution," (article 11, § 8, as amended,) and is not only subject to and controlled by general laws, according to the express terms of section 6, art. 11, but was also required by the section (8) in pursuance of which it was framed to be "consistent with and subject to the constitution and laws of this state." There is therefore no escape from the conclusion that if the old charter was superseded by the act of 1885, the new charter is subject to and controlled by it; and the police court which the freeholders' charter attempted to establish must be held to have no legal existence, unless we are prepared to squarely overrule the decision in People v. Henshaw. This is conceded by counsel for respondent, and we are asked to review and reverse that decision. The court, however, has decided to abide by the conclusions there announced, for the, reasons and upon the considerations there stated. It follows that the prisoner must be discharged and it is so ordered.

FOX, J. I dissent. I think the court erred in its decision in the case of People v. Henshaw, 76 Cal. 436, 18 Pac. Rep. 413, and that the decision in that case ought to be reconsidered. No property rights have grown up under it, and no injury can result from a correction of the error then made, if it was an error. The act of the legislature then under consideration—"An act to provide for police courts in cities having 30,000, and under 100,000, inhabitants, and to provide for officers thereof," approved March 18, 1885, commonly called the "Whitney Bill," (St. 1885, p 213)—was, at the time of its passage, as clearly a special law as any ever passed by a legislative body, and, under the constitution, should have been declared void. But, whether that decision was right or wrong as the laws then stood, it is, to my mind, most clear that the act then under consideration is not now a law of the state applicable to the city of Oakland. At that time the city of Oakland was a municipality existing under special act passed long before the adoption of the present constitution; and, if the Whitney bill was a general law, the charter was subject to amendment, and was amended by such general law, according to the interpretation which has several times been given to the constitution by this court. But the city is no longer a municipality under that special charter; nor is it a municipality organized under general law, as is provided by the constitution may be done. But it is a municipality organized under a charter prepared and adopted by its own people, in a manner specially and expressly provided for in the constitution itself,—a charter approved by the legislature, and made by the constitution itself, when so prepared, adopted, and approved, inviolable at the hands of the legislature; an instrument which the legislature has no power to alter or amend, either by general or special law. See section 8, art. 11, Const., as amended, (St. 1887, p. 88.) Nothing in that charter is in conflict with the constitution, or with the general laws of the state. The legislature by general law has provided for the establishment of police courts in the muncipalities of the state as the constitution provides it may do, (article 6, § 1;) and it has prescribed their jurisdiction. Under and in conformity with such general law the charter has provided for the establishment of a police court in this municipality, and prescribed its jurisdiction the same as it is prescribed in the general law. But it is claimed that the legislature may amend the charter by general law, because of the provision found in section 6, art. 11, of the constitution, which reads: "Cities or towns heretofore or hereafter organized, and all charters thereof framed or adopted, by authority of this constitution, shall be subject to and controlled by general laws."

It is the duty of courts, in construing constitutions, to so construe them as to make the different provisions harmonize with each other, and to give force and effect to every part, if it is possible to do so. This provision of section 6 seems, at first sight, to be in conflict with that provision of section 8 which prescribes how a charter framed and adopted by the people and approved by the legislature may be amended, and, of course, by so prescribing a special mode, excludes all other modes. But a careful examination of the two provisions, each in connection with its own context and special subject-matter, it seems to me, will enable us to understand the intent and will of the framers of the constitution, and to so construe them as to give force and effect to both provisions, and to do violence to neither. Section 6 deals with the municipal corporations of the state as it finds them,—organized under special laws,—preserves their autonomy under existing charters, until the people themselves shall elect to change, but says to the people: "If you do continue to act under your old charters after general laws are framed, under which you may organize, your charters shall be subject to the general laws of the state." It also changes the former rule, and provides that thereafter municipal corporations shall not be formed by special laws, but the legislature shall by general law provide for the incorporation, organization, and classification of such corporations; that when such general laws have been provided cities and towns theretofore organized may, upon a vote of the people, organize under such general laws, and then follows with the provision which I have above quoted. Not until we reach section 8 is there a word in the constitution from which an inference could be drawn that under any circumstances could a special charter be framed or adopted for any municipality. But when we reach that section we find the constitution itself making a provision which it has forbidden the legislature to make,—a provision for special charters for municipalities having a population of 10,000 or more,—and in it has specially provided the only mode for their amendment. So that now municipalities have the option to organize under general law, and leave the law of their organization subject to such amendment as the legislature may, from time to time, see fit to make applicable to all corporations so organized, or under a special law framed and adopted by their own people, and which, while at the time of its adoption, and at all subsequent times, it must be subject to such general laws as affect the people of the state at large, can only be amended, in the matter of local government, as they themselves shall see fit to amend it. In my judgment, the words "shall be subject to and controlled by general laws" refers to such general laws as affect all the people of the state,—such as the laws relative to crimes and punishment, jurisdiction and methods of procedure in the courts, the laws affecting rights and remedies, and the like,—and not to those provisions pertaining specially to the administration of local affairs. If there is any one thing more manifest than another in this constitution, it is an intent to commit to the people of municipalities the management of their own local affairs, but in such form as not to interfere with, or create confusion in, the administration of the general laws of the state.

But, above and beyond this, the question discussed in the leading opinion, and so far discussed in this, does not arise in this case, except as it is forced upon us by an attempt to stipulate for the court what the law is, as well as the facts of the case. It is not necessarily true, as stated in the stipulation, that the powers and jurisdiction of the police court are derived from the charter proposed, and adopted by the people. Even under the act of 1885 referred to, and under any and every law that can be referred to, bearing on the question, provision is made for a police court, in such a municipality, having the same jurisdiction as that provided for in the charter. It follows that in any event, and under any law that can be cited in the premises, there is a de jure police court in that city, and the case simply resolves itself into an attempt to procure a judgment of this court, in a case of habeas corpus, as to the validity of certain provisions of the charter of Oakland, involving the title of Alexander Laidlaw to the office of police judge. The question ought not to be determined upon habeas corpus, and it is not necessary that it should be. There being a de jure court, even if Laidlaw is an intruder, there does not appear to be any other person claiming the office, and his acts as judge de facto are as valid and binding upon third parties as if he held by strict law. Westbrook v. Rosborough, 14 Cal. 180. For this, if for no other reason, the writ in this case should be dismissed, and the prisoner remanded.

Mechanics' Liens—Contracts—Decree of Foreclosure—Arbitration.

1. Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1183, (as amended in 1887,) provides, as to mechanics' liens under building contracts, that "all such contracts shall be in writing when the amount agreed to be paid thereunder exceeds $1,000," and recorded; otherwise they shall be void, and no recovery had thereon. Section 1184 provides that no part of the contract price shall, "by the terms of any such contract," be payable before commencement of the work, but shall be payable in installments after work is commenced, with a provision for retaining 25 per cent. until completion, and that, if any "such contracts" shall not conform "to the provision of this section," the work done and materials furnished shall be deemed to have been done and furnished at the personal instance of the owner. Held that, where the contract price is less than $1,000, the contract need not be in writing, nor 25 per cent. of the price reserved until after completion of the contract.

2. Where the court finds that plaintiff is entitled to a lien for work done, consisting of "certain improvements, additions, alterations, and repairs, to-wit, painting and papering of walls, entrances, ceilings, partitions, and other portions of the basement story of said building, and certain structures or articles affixed and appurtenant thereto, and placed thereon," it will be presumed that the evidence supported the finding, though some of the work was spoken of as "counters, sideboard, shelving, ice-box, partitions, and wainscoting," there being nothing to show that they were not among the articles "affixed and appurtenant thereto."

3. A decree foreclosing a mechanic's lien is not invalid by reason of the failure of the court to define the exact amount of land necessary to the use of the building.

4. Submission in arbitration, which contains no stipulation that it may be made an order of court, may be revoked under Code Civil Proc. § 1283, providing that, "if the submission is not made an order of the court, it may be revoked at any time before the award is made."

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; A. W. Hutton, Judge.

Gottschalk & Luckel, for appellants. Herdon, Cain & Garrison, for respondent.

Paterson, J. This is an action to recover the sum of $519 for work and labor upon a certain building owned by the defendant Amestoy, in the city of Los Angeles. The amount claimed includes the sum of $300 as a balance under an express contract to perform certain work, the contract price being $600; and the sum of $219 for extra work, alleged to have been performed at the special instance and request of the defendants Kerkow & Shurtz. The action is also to foreclose a mechanics' lien for the sums mentioned. Plaintiff had judgment in the court below, and defendant has appealed therefrom on the judgment roll alone.

The first point made by appellant is that the contract between the plaintiff and defendants was void because it did not provide that 25 per cent. of the contract price should be payable 35 days after the completion of the contract. Section 1183, Code Civil Proc., (as amended 1887,) provides: "All such contracts shall be in writing when the amount agreed to be paid thereunder exceeds $1,000, and shall be subscribed by the parties thereto; and the said contract, or a memorandum thereof, setting forth the names of all of the parties to the contract, description of the property to be affected thereby, together with a statement of the general character of the work to be done, the total amount to be paid thereunder, and the amounts of all partial payments, together with the times when such payments shall be due and payable, shall, before the work is commenced, be filed in the office of the county recorder of the county, or city and county, where the property is situated; * * * otherwise they shall be wholly void, and no recovery shall be had thereon by either party thereto; and in such case the labor done and materials furnished by all persons aforesaid, except the contractor, shall be deemed to have been done and furnished at the personal instance of the owner, and they shall have a lien for the value thereof." Immediately following this provision of section 1183 is the following provision of section 1184: "No part of the contract price shall, by the terms of any such contract, be made payable, nor shall the same or any part thereof be paid in advance of the commencement of the work, but the contract price shall, by the terms of the contract, be made payable in installments at specified times after the commencement of the work, or on the completion of specified portions of the work, or on the completion of the whole work: provided, that at least 25 per cent. of the whole contract price shall be made payable at least thirty-five days after the final completion of the contract. * * * In case such contracts and alterations thereof do not conform substantially to the provisions of this section the labor done and materials furnished by all persons, except the contractor, shall be deemed to have been done and furnished at the personal instance and request of the person who contracted with the contractor, and they shall have a lien for the value thereof." Reading these two sections together we think it quite clear that the legislature did not intend to provide that 25 per cent. of the contract price should be payable thirty-five days after the completion of the contract in any case except "when the amount agreed to be paid thereunder exceeds one thousand dollars." The use of the phrase "any such contract" in the clause of section 1184 immediately following the provisions of section 1183, quoted above, indicates, we think, that the legislature intended to refer to the contracts which had just been spoken of in section 1183, namely, contracts in which "the amount agreed to be paid thereunder exceeds one thousand dollars." That such contracts were referred to is made evident from the peculiar language of the last clause quoted from section 1184, namely, "in case such contracts and alterations thereof do not conform substantially to the provisions of this section," etc.

It is not essential to the validity of a lien for work done under a contract, the contract price of which is less than a thousand dollars, that it should be in writing. Contracts only in which the contract price exceeds $1,000 are required by section 1183 to be in writing, giving the names of the parties, description of the property, statement of the character of the work, total amount to be paid, amount of partial payments, time of payment, etc. It was not intended, we think, that, in order to preserve the right of lien, a laborer or contractor should be put to the trouble of entering into a written contract, and reserving 25 per cent. of the contract price for 35 days after the completion of the work, in cases where the contract price is less than $1,000. The rule contended for would be a harsh one in cases where the contract price was less than $1,000,—small amounts.

It is contended, further, that the lien is for work done upon personal property. The court found that the improvements and repairs consisted of "certain improvements, additions alterations, and repairs, to-wit, painting and papering of walls, entrances, ceilings, partitions, and other portions of the basement story of said building, and certain structures or articles affixed and appurtenant thereto, and placed thereon." It is true some of the work performed is spoken of as "counters, sideboard, shelving, ice-box, partitions, and wainscoting;" but there is nothing to show that they were not among the articles "affixed and appurtenant thereto." We must presume, of course, that the evidence supported the decision.

It is claimed that the findings and judgment are indefinite and uncertain as to what property should be sold by the sheriff. The failure of the court to define the exact amount or extent of the land necessary for the building does not invalidate the decree. It may be that the purchaser would acquire no land beyond that covered by the building, but the judgment is good. Tibbetts v. Moore, 23 Cal. 213.

There was no provision in the stipulation submitting the matters in controversy to arbitration by which an order of the court could have been made upon it. No action whatever has ever been taken upon the stipulation. "If the submission is not made an order of the court, it may be revoked at any time before the award is made." Section 1283, Code Civil Proc. Judgment affirmed.

McCarthy v. Mutual Relief Ass'n of Petaluma. (No. 12,171.)

Contracts—Estoppel.

1. Plaintiff and defendant entered into a written agreement for the building of a party-wall, but made no provision therein as to how the face of the wall should be finished. Afterwards a verbal agreement was made as to the first story, which agreement was carried out. Plaintiff then proceeded to finish his half of the face of the wall above the first story in a certain manner, and, to defendant's remonstrance, replied that if defendant did not like the appearance of the finish when it was done, he (defendant) could tear it down, and fix it to suit himself. Plaintiff afterwards recalled his permission to change the wall as he had finished it. Held, that the evidence sustained a finding that there was no special agreement as to finishing the face of the wall above the first story.

2. When expenditure on the faith of a license is relied on as an estoppel, evidence of the facts constituting such estoppel should be clear, and the expenditure should not be trivial in amount.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Sonoma county; John G. Pressley, Judge.

E. S. Lippitt, for appellant. Albert G. Burnett, for respondent.

Hayne, C. This was an action for the recovery of damages for an injury to the face or end of a party-wall, and to recover possession of the plaintiff's half thereof. The trial court gave judgment in favor of the plaintiff for the recovery of the possession of half of the wall and for $30 damages, and the defendant appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying a new trial. The parties to the suit, being the owners of adjoining lots, and being each about to erect a building on their respective lots, made a written agreement for a party-wall, which agreement is set out in the findings. The wall was accordingly constructed. The dispute was as to how the face or end of the wall should be finished. It appears that the plans for the defendant's building were originally drawn upon the idea that it was to stand wholly upon the defendant's own lot; and the wall was to be only 13 inches thick. With this view the pilasters, or coverings for the face of the walls, were ordered 13 inches wide. The party-wall, however, was 17 inches wide for the first two stories; and, when the 13-inch pilaster came to be applied to the 17-inch wall of the first story, it looked so out of proportion that the plaintiff himself suggested that a wider one be made for the first story, and promised to pay, and did pay, the difference in the price of that pilaster. The plaintiff then went on with the construction of his building, and made his upper story to correspond with his opposite wall, which was also a party-wall with another building. In order to effect such correspondence, he made the pilaster for his upper story to cover only his half of the party-wall between his building and that of the defendant. The defendant, however, whose building was to be higher than that of the plaintiff, was by no means satisfied with this arrangement. Its officers remonstrated with the plaintiff, who at first said that he could not control his contractor, but that, if the defendant's officers should not be satisfied with the appearance of the wall as finished by his contractor, they could tear down his finish, and make it to suit themselves. The plaintiff's contractor thereupon completed the wall as he had commenced it, and the plaintiff thereupon recalled his permission to the defendant to change it. The latter, however, directed the brick-masons to carry up the brick pilaster for the second and third stories to correspond with the new iron pilaster of the first, and for the same width, and corbeled it out to form panels on the face of the pilaster to correspond with the others." And, in order to do this, the plaintiff's finish on his half of the wall had to be taken down, which was done by the defendant's workmen. The plaintiff complains that the result is that his two walls do not correspond, and that his building "looks like a cow with one horn." In our opinion the written contract contains nothing with reference to the question of the finish of the face of the wall. It did not give to defendant the right to put any particular finish or ornamentation on the plaintiff's half thereof. Each party owned the half of the wall which was upon his land, subject to an easement in the other. This easement was merely to use the wall as a party-wall between the two buildings. In the absence of a special agreement to that effect, the defendant had no more right to have the plaintiff's half finished in accordance with his views than the plaintiff had to have the defendant's half finished in accordance with his views.

The main question, therefore, upon which the case turned was whether there was such a special agreement. The trial court found that there was not, and we cannot say that this finding was not sustained by the evidence. It is admitted that there was an agreement with reference to the iron pilaster of the first story. But this did not necessarily extend to the brick and stucco work above it. It may be conceded that it would have been more symmetrical for the defendant's building, and more in accordance with the rules of architecture, to have the pilaster of the upper stories correspond in width with that of the lower. But this is not a sufficient ground to imply a contract therefor. As above stated, half of the wall belonged to the plaintiff, and he could finish it as he liked. The defendant had to show a contract allowing it to interfere with the plaintiff's half of the wall, and it failed to do this. There was no definite evidence of a contract, except as to the first story. The plaintiff swears that there was no contract, except as to the first story, and the testimony of the defendant's architect seems to corroborate this. Taking all the circumstances together, we cannot say that the finding that there was no contract except as to the first story should be set aside. The defendant, however, relies upon the parol license given by the plaintiff to tear down his finish, if it should not prove satisfactory. The finding in this regard is as follows: "The plaintiff told the defendant to wait until it was done, and then, if it did not like it, he would allow it to be taken down, and finish it to suit itself; but the court finds that before the defendant attempted to remove the finish placed upon the wall by plaintiff the plaintiff revoked said license." There was evidence to sustain this finding of revocation, and we see no room for the argument, made for the defendant, that the license was executed before it was revoked, even if it be assumed that, under the circumstances, this would make a difference. The license was to tear down the finish; and the revocation was before the tearing down began. The finish which the defendant put on in the place of the plaintiff's could not have been put on until after the plaintiff's was removed, which was after the revocation. The assumption of the defendant's counsel seems to be that there was some preliminary work done upon the faith of the license. But, assuming that the plaintiff's telling the defendant to "wait" authorized it to go on with the preliminary work, it is sufficient to say that the evidence does not show any preliminary work. One of the defendant's witnesses says: "When the plaintiff went on to finish the half of the party-wall, defendant had not commenced to cement. The brick-work was all laid out for it." We do not understand precisely what the "laying out" of the brick-work involved. But it seems, from the evidence, that the additional brick-work would only cost "two or three dollars extra."

When a party relies upon expenditure upon the faith of a license as an estoppel, the evidence of the facts constituting the estoppel should be clear, and the expenditure should not be trivial in amount. The learned counsel have not questioned that the acts of defendant amounted to a taking possession of the plaintiff's half of the wall, so as to warrant a judgment for the return of possession, and, following the lead of counsel, we have assumed that the judgment is proper in this regard; but we express no opinion in relation thereto. We therefore advise that the judgment and order appealed from be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; FOOTE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. MILLER et al. (No. 20,593.)

CONSPIRACY—HUSBAND AND WIFE.

There being no legislation to indicate an intention to change the common-law rule, no prosecution for conspiracy can be maintained in California against husband and wife.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; JOHN R. AITKIN, Judge.

W. H. C. Ecker and N. H. Dodson, for appellants. George A. Johnson, Atty. Gen., for the People.

SHARPSTEIN, J. Appellant and his wife were tried and convicted of criminal conspiracy. The information upon which they were tried states that "H. Miller and Minnie Miller, being then and there husband and wife, are accused by the district attorney of said county, [San Diego,] by this information, of the crime of criminal conspiracy." The minutes of the court show that after the defendants had been found guilty by the verdict of a jury, and their motion for a new trial denied, they appeared for sentence, when the following proceedings were had, (we copy from the minutes:) "The court at this time sentences Minnie Miller to a fine of $1, which the court will pay. The court at this time sentences H. Miller to be imprisoned in the county jail of San Diego county for a term of one year."

Defendant H. Miller appeals. His sole contention here is that the information does not accuse him of any offense, because a man and his wife, being in law but one person, no prosecution for a conspiracy can be maintained against them. That such was the rule of the common law we cannot doubt, and we find nothing in the Code or statute of this state to indicate an intention of the legislature to change it. The defendants could only be tried upon an indictment or information which accused them of a criminal offense. A trial upon an information which does not accuse them of a criminal offense was wholly unauthorized, and the judgment must be reversed. Judgment reversed, with directions to the court below to discharge appellant from imprisonment.

SMITHERS v. FITCH et al. (No. 12,175.)

HIGHWAYS—OBSTRUCTION.

1. In an action for an injunction and damages for entering on plaintiff's premises and removing his gates, a finding that the locus obstructed by plaintiff is not a public highway established under Acts Cal. 1861, p. 389 et seq., as amended by St. 1862, p. 525, as claimed by defendants, is proper, where they fail to prove compliance with the requirements of the statute as to notice and the report of the reviewers.

2. Pol. Code Cal. 1873, § 2619, provides that "all roads used as such for a period of five years are highways." Plaintiff's evidence, which conflicted with defendants', showed that he had kept the locus fenced for over 20 years prior to defendants' trespass; that for 6 or 7 years prior thereto he had maintained locked gates there, and had permitted no travel over the road without his consent; and that for over 20 years there had been an inclosure of part of the road, and bars across it, on the opposite side of his land. Held, that a finding that the road had not become a highway under the Code would be upheld.

3. Where the evidence indicates that the trespasses are likely to be repeated, an injunction will be granted, to prevent a multiplicity of suits.

4. A motion for a new trial was made on affidavits that lost papers had been found by which it was intended to show that notice of application for the establishment of the highway had been given, and that a petition therefor had been filed, signed by the person under whom plaintiff claimed, by which dedication was intended to be proven. The affidavits did not show that affiant knew as a fact that the signature was in the handwriting of such person, nor that the route of the road, if established, would have been over his land. The notice offered was not in compliance with the statute. Held, that the motion was properly overruled.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Napa county; R. CROUCH, Judge.

H. M. Barstow, Dist. Atty., Spencer & Raker, and Henry Hogan, for appellants. Wallace & Johnston, for respondent.

FOOTE, C. This action was for an injunction restraining the defendants from entering upon the plaintiff's premises, and taking down or removing his gates, or in any manner interfering with his premises, and for damages for acts of that kind already done. The case was tried before the court, without a jury, the plaintiff had judgment for an injunction as prayed for, and damages in the nominal sum of one dollar and costs. The defendants appeal from the judgment, and an order denying a new trial.

The contest arose over the right asserted by one of the defendants, Fitch, a road overseer or road-master, acting under the authority and by the direction of Gosling, as a member of the board of supervisors of Napa county, to remove the gates of the plaintiff from what was alleged to be a public highway, and which right so claimed had already been twice exercised by the road overseer. The defendants asserted that some time in the month of August, 1863, there was laid out and constructed over the lands now owned by the plaintiff a public road and highway, which for more than 20 years next ensuing from and after the year above mentioned was used as such by the public, with the acquiescence of the plaintiff and his predecessors. That about 1885 the plaintiff obstructed the road at a point where it runs over or upon his land, and the acts of taking down the gate complained of were to remove an obstruction from the public highway, which it was their lawful right to do. They defend the alleged trespasses on the grounds that the gate was an obstruction on a public road, which had been duly established by the board of supervisors, and had become a public road, if not so established, by the user of the public. It is claimed by the appellants—First, that the evidence shows, contrary to the findings of the court, that the road thus obstructed by the plaintiff was duly and legally declared a public highway by the board of supervisors of Napa county; second, that, even conceding it was not so declared, the evidence is conclusive that the road became a highway by the use of the public of it as such.

The statute under which it is asserted the board of supervisors attempted to declare a public highway is to be found in Acts 1861, p. 389 et seq., as amended May 12, 1862. St. 1862, p. 525. That act requires, in section 1 thereof, that three notices shall be posted in public places in the county, and one such notice shall be posted "on the door of the room in which the board of supervisors of the county hold their meetings, at least thirty days previous to the time of making such application, which application shall only be made at a regular meeting of" such board, and that in that notice there shall be specifically set forth "the place of beginning, the intermediate points, if any, a general description of the proposed route, the termination of said road, or the particular portion of said road proposed to be altered or vacated, and the time at which the application will be made." The defendants did not attempt to introduce any such notice, and there is nothing in the record to show that if one was given at all it complied with the statute. The appellate court said, in Sherman v. Buick 32 Cal. 256, with reference to a similar provision of law: "It is well settled that a party who claims a title or right of the character set up by the appellants must show a strict compliance with all the provisions of the statute." This notice so prescribed to be posted, and to contain certain specific things, is not shown to have been given; hence the board of supervisors did not have jurisdiction to establish the road as a public highway. And, even had a notice been posted as required, it was not shown that it set forth specifically the intermediate points, and this was necessary to its validity. Potter v. Ames, 43 Cal. 75–80. Again, there is no report of the viewers offered in evidence, and it is not known whether the report complied with the provisions of section 5 of the act of 1861, as amended in the act of 1862, supra. There is nothing to indicate that the viewers, in their report, concurred with the petitioners, if there were any such, as to the propriety of the establishment of the whole road, which, it may be here remarked, contemplated a road to be established in two counties; and this concurrence of viewers is held to be necessary in Brannan v. Mecklenburg, 49 Cal. 672–676. We conclude, therefore, that the findings with reference to the non-establishment of the road as a public highway by the board of supervisors are sustained by the evidence.

The question then recurs as to the establishment of the road by use for five years by the public. It is claimed that Markwood, under whom the plaintiff claims, and who owned a part of the land when the road was attempted to be established, signed a petition to that effect in 1863, and that by virtue of the statute as it then stood, his signing that paper was a dedication by him of the land as a public road, and binds his successors in interest. There was no petition introduced showing what kind of a petition he may have signed, or whether it complied with the statute, nor was there any statutory notice given, as before said; hence that contention is without force.

But it is urged that under section 2619 of the Political Code of 1873 "all roads, used as such for a period of five years, are highways," without reference to the consent of the owner. "This was not a right gained by prescription, but by the express terms of the Code." Hope v. Barnett, 78 Cal. 14, 20 Pac. Rep. 245. The evidence for the plaintiff shows that one William Markwood lived on a portion of the premises as early as 1861, and had these lands inclosed by a brush fence. In 1863 this same Markwood had a portion of the premises (where the gate stood which was removed by the defendant Fitch) inclosed, and sowed in grain. The brush fence remained until the plaintiff built a board fence in its place, in 1878 or 1879. There was an inclosure of a part of the road, and bars placed across it, on the east line of the lands of plaintiff, from 1863 to the time when the trespasses complained of were committed. After he built the board fence the plaintiff locked the gates, and has never allowed any travel over the road except with his consent. Where gates are established, as in this case, across a road to be opened and closed by parties passing over the land, in the absence of a statute providing that such gates may be maintained on a public highway, it "has always been considered strong evidence in support of a mere license to the public to pass over the designated way, and in rebuttal of a dedication to public use." Quinn v. Anderson, 70 Cal. 456, 11 Pac. Rep. 746. "The question of highway or no highway was one of fact, to be passed upon as such by the court, and was properly determined as such." Tait v. Hall, 71 Cal. 152, 12 Pac. Rep. 391, citing Harding v. Jasper, 14 Cal. 642. It is apparent that the court below resolved the conflict of evidence in regard to the user for five years by the public in favor of the plaintiff's contention that no such user as defendants contended for had taken place, and the findings upon the point should be upheld.

The evidence indicated that the trespasses already committed would probably be repeated indefinitely, and, to avoid a multiplicity of actions for damages, and perhaps breaches of the peace, an injunction was called for, and properly awarded.

The question asked the road overseer, Fitch, "I suppose, Mr. Fitch, acting under your office, you will open that gate as often as it is shut up?" is objected to as leading. Under the circumstances, we perceive no abuse of the discretion vested in the trial court in permitting it to be put, and answered: "I would, providing the board of supervisors directed me to."

Certain affidavits were read on the motion for a new trial, by which it was intended to show that a petition for the road had been filed and a notice had been given, and that they (on the trial shown to be lost papers) had been found. The defendants, in their brief, say that they attach importance to the petition only for the purpose of showing that William Markwood was the person owning the land at that time, had signed it, and therefore must be held, under section 2 of the act of 1861, supra, to have dedicated the land. But the affidavit does not pretend to declare that the affiant knows as a fact that Markwood signed the petition, or that the signature purporting to be his is in his handwriting. There is no proof whether the name appended to the petition is the real or fictitious signature of Markwood. There is nothing shown by the affidavit, or the petition attached as being found among the records of the county, that the route the road was to take, if established, was over any of Markwood's land. The petition appended to the affidavit of Deweese does not show that the "most eligible route through Wild Horse valley, across the mountains," was ever to go over Markwood's land.

Upon the question of notice, that which is produced as being the one given and posted, shows that it was not posted "on the door of the room in which the board of supervisors hold their meetings" but "on the court-house door in Napa City." The notice, also, was to the effect that the application for the establishment of the road was to be made on the 8th of June, 1863, and the affidavit proving the posting shows that it was done on the 11th of May, 1863, less than 30 days before the application was to be made, and in violation of section 1 of the act of 1861, supra.

Upon the whole case, perceiving no prejudicial error, we advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; HAYNE, C.

McINTYRE v SHERWOOD. (No. 12,585.)

SWAMP LAND—ACTUAL SETTLERS.

1. Const. Cal. art. 17, § 3, provides that "lands belonging to this state which are suitable for cultivation shall be granted only to actual settlers." The term "actual settlers," which has been construed to mean "actual residents," is repeated in Pol. Code Cal. § 3495, which relates to land suitable for cultivation, but the word "actual" is omitted in the provision as to swamp land. Held, that actual residence is not essential to a settlement on swamp land, as it is not land "suitable for cultivation."

2. Nor is actual residence required by the word "settlers," as used in Pol. Code Cal. §§ 3442, 3443, which provide that "settlers upon swamp and overflowed lands belonging to the state, who occupy the same for farming or grazing purposes, and whose occupation is evidenced by actual inclosure, or by ditches or monuments showing the actual extent thereof, are preferred purchasers for such lands for six months after segregation;" and that the applicant therefor shall make affidavit that he "knows, of his own knowledge, that there are no settlers thereon, or, if there are, that the land has been segregated more than six months, by authority of the United States."

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Lake county, R. McGARVEY, Judge.

E. W. Britt and Bond & Fishback, (R. C. Horne, of counsel,) for appellant. R. W. Crump, for respondent.

HAYNE, C. This was an action to determine a contest over the right to purchase from the state certain swamp and overflowed land. The trial court gave judgment for the plaintiff, but subsequently made an order granting a new trial, from which order the plaintiff appeals. The plaintiff's proceedings in the land-office were in proper form; and the evidence showed, without conflict, that he took possession of the land "fifteen or twenty" years ago, when "it was mainly a tule swamp, on which the water stood a great part of the year;" that he dug ditches to drain the land, fenced it, and has ever since been in possession, and has cultivated most of it, but has never resided on it. He resided in a house upon an adjoining tract, about a quarter of a mile from the land in controversy; the whole being "inclosed in a general inclosure embracing about one hundred acres, and constituting one farm.' Upon this evidence the court instructed the jury that it was not necessary that the plaintiff should reside upon the tract in controversy; and under this instruction the jury found that the plaintiff was a "settler" upon the land at the time the defendant's application was made. The court filed findings of its own, repeating the facts found by the jury, and expressly finding that the defendant, "in his affidavit, stated, among other matters, that at the time of making his said affidavit there were no settlers on said land; that such statement was and is false and untrue." The court further found that the affidavit of the defendant "contained no allegation or statement showing that said land had been segregated more than six months, by authority of the United States."

Upon these findings there can be no question that the judgment against the defendant was right; for the statute requires that the affidavit of the applicant shall state either that there are no settlers upon the land at the time of the application, or, if there are, that more than six months has elapsed since segregation by authority of the United States. Pol. Code, § 3443. And it is settled that if a material statement in an affidavit for the purchase of public land be false the applicant acquires no right. McKenzie v. Brandon, 71 Cal. 211, 12 Pac. Rep. 428; Plummer v. Woodruff, 72 Cal. 31, 11 Pac. Rep. 871, and 13 Pac. Rep. 51; Harbin v. Burghart, 76 Cal. 119, 18 Pac. Rep. 127; Taylor v. Weston, 77 Cal. 535, 20 Pac. Rep. 62.

It appears, however, that the court granted the new trial upon the ground that the evidence showed that the plaintiff was not a "settler," within the meaning of the provisions of the Political Code in relation to the matter, and that, therefore, the affidavit of the defendant was not false. And the court arrived at this last conclusion through its interpretation of the case of Mosely v. Torrence, 71 Cal. 318, 12 Pac. Rep. 430. In that case the appellate court construed section 3 of article 17 of the constitution, which provides that "lands belonging to this state, which are suitable for cultivation, shall be granted only to actual settlers;" and the decision was that the phrase "actual settlers," as used in the provision, meant "actual residents." The language of the court was that "'actual settlement' means 'actual residence.'" But the provision of the constitution construed in that case is restricted in terms to lands "which are suitable for cultivation." Swamp lands are defined to be those which are not suitable for cultivation. Rev. St. U. S. § 2481. Hence the constitutional provision above referred to does not apply, and the decision in Moseley v. Torrence is not in point. It is argued, however, that the opinion defines the phrase "actual settlers," and that such definition ought to apply here. "It is too plain to admit of argument," says the learned counsel, "that, if 'actual settlement' means 'actual residence' then 'settlement' simply means 'residence.'" But we do not quite see the force of this argument. In the first place, a word or phrase may mean one thing in one connection and another thing in a different connection; and, in the second place, not only is the connection different, but the phrase itself is different. The phrase construed in Mosely v. Torrence is "actual settlers." This occurs not only in the constitutional provision referred to, but also in the statute which deals with lands which are suitable for cultivation. See Pol. Code, § 3495. When, however, the statute comes to provide for swamp lands, it omits the word "actual" and speaks simply of "settlers." This word "actual" is not unusual in legal phraseology, and is used as the opposite of "constructive." Thus we speak of actual possession, actual notice, actual fraud. But, whatever may be the strict and literal signification of the word, it is not to be unnecessarily assumed that in such documents as constitutions and Codes, or even decisions, words are used without meaning. Therefore, it is fair to presume that the law-givers meant something by the use of the word "actual;" that they supposed it added something to the meaning of the word "settlers;" that when they omitted it they intended something different; and that when the court said that "actual settlement means actual residence" it implied that there might be a residence or settlement which was not actual. We do not think, therefore, that the respondent can build a satisfactory argument upon the word "settlers" alone; and we think that a consideration of the nature of the case and the provisions of the statute will show that his position cannot be sustained.

Swamp and overflowed land, as we have seen, is ex vi termini land which is not suitable for cultivation. It is still less fitted for residence. Consequently, neither the constitution nor the Code requires that the applicant shall reside or "settle" on it before he can purchase. This is conceded by counsel. Nevertheless, although a man is not required, and may not choose, to reside in a swamp, he may have expended time and money in draining and fencing it, so as to render it fit for future cultivation or residence; and, when one has done this, it was not intended that another should be allowed to appropriate the improvements of the former merely because he has managed to get in his application first. Accordingly it is provided that one who has made such improvements shall have a preferred right of purchase for a certain time. The provision in this regard is as follows: "Settlers upon swamp and overflowed lands belonging to the state, who occupy the same for farming or grazing purposes, and whose occupation is evidenced by actual inclosure, or by ditches or monuments showing the actual extent thereof, are preferred purchasers for such lands for six months after segregation." Pol. Code, § 3442. It seems plain that the preferred right of purchase given by this section does not depend upon residence. There would be no sense in requiring residence as a condition of a preferred right of purchase, when it is not a condition of a general right of purchase. The purpose, simply, was to give the man who makes improvements upon swamp lands a reasonable chance to purchase it, and to prevent his improvements from being appropriated by others. This purpose does not require that he shall actually reside on the land; and the language of the provision does not indicate anything of the kind. The "settlers" spoken of in the section are those who "occupy the same for farming or grazing purposes." "Occupation" is ordinarily synonymous with "actual possession," (Lawrence v. Fulton, 19 Cal. 690; McKenzie v. Brandon, 71 Cal. 211, 12 Pac. Rep. 428;) and, as there may be actual possession without residence, it would seem to follow that there may be occupation, and consequently settlement, without residence. Moreover, the section expressly states that the occupation is to be "for farming or grazing purposes," and is to be evidenced in a specified way. We conclude, therefore, that the word "settlers," as used in section 3442, does not require residence upon the land.

The provision of the next section, which is the one upon which the respondent bases his argument, provides that the applicant to purchase swamp land shall make affidavit that he "knows, of his own knowledge, that there are no settlers thereon, or, if there are, that the land has been segregated more than six months, by authority of the United States." The word "settlers" here is evidently used in the same sense as in the preceding section. The purpose of the affidavit was merely to show that no other person had a preferred right of purchase; and we have seen that actual residence is not necessary to such preferred right. No other question has been discussed by counsel. It results that the learned judge erred in granting a new trial. We therefore advise that the order appealed from be reversed.

Per Curiam. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the order appealed from is reversed.

Gruwell et al. v. Seybolt et al. (No. 12,072.)

Vacating Decree—Waiver—Homestead.

1. Under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 963, subd. 3, which makes appealable an order confirming or refusing to confirm a report of an appraiser setting apart a homestead, a decedent's heirs by failing to appeal from a decree setting apart a homestead to the widow absolutely, as her separate estate, out of decedent's separate property, lose their right to have the decree set aside where they had notice of the application, the estate has been fully administered, and it does not appear that they have been prevented by fraud from making the required proof.

2. The law in force at the time of death of a person, and not that in force at the time of a previous declaration of homestead on his land, governs as to homesteads and rights of survivors.

Appeal from superior court, Santa Clara county; David Belden, Judge.

Action by J. D. Gruwell and others against George L. Seybolt and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal.

Louttit, Woods & Levinsky and Archer & Bowden, for appellants. T. H. Laine, for respondents.

Paterson, J. Judgment was entered in favor of defendants on demurrer to the complaint, and plaintiffs have appealed therefrom. The complaint alleges that plaintiffs are the heirs at law of Robert Gruwell, who died intestate on July 17, 1881, leaving surviving him, besides these plaintiffs, a widow, Eliza V. Gruwell. That after the death of Robert, his widow, Eliza V., in a petition praying for letters of administration, falsely alleged that the land in controversy was community property, and that the appraisers falsely returned it in their inventory as community property. That in 1871 said Eliza V. made and filed a declaration of homestead on the premises. That, upon a petition falsely alleging that the property was community property, the superior court, by its order, set aside the premises for a homestead, absolutely, as her sole and separate estate. On June 12, 1882, said Eliza V. conveyed all her right, title, and interest in and to the premises to one Barnes, who afterwards conveyed to defendants Seybolt and wife. That on June 6, 1883, Seybolt and wife mortgaged to defendant Shafter, and that defendant Summers claims to be the owner of said mortgage by assignment. That plaintiffs are the owners in fee-simple of the property, and entitled to the possession thereof. The prayer is that defendants may be required to set forth the nature of their claims to the property; that the decree setting apart the homestead be vacated; for a judgment that defendants have no right, title, or interest in the property; and that plaintiffs are entitled to the possession of the premises, and to costs of suit.

Appellants contend that the allegations of plaintiffs' ownership, and that defendants have no right, title, or interest in the property, but that they are wrongfully in possession, claiming adversely, are sufficient to show a cause of action, and that the demurrer, therefore, ought to have been overruled. Where, however, the pleader sets forth specifically the links in his chain of title, a general allegation of ownership will be treated as a mere conclusion from the facts stated, and will not cure any defect in the chain relied upon. It will be presumed that every fact has been alleged which can be proved. Turner v. White, 73 Cal. 300, 14 Pac. Rep. 794; Heeser v. Miller, 77 Cal. 192, 19 Pac. Rep. 375.

But the principal contention of appellant is that the homestead declaration of the wife alone on the separate property of the husband did not affect the title of the heirs to the property; that, notwithstanding such declaration, the property vested in them on the death of the husband, subject only to the right of the court to set aside the homestead to the surviving wife and children for a limited period. In support of this contention he cites the following sections of the Codes: Sections 1465, 1468, 1474, Code Civil Proc., and 1265, Civil Code. The authorities cited by both parties show that the law in force at the time of the death, and not that which was in force at the time of the declaration, controls on the subject of homesteads and rights of survivors. Tyrrell v. Baldwin, 78 Cal. 470, 21 Pac. Rep. 116; Herrold v. Reen, 58 Cal. 443. If, therefore, the provisions of the Codes just cited were in force at the time of the death of Gruwell, and it be true that it was selected from separate property of the husband by the wife alone, appellants are right in their contention, for all of the sections cited support it. The only answer respondents make to this point is that "the marriage was under the provisions of the homestead act of May 12, 1862, and so was the declaration of homestead. That being so, the heirs could have no part nor lot in the same. It went absolutely to the widow. This is the settled law of the state. Rich v. Tubbs, 41 Cal. 35; Herrold v. Reen, supra." If the homestead act of 1862 had been in force at the time of the death of Gruwell, the answer would be satisfactory, but as he died on July 17, 1881, at which time the provisions of the Code above referred to were in force and effect, the authorities cited by respondents bear directly against them.

The only question remaining is whether, conceding the facts alleged to be true, appellants have lost their right to have the decree set aside by failure to appeal therefrom. We think they have. The order setting apart the homestead is appealable. Code Civil Proc. § 963, subd. 3;[1] Estate of Burns, 54 Cal. 223. The heirs had notice of the application for a homestead, the estate has been fully administered, and the complaint fails to show "that any fraud or device was resorted to by defendants whereby plaintiffs * * * have been prevented from making proof in reference to" the character of the property from which the homestead was selected. Kearney v. Kearney, 72 Cal. 591, 15 Pac. Rep. 769. The judgment is affirmed.

RICHARDS et al. v. TRAVELERS' INS. CO.

INSURANCE POLICY—PLEADING—AIDER BY VERDICT.

1. A complaint, in an action for the breach of a contract of life insurance, which contains neither an allegation of non-payment of the policy, nor one from which the non-payment can be implied, is fatally defective.

2. The fact that defendant submitted a general demurrer to the complaint without argument is not a waiver of the defect, as the objection is raised by the demurrer, and not by the argument.

3. There being an entire absence of a material allegation, the defect is not cured by a verdict in plaintiffs' favor.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Nevada county.

T. M. Osment and Fred Searls, for appellant. C. W. Cross and P. F. Simonds, for respondents.

WORKS, J. This is an action on a policy of life insurance. There was a demurrer to the complaint, on the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The demurrer was overruled. The defendant answered, denying the material allegations of the complaint, and setting up some affirmative matters. There was a trial by jury, verdict for the plaintiffs, and judgment accordingly. The defendant appeals on the judgment roll.

The only point made in this court is that the demurrer to the complaint was improperly overruled, for the reason that there was no allegation in the complaint that the policy was unpaid, or any allegation showing a breach of the contract. A party suing upon a contract to pay money must show a breach of the contract, or his complaint states no cause of action. Therefore it is held that the complaint must, in such cases, allege the non-payment of the money claimed under the contract. Du Brutz v. Jessup, 70 Cal. 75, 11 Pac. Rep. 498; Morgan v. Menzies, 60 Cal. 341. Numerous other decisions of this court might be cited; but the question is too well settled in this state to render such citations necessary. The complaint was fatally defective in this respect. It contained no allegation of non-payment; nor is there any allegation from which such non-payment can be implied.

[1] This section provides, inter alia, that an appeal may be taken from an order confirming, or refusing to confirm, a report of an appraiser setting apart a homestead.

Counsel for respondent attempt to meet the objection on two grounds, viz., that the demurrer appears, from the record, to have been submitted without argument, which should be taken as a waiver of the point, and that the defect was cured by the verdict in favor of the plaintiffs. Neither of these grounds can be maintained. We know of no reason for holding that a party who submits a demurrer without argument thereby waives any objection raised by the demurrer. The objection is taken by the demurrer, and not by the argument; and it points out to the court and the opposite party every objection to the complaint that is raised by such a demurrer. It is the duty of the opposite party to look to his pleading, and see that it is sufficient to withstand such a demurrer; and it is equally the duty of the court to examine the pleading, and determine as to its sufficiency, whether the demurrer is argued or not.

The doctrine that a defective pleading may be cured by verdict has no application, where there is an entire absence of a material allegation. Barron v. Frink, 30 Cal. 489; Morgan v. Menzies, supra. Judgment reversed.

SOMERS v. SOMERS. (No. 13,169.)

APPEAL—RECORDS—AUTHENTICATION.

The certificate of a trial judge which simply recites that the affidavits of certain persons were used and considered, but fails to show that the affidavits set out in the transcript on appeal from an order after judgment are the same or true copies of the ones used on the hearing, is insufficient, and the appeal should be dismissed. BEATTY, C. J., and THORNTON and SHARPSTEIN, JJ., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JAMES G. MAGUIRE, Judge.

Matt I. Sullivan, for appellant. R. B Mitchell, for respondent.

WORKS, J. This is an appeal from an order, made after judgment, allowing the appellant an attorney's fee for services to be rendered in defense of a motion for a new trial and an appeal to this court. The respondent moves to dismiss the appeal on the ground that there is no bill of exceptions, and that none of the proceedings and papers used on the hearing are properly authenticated. There is a certificate of the judge of the court below, which will be noticed hereafter, that certain papers named were used on the hearing.

In the case of Herrlich v. McDonald, ante, 299, it was said: "It is also a matter of serious question whether any of the papers claimed to have been used on the alleged motion are properly authenticated. As we have said, there is no bill of exceptions. The only authentication is by the certificate of the judge of the court below, at the close of the transcript. * * * Formerly it was expressly provided that, on motion for a new trial, affidavits used might be identified by indorsement by the judge or clerk, at the time, as having been read or referred to on the hearing. St. 1861, p. 590; Hayne, New Trials & App. 790. The present Code has no such provision. It is simply provided that 'on appeal from a judgment rendered on an appeal or from an order, except an order granting or refusing a new trial, the appellant must furnish the court with a copy of the notice of appeal, of the judgment or order appealed from, and of papers used on the hearing in the court below.' Code Civil Proc. § 951. We are of the opinion that, without a statutory provision authorizing the authentication of copies of papers in some other way, the only proper way that they can be brought into the record and identified is by a bill of exceptions. There are decisions of this court, however, in which it has been rather taken for granted that a certificate of the judge is sufficient. Walsh v. Hutchings, 60 Cal. 228; Nash v. Harris, 57 Cal. 243; Larkin v. Larkin, 76 Cal. 323, 18 Pac. Rep. 396. And in one case it was held in department that, as the statute prescribed no mode in which such papers should be authenticated, 'this court had power to prescribe by rule how such papers shall be brought before it on appeal; and, if it has power to make such a rule in advance, it has the power to ratify the mode adopted by the court below;' and upon this proposition was founded the decision in that case that the certificate of the judge of the court below was sufficient. Pieper v. Land Co., 56 Cal. 173. But the Code does provide, in express terms, how all papers, proceedings, and exceptions, not otherwise a part of the record, may be made such, viz., by a bill of exceptions or statement. Code Civil Proc. §§ 646, 649–651. In case of an appeal from any decision made after judgment, a bill of exceptions is the proper, and, in our opinion, the only proper, mode of authentication. Id. § 651. But the respondent has not asked us to affirm the order on the ground that the question is not properly presented; and in view of this fact, and considering the state of uncertainty in which the question is left by the decided cases, we prefer to decide this case on its merits. We must say, however, that if this court has the power to determine that papers to be used on appeal may be authenticated in a way not provided for by statute, when a different way is provided for, which we very much doubt, it should be done by a rule adopted in advance, and made applicable to all cases, and not be left for the court to say in each case whether or not the mode adopted in that case is sufficient."

In the early history of Code practice, it was the tendency and inclination of the judges who had been educated under the common-law practice to construe the Codes strictly. The reaction has come, and the courts of the present day have, in many instances, gone to the other extreme. The judge who, at the present time, disregards the plainest provisions of the Codes relating to the practice, with a view of reaching and deciding a case on its merits, is regarded as a man and a judge of "broad views." The one who is in favor of administering the law as it is written is "narrow-minded." Judicial legislation is, as a rule, the worst of legislation. It is almost invariably the offspring of some real or supposed hardship which may result from the decision of the particular case in hand in accordance with existing laws or well-established rules of procedure. An attorney who has a plain statute before him has not followed it, but has resorted to some other means of presenting his case. The court, rather than deny him a hearing on the merits, approves his course, and thereby establishes a rule of practice unknown to the Code, and hitherto unheard of, and brings uncertainty and confusion into the practice. Such infractions of the rules of practice make bad laws, poor lawyers, and unreliable courts. Lawyers come to believe that all they have to do is to satisfy the liberal mind of the court not to comply with the law. We believe it to be a wrong to competent attorneys, an injustice to the court, and an injury to litigants.

The decided cases on the question we are now considering present a strong example of this good-natured, but mistaken, policy of extreme liberality. If the plain provisions of the Code had been followed, this case would have been presented to the court as follows: "In the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco. Isabel M. Somers, Plaintiff, vs. Calvin F. Somers, Defendant. Divorce. Be it remembered that on the 23d day of November, 1888, at 10 o'clock A. M., the plaintiff in this cause, pursuant to notice previously given, moved the court for an order allowing the plaintiff the sum of $100 attorney's fee in said cause, and requiring the defendant to pay the same into court for said purpose, and, in support of said motion, introduced the following evidence: 'Affidavit of R. B. Mitchell, as follows,' etc. The defendant offered no evidence in his behalf. And the court having heard the evidence, and being advised in the premises, sustained said motion, and made the order prayed for, to which the defendant at the time excepted, and now presents this, his bill of exceptions, and asks that the same be allowed and settled. The foregoing bill of exceptions is settled and allowed as correct, this —— day of ——, 1888. JAMES G. MAGUIRE, Ex-Judge of the Superior Court." What more simple or convenient means of presenting the case could be devised? Instead of this, we have the following: "I, James G. Maguire, judge of the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco on the 28th day of November, 1888, hereby certify that upon the hearing of plaintiff's motion on said 23d day of November, 1888, for order requiring defendant to pay to plaintiff, or her attorney, the sum of $100 as counsel fee and costs on defendant's motion for new trial, the following papers were used and considered by the court, to-wit: Affidavit of R. B. Mitchell, made upon plaintiff's said motion, and attached to the notice of said motion; the notice of said motion; and affidavit of Frank T. Cusack of service of said notice. JAMES G. MAGUIRE, Ex-Judge of the Superior Court."

As was said in Herrlich v. McDonald, supra, there is no authority whatever in the Codes for any such authentication of papers. This court adopted it as sufficient in the case of Pieper v. Land Co., supra, but not on the ground that there was any law authorizing it. On precisely the same theory, if the papers presented by appellant were verified by the affidavit of his attorney, we might say we are entirely satisfied that the papers are correct copies, and we will not stand on technicalities, and deprive the appellant of the benefit of his appeal. But we think the conclusion reached in the case referred to was based upon an erroneous view of the law. The ground taken was that, as no means were provided by statute for authenticating the papers, the court might provide a mode by rule, and, not having done so by a general rule, it could approve a mode adopted in that case. As we have seen, the Code does provide a mode of authenticating papers on appeals of this kind, and therefore the conclusion reached in the case cited has no foundation to rest upon.

It is well said that counsel and their clients should be protected where they have followed the practice approved by this court, and we acknowledge the force of the suggestion. Strangely enough, courts of justice are expected to perpetuate their errors, instead of correcting them. There is a legitimate reason for this in some cases; for example, where property rights have grown up under a decision which is subsequently ascertained to have been erroneous. But such a doctrine has no application to decisions affecting mere questions of practice. If the matter were one which could be controlled by rules of court, and was not governed by positive law, we should be in favor of adopting a rule that hereafter all cases must be presented by bill of exceptions, but that cases now pending should not be affected thereby. But, as we do not believe that this court has any authority to regulate the mode of presenting papers on appeal where one is provided for by statute, we feel constrained to dismiss the appeal on the ground that the papers could only be presented to this court by bill of exceptions. But, if we are wrong in this, the certificate in this case is entirely insufficient. There is nothing in it to show that the papers set out in the transcript are true copies of the ones used at the hearing. The certificate simply recites that the affidavits of certain persons were used and considered, but it is not certified that the affidavits set out are the same that were used, or true copies of them. For aught we can tell, these same parties may have made other and different affidavits, or the copies furnished us may not be correct copies, and other evidence may have been used and considered at the hearing. In other words, the affidavits set out in the transcript are not authenticated as true copies of the ones used at the hearing; nor is it shown in any way that the ones set out were all that were used. For these reasons the appeal is dismissed.

I concur: Fox, J.

Paterson, J., (concurring.) I concur in the judgment on the last ground mentioned by Justice Works, viz., that the affidavits are not shown to be the ones which were used on the hearing. The question how such papers shall be authenticated I take to be one of very little importance. It is better that a rule of practice—mere practice—be steadily adhered to, even if it has arisen out of an erroneous construction of some provision of the Code. Nothing disturbs and annoys practitioners more than judicial vacillation from one rule of practice to a different one on the same matter. Furthermore, it would be manifestly unfair to now change the rule and dismiss appeals —and the right of appeal is property of a high order sometimes—which have been perfected upon a rule sanctioned by this court. A rule ought to be adopted for future cases as suggested.

I concur: McFarland, J.

Beatty, C. J., (dissenting.) If the question involved in this motion were a new one, I should feel little hesitation in concurring in the opinion of Mr. Justice Works; but since the appellant has pursued the practice approved in Pieper v. Land Co., 56 Cal. 173, in bringing up certified copies of the papers used at the hearing in the superior court, I do not think we are justified in reversing our former ruling, and dismissing his appeal. I think, however, it would be well to make a rule to operate prospectively in accordance with the views of Justice Works.

Thornton, J. I dissent. The practice pointed out in Pieper v. Land Co., 56 Cal. 173, is correct, and in accordance with the statute. It has been frequently approved, notably in People v. Jordan, 65 Cal. 648, 4 Pac. Rep. 683, where six judges concurred, and no one filed a dissent. It settled the practice, and has remained undisturbed until this case, and unchallenged until the dictum in Herrlich v. McDonald appeared. This court has also said that it would accept a bill of exceptions under the like circumstances, and has accepted and acted on it. I see no ground for disturbing the settled practice, and am not willing to do so, whether laid down by a broad-minded or a narrow-minded court. It would be unjust to litigants to change it now. The certificate of Judge Maguire that Mitchell's affidavit was used on the hearing of the motion is sufficient, and the appeal should not be dismissed. The appellant is entitled to a hearing on his appeal. As to the objection that the judge's certificate does not show that the affidavit of Mitchell appearing in the record is a true copy, it need only be said that this is not the duty imposed on the judge. There was but one affidavit of Mitchell, and this the judge certifies was used on the hearing. The certificate of the clerk states that the papers contained in it are true and correct copies of these originals, and that said copies have been compared by him with said originals. This certificate authenticates the affidavit appearing in the transcript as a correct copy. It is said in the opinion of Mr. Justice Works: "As was said in Herrlich v. McDonald, supra, there is no authority whatever in the Codes for any such authentication of papers. This court adopted it as sufficient in the case of Pieper v. Land Co., supra, but not on the ground that there was any law authorizing it." It is a very strange assertion that this court would adopt any rule when not authorized by law. The law authorizing this court to adopt such rule is found in the Code of Civil Procedure, § 187. Under this section a most important rule was adopted in Mawson v. Mawson, 50 Cal. 539. In this case the party was entitled to a homestead, and no mode of setting it apart by the probate court was provided by law, and it was held under this section that the court might itself establish a rule of doing so. The section above cited is applicable to this court. Further, this court can frame and issue all writs, and make all rules necessary to the exercise of its appellate jurisdiction, where the statute has not provided one. Section 51, Code Civil Proc.; People v. Jordan, supra. The power was ample to make the rule in Pieper v. Land Co. It was not alluded to in the opinion for the reason that it was so well known to the members of the court that it was considered unnecessary to extend the opinion by inserting it. The motion to dismiss the appeal should, in my judgment, be denied.

Sharpstein, J. I concur in the dissenting opinion of Thornton, J.

People v. Sevine. (No. 20,572.)

Arson—Evidence—Experiments in Court.

1. On a trial for arson, it appeared that the fire started at about 1 o'clock at night in an hotel basement, occupied as a saloon by defendant, who was not at that time doing a prosperous business. Defendant's fixtures were insured for $2,500, and a few days before the fire he had tried to sell them at auction, but had failed to receive a bid of $2,000 for them. The proprietor of the building testified that defendant had said, if he could not sell for $1,600, he would have to sell out to the insurance company. The fire was discovered behind the bar, and on effecting an entrance into the room the bar was found to be all ablaze, and the room stifling with the smell of coal oil. Rags, straw, and other refuse matter, saturated with coal oil, were found near the fire, and the walls, counters, and floor were in a like condition. A small piece of candle was found burning in a locker under the counter, with some of the refuse saturated with oil near it, while two other small pieces were found under the counter not burning. An experiment was made, the result of which was given in evidence, which demonstrated that it took an hour and 42 minutes to burn a candle down to the point to which these had burned. Held, that the evidence was sufficient to warrant a conviction, though defendant's evidence was to the effect that after closing his saloon, about 11 o'clock, he went home, where he remained until notified of the fire.

2. Evidence showing the amount of defendant's loss, and the value of stock remaining, as ascertained in the course of an adjustment of the loss, in the presence and with the assistance of defendant, is admissible on the question of motive.

3. The trial judge is not bound to stop proceedings in order to try an experiment in open court as to the length of time it would take a candle to burn down to the point of those discovered in defendant's saloon after the fire; but, in his discretion, he may admit proof of such an experiment.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; J. W. McKinley, Judge.

Paxton & Grant and Max Lowenthal, for appellant. George A. Johnson, Atty. Gen., for the People.

Fox, J. Information against the defendant for the crime of arson; verdict of guilty; motion for new trial made and denied; and judgment of imprisonment. Defendant appeals from the judgment, and from the order denying his motion for new trial. Defendant's points are nowhere stated separately, or with any degree of clearness, and we are left to fish them out, as best we may, from a general argument as to the character and weight of the evidence, and alleged errors of the court, in the course of the trial, in the admission and rejection of evidence. On the night of January 24, 1888, a fire broke out in the basement of the New United States Hotel, at Los Angeles; the fire being discovered, and the alarm sounded, at 12.45 o'clock. Said basement was at the time occupied by the defendant as a saloon. The evidence leaves no possible doubt that the fire was incendiary, and that fact is not disputed; but it is claimed that the evidence was insufficient to show that the defendant committed the act, and that several errors occurred, during the trial, in the admission and rejection of evidence, and in the charge to the jury.

It is established by the evidence that the defendant was the lessee of this basement, and in it was carrying on a saloon, which was not at the time a prosperous concern. A few days before the fire, he had made an effort to sell it at auction, but could not realize at the sale the limit which he had placed upon it, and the sale was not made. The limit fixed was $2,000. The stock and fixtures were insured for $2,500. When the fire was first discovered, it was seen through a window, and was located behind the bar. When an entrance was effected, the bar was all ablaze, and the room was stifling with the smoke of coal oil. Even after the fire was extinguished, persons could not remain in the place long at a time, because of the strong smell of coal oil. A coal-oil measure and a five-gallon coal-oil can were found in the room, near where the fire started; also, rags, straw, and other refuse matter were found near the fire, and at several points in the room, saturated with coal oil, as also were the walls, counters, and floors. According to defendant's testimony the only use defendant had for or made of coal oil in the premises was to supply his cigar lighter. A few days before the fire, a plumber, who had been engaged in making some repairs in the premises, had left three half candles there. There were several lockers under the counter. In one of these a small piece of candle was found, still burning, with some of the refuse saturated with coal oil near it. Two other small pieces of candle were found under the counter, but not burning when found. An experiment was afterwards tried in the burning of half candles, and it was found that it took an hour and 42 minutes to burn one down to the point to which these had been burned, and the result of this experiment was given in evidence. The piece found still burning was shorter than the others. The owner of the building testified, among other things, to a conversation had with the defendant, some time before the fire, in which defendant said he could not pay the rent, and desired to sell out; saying that, if he could not sell out for $1,600, he would "have to sell out to the insurance company." The evidence on the part of the defense shows that the defendant closed up the saloon at about 11 o'clock that night; that during the evening several persons had been in the saloon, and noticed no smell of coal oil; that some of them remained until the saloon closed, and saw the defendant when he locked up and left the place, and they observed no smell of coal oil, or other unusual occurrence or proceedings about the saloon. According to the testimony of the defendant, he went almost directly home, and went to bed. Other evidence shows that he did, not long after the time when it is proved the saloon was closed up, go home and go to bed, where he remained until notified of the fire.

Under this evidence, the defendant relies upon proof of alibi, and want of proof of motive. We have given but a brief summary of the principal points in the evidence, but we have examined all the testimony with great care, and, on the evidence, we cannot say that the jury were not justified in coming to the conclusion which they did. The evidence seems to us sufficient to justify the verdict, and we cannot disturb that verdict on the ground of insufficiency of evidence.

Exception is taken to the ruling of the court in admitting the testimony of the witness Rhodes. The objection was taken to his evidence as a whole; the counsel refusing to make specific objections to particular parts of it. The court did not err in overruling that objection.

Nor was there any error in the rulings of the court in reference to the admission of the testimony of the witnesses Wheeler and Kinnie. That evidence was entirely with reference to the adjustment of the loss, and was introduced as showing the amount of loss as agreed upon, and the value of the stock remaining, as ascertained in the course of adjustment, in the presence of and with the assistance of the defendant. It tended to prove motive, and was admissible for that purpose. It was not conclusive, and did not preclude the defendant from introducing other evidence as to value.

The rulings of the court in sustaining the objections to the questions put to the witness Mesmer on cross-examination were not erroneous. Counsel had already drawn out from the witness that the hotel was mortgaged for $50,000, and that it, with its contents, was insured for $65,00 . The questions objected to were irrelevant and incompetent, and not calculated to prove overinsurance or motive in Mesmer to set the fire.

It was a matter resting entirely in the discretion of the court to admit proof of the candle experiment. It would probably have admitted similar proof on the part of the defendant, if any had been offered; but the court was not bound to stop the proceedings of the court, and try the experiment in open court, as proposed. In this connection, we notice a point made by associate counsel for the defense, who made the closing argument, and prepared the closing brief. It seems he made a candle experiment, after the case was appealed, in which he practically verified the testimony of the witness on that subject as to the length of time it would take a half candle to burn down to the point reached by those discovered at the time of the fire. From that result, and from the fact that it was half to three-quarters of an hour after the fire was discovered before the candle which was found still burning was found, he argues that it was impossible that these trains could have been laid, and those candles lighted, until at least a half an hour after the defendant left the place. It will be remembered that the candle found burning was found in a closed locker or drawer. It was because it was so closed in that it was not earlier discovered. The fact that it was so shut out from the air, and in a confined space, will of itself account for that candle holding out so much longer than the others; and, if counsel will try the experiment, he will probably find that a half candle burning under such circumstances will last fully half to three quarters of an hour longer than a similar one burning in the open air of the room.

It is claimed that the court erred in giving the eighth and ninth instructions. We fail to perceive anything in either of which the defendant can complain. Both state the law correctly and clearly, and counsel fails to show any reason why they should not have been given.

There was nothing in instruction No. 10½ of which the defendant can complain. The court correctly laid down the law as to the effect of the proof of alibi, and, in cautioning the jury as to the propriety or necessity of carefully scrutinizing such evidence, adopted language which has several times met the approval of this court. People v. Wong Ah Foo, 69 Cal. 180, 10 Pac. Rep. 375; People v. Lee Gam, 69 Cal. 552, 11 Pac. Rep. 183.

The court did not err in refusing to grant a new trial on the ground of newly-discovered evidence. The affidavits failed to disclose any newly-discovered evidence which would be competent or admissible for any purpose. Judgment and order affirmed.

HERMON v. PARIS. (No. 12,317.)

APPEAL—REVIEW.

On an appeal from a judgment and an order denying a new trial, the fact that the court refused to order the sheriff to amend his return to a writ of attachment issued in the case cannot be considered, as the attachment papers in no way affect the validity of the judgment or the order appealed from.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. F. SULLIVAN, Judge.

W. H. H. Hart, for appellant. I. B. L. Brandt, for respondent.

HAYNE, C. This was an action upon two promissory notes alleged to have been made by the firm of O. M. Paris & Co., which was composed of the defendant Paris and one Hutchinson. The court below gave judgment against both defendants for the amount of one of the notes only, and the defendant Paris appeals from this judgment and from a order denying a new trial.

It is contended that the court erred in refusing to order the sheriff to amend his return to a writ of attachment, which had been issued in the case, so as to show certain facts in relation to the service of the attachment papers. But the attachment papers in no way affected the validity of the judgment or order denying a new trial, and the questions in relation to them cannot be considered on the appeals taken. Allender v. Fritts, 24 Cal. 447. It is next contended that the evidence shows that the partner who signed the note had no authority to give a note in the name of O. M. Paris & Co. The facts in relation to this point are that, some time prior to the formation of the said firm, the defendant Hutchinson was doing business for himself under the style of T. R. Hutchinson & Co., and was indebted to W. & J. Steinhart & Co. in a sum of money, for which they held his promissory note, which circumstances were known to the defendant Paris. In this condition of affairs Paris & Hutchinson formed a partnership under the old name of T. R. Hutchinson & Co., and by the articles it was agreed that "said copartnership hereby agrees to and does assume the payment of all the liabilities of T. R. Hutchinson & Co," and the Steinhart note was thereupon entered upon the books of the firm as one of its liabilities. Thereafter the name of the firm was changed to O. M. Paris & Co., without any change in its membership. The old Steinhart note was retired, and a new one given in the new firm name. The learned counsel for the appellant says that "probably Hutchinson would have had the right to execute a note to W. & J. Steinhart & Co. for said debt in the name of T. R. Hutchinson & Co., but certainly not in the name of O. M. Paris & Co." If such a course had been taken the defendants would have certainly been bound, for the payment of the old note had been assumed by the same individuals under a different name. The objection, therefore, goes merely to the way the note was signed. But the court finds that the giving of the note in the name of the firm of O. M. Paris & Co. was "with the authority and consent of the said defendant O. M. Paris," and there is evidence to sustain this finding. The only objection to the judgment is that by a clerical error it was entered for $4.09 too much. We therefore advise that the judgment be modified by striking off the sum of $4.09, and that as modified it be affirmed, without costs of appeal to the appellant.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; FOOTE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is modified by striking off the sum of $4.09, and that as modified it be affirmed, without costs of appeal to the appellant.

DAVIS et al. v. CHALFANT. (No. 12,049.)

JUDGMENT—EQUITABLE RELIEF—PLEADING.

A complaint to have a judgment, and an order denying a motion for a new trial, set aside, which alleges that, owing to the negligence, fraud, or mistake of plaintiffs' attorney in not having an undertaking on appeal filed within the time required by law, the appeal from the judgment and order was dismissed, and that the judgment and order were and are unjust, inequitable, and contrary to law, but which makes no charge of fraud against defendant, nor of collusion between defendant and plaintiffs' attorney, does not state a cause of action, where there is no allegation that there was not a fair trial in the action, and plaintiffs' motion for a new trial, exhibited in the complaint, shows no error in point of fact.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Mendocino county; R. MCGARVEY, Judge.

VANCLIEF, C. In April, 1882, John E. Chalfant, the defendant herein, commenced an action against the plaintiffs herein (Davis and Jones) to foreclose a mortgage executed by Jones to Aaron Chalfant, and assigned to the plaintiff in that action. Davis was made a defendant therein, as a purchaser of the mortgaged premises, subsequent to the mortgage. Jones failed to answer, and his default was duly entered. Davis answered, and upon his answer alone the cause was tried, and the trial resulted in a decree for the plaintiff, foreclosing the mortgage, entered July 21, 1882. From that decree, and from an order denying a new trial, appeals were taken to this court; but, because the undertakings on appeal were filed more than one month before the filing of the notice of appeals, the appeals were dismissed on the 26th day of January, 1885. 5 Pac. Rep. 626. The object of the present action (commenced October 26, 1885) is to set aside and vacate the decree of foreclosure, and the order denying a new trial of the action of Chalfant v. Davis and Jones, and to obtain a new trial of that action. The complaint, and exhibits thereto attached, occupy 55 pages of the transcript, the exhibits consisting of the judgment roll, and the statement on motion for new trial, in the foreclosure action. To this complaint the defendant demurred on the ground "that it does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action against him." The demurrer was sustained, and, upon failure of plaintiffs to amend their complaint, final judgment was rendered in favor of the defendant. From this judgment the present appeal is taken, and whether or not the demurrer should have been sustained is the only question to be decided.

The gravamen of the complaint is that through and by the negligence, fraud, or mistake of James T. Rogers, the attorney for the defendants in the foreclosure suit, (plaintiffs here,) the undertakngs on appeal from the decree and order in that suit were not filed at or within the time required by law, in consequence of which said appeals were dismissed; "that the dismissal of said appeal by the supreme court aforesaid was wholly and entirely caused by the false representations, statements, and erroneous advice and instructions to plaintiffs" by their attorney; "that, but for said false representations, statements, and erroneous advice and instructions, plaintiffs could have filed, or caused to be filed, at said time, said undertakings on appeal, and the said appeal could and would have been perfected in accordance with law, and the same would have been heard and decided by said supreme court according to its merits; * * * that the judgment and order denying the motion for new trial, made and entered in said cause, were and are unjust and inequitable and against law, and, as plaintiffs are informed and verily believe, would have been reversed by the supreme court of the state of California, had the appeal therein been properly perfected;" that the said false representations, statements, and erroneous instructions and advice given to plaintiffs, as aforesaid, were made and uttered by the said Rogers with the intention of depriving plaintiffs herein of their remedy of appeal from the judgment and order denying motion for a new trial entered in said cause; "that, immediately after the rendition of said judgment and order, said Rogers was well aware of plaintiffs' wish and desire to have the same reviewed by the supreme court of the state of California, and constantly and repeatedly promised that an appeal therefrom would be legally taken and perfected; that plaintiffs, in reliance on said promises, made no attempt or effort to discover the real facts concerning said appeal, but up to the 2d day of September, 1884, or thereabouts, fully supposed and believed that an appeal from said judgment and order had been taken in accordance with law." But the complaint makes no charge of fraud against the defendant, and no charge of collusion between defendant and plaintiffs' attorney.

It is not alleged that Davis did not have a fair trial in the foreclosure action, nor that judgment was not properly and fairly rendered therein against Jones by default, according to his intention; and as there appears to be no error on the face of the judgment roll in that action, as exhibited here, the judgment by default against Jones should be regarded as conclusive against him in this action. The allegations "that the judgment, and order denying motion for a new trial, made and entered in said cause, were and are unjust and inequitable and against law," are too general and too indefinite, as they neither indicate nor imply any fraud on the part of the defendant or his assignor; since a judgment may be unjust, inequitable, and erroneous without being fraudulent, or subject to be set aside by a court of equity. Murdock v. De Vries, 37 Cal. 527; Ross v Wood, 70 N. Y. 8. Neither does the statement on motion for new trial, as exhibited in the complaint herein, show any error in point of fact. The most that can be reasonably claimed is that the evidence as to some of the material issues was substantially conflicting, and conceding that, in point of law, the court erred in refusing to allow Aaron Chalfant to be cross-examined by defendants in that action as to the items of accounts between him and Jones at and before the time the mortgage note was made, for the purpose of impeaching the consideration of the note, yet there is no averment of what the witness would have testified, had the cross-examination been permitted, as there should be in a complaint in equity, the object of which is to impeach a judgment and to obtain a new trial on the ground of fraud, accident, or mistake. In cases of this class it should be made to appear, with reasonable certainty at least, that a new trial would result in a judgment more favorable to the party asking it than the judgment sought to be set aside. The following cases bear, more or less directly, on the general question as to the sufficiency of the complaint in this case: Long v. Smith, 39 Tex. 160; Seay v. Hughes, 5 Sneed, 155; Crim v. Handley, 94 U. S. 652; Kern v. Strausberger, 71 Ill. 413; Brown v. Wilson, 56 Ga. 534; Nicholson v. Patterson, 6 Humph. 394; Newman v. Morris, 52 Miss. 402; Quinn v. Wetherbee, 41 Cal. 247; Boston v. Haynes, 33 Cal. 31; Mastick v. Thorp, 29 Cal. 445; Zellerbach v. Allenberg, 67 Cal. 296, 7 Pac. Rep. 908. I think the demurrer to plaintiffs' complaint was properly sustained, and that the judgment should be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; FOOTE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is affirmed.

LEHMANN v. SCHMIDT. (No. 12,547.)

FACTORS—LIEN—CONVERSION.

Defendant agreed to sell plaintiff's wine at a certain net price, the excess to be divided equally between them. After receiving a part thereof, and making advances to plaintiff thereon, and paying freight, in accordance with the agreement between them, defendant refused to receive any more; and, before any of the wine had been sold, plaintiff demanded a return of that which defendant had received, without offering to pay back the money which defendant had advanced and expended for freight. Held, that under Civil Code Cal. §§ 2026, 3051, 3053, defining a factor, and giving him a lien on the property placed in his hands for money advanced and expended, defendant was a factor, and had a lien on the wine, and a right to retain it, so that his refusal to comply with the demand did not constitute a conversion.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JAMES G. MCGUIRE, Judge.

Action by Ernst Lehmann against R. Schmidt for goods sold and delivered. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Chapman & Slack, for appellant. A. Heyneman, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. C. The case presented for consideration is this· One E. B. Smith was the owner of about 100,000 gallons of wine, which he desired to sell The wine was stored in a cellar at Cordelia, and was in an unsalable condition. Smith met the defendant, Schmidt, and, as he testifies, Schmidt said "he thought he could make a proposition to me, and that, if I would name the standard price that I would be willing to receive for the wine, that he thought he could bring it to the city and treat it, and whatever could be got more than the amount that I would be willing to sell it for after treating it would be divided between us." The parties then entered into a written agreement, as follows: "San Francisco, March 3, 1886. Agreement made between E. B. Smith, of Martinez, and R. Schmidt, of San Francisco, as following: (1) The said E. B. Smith, having at his cellars at Cordelia about 50,000 gallons Malvasia and Mission, 30,000 gallons Zinfandel, and 22,000 Malvasia, agrees to sell his wines through the agency of the said R. Schmidt at the standard price of 20 cents (twenty cents) per gallon, net. (2) The said R. Schmidt agrees to prepare these wines into a marketable condition at the rate of 1 cent (one cent) per gallon, and to outlay freight on these wines to this city, amounting about to 1 cent (one cent) per gallon. It is further agreed between the parties hereto that all the profits arising out of the sale of these wines over and above the standard price of 20 cents per gallon, and the additional expenses, about 2 cents per gallon, shall be divided in equal shares between the parties hereto; and the said R. Schmidt agrees to furnish the necessary advances of money, in case E. B. Smith is in want of any, the latter giving the proper time of notification to procure the money. No commissions to be deducted, as the one-half of the profit is considered equivalent for all charges and commissions." Under and in pursuance of this agreement, Smith sent to defendant, on the 20th day of March, 1886, 5,802 gallons of the wine, and, on the 8th day of May following, 2,179 gallons more; and defendant received the wine, and paid the freight thereon. On account of the wines so delivered, and under the agreement, defendant advanced and paid to Smith several sums of money, aggregating $678.50. Defendant also delivered to Smith some casks, which Smith says he ordered, and defendant says "were sold to Smith at his request, and the charges made against him as advances under said contract." For some reason not clearly stated, defendant became dissatisfied, and refused to receive the balance of the wine under the contract; and thereupon, on the 30th day of May, 1886, Smith sold all the wine remaining at Cordelia to other parties for 11 cents per gallon. Subsequently, on the 17th day of June, 1886, Smith demanded from defendant a return of the wines delivered to him under the contract, but defendant refused to give them up, or make any accounting. No offer was made at the time of this demand, or subsequently, so far as appears, to pay defendant the money he had advanced on the wines and expended for their freight and improvement, or any part thereof, nor to return to him the casks which he had furnished. In this condition of things, Smith, on the 17th day of July, 1886, sold and assigned to the plaintiff all his "interest and claim, of whatever kind and nature, in and to those 10,000 gallons of wine, more or less, now held by R. Schmidt, or sold by him for my account;" and thereafter, on the 23d day of the same month, the plaintiff commenced this action, alleging in his complaint "that on or about the 18th day of June, A. D. 1886, in the city and county of San Francisco, state of California, E. D. Smith sold and delivered to the defendant, and at his instance and request, those certain goods, wares, and merchandise, to-wit, 9,000 gallons wine, at 20 cents a gallon, amounting in the aggregate to the sum of eighteen hundred (1,800) dollars;" that defendant agreed to pay for the same, but had not paid the said sum, or any part thereof, though often requested so to do; and that Smith, on the 17th day of July, assigned, set over, and transferred to plaintiff "the aforesaid indebtedness and claim against said defendant."

The court below found, among other things, that Smith delivered to defendant, under the agreement, and at the times above stated, 7,981 gallons of wine, and that this wine was, at all the times mentioned, worth the sum of 20 cents per gallon, amounting to $1,596.20; that defendant advanced for and on account of the wines, under the agreement, the sum of $678.50 in money, and that he "made no further advances of any kind, or incurred liabilities of any kind, chargeable to said E. B. Smith under said agreement;" that defendant refused to proceed further under the agreement, and on the 17th day of June, 1886, Smith made a demand upon him for the return of said wines, and for an accounting of any wine sold by him under the contract, but that he refused to return the said wines, or to give any account of the same, or any part thereof; "that no part of said 7,981 gallons of wine had been sold by said defendant prior to said 17th day of June, A. D. 1886, and that the whole of said 7,981 gallons of wine was then and thereafter converted to the use and benefit of said defendant;" that on the 17th day of July, 1886, Smith, "by an instrument in writing, assigned, set over, and transferred to the plaintiff the indebtedness and claim against the defendant sued on in this action;" and, as a conclusion of law, that plaintiff was entitled to judgment against the defendant for the sum of $917.70, and legal interest thereon from the 17th day of June, 1886. Judgment was accordingly so entered, and from that judgment the defendant has appealed.

It is contended for the appellant that the judgment was erroneous, and that there are several sufficient reasons for its reversal. We think it necessary to consider only one of the objections urged. It is unquestionably settled law, as claimed by respondent, that, when one person takes and converts to his own use the personal property of another, the owner may waive the tort, and sue in assumpsit for the value of the property converted. Fratt v. Clark, 12 Cal. 89; Roberts v. Evans, 43 Cal. 380; Berly v. Taylor, 5 Hill, 577; 2 Greenl. Ev. § 108. But this rule does not apply to the case in hand. Here the defendant was employed by Smith as his factor to sell wine. Civil Code, § 2026. Some of the wine was shipped to him, and he paid the freight, and expended other money upon it. He also advanced to Smith a considerable sum of money. For the money so paid, expended, and advanced he had a valid lien on the wine placed in his possession. Id. §§ 3051, 3053. And, when demand was made that he return or account for the wine, it was all still in his possession unsold, and there was no offer to pay back to him any of this money. Under these circumstances, he had a right to retain the wine, and his refusal to comply with the demand did not constitute a conversion. From this it necessarily follows that the plaintiff had no cause of action in assumpsit for goods sold and delivered. His remedy, if he had any, was by some other action or proceeding. We therefore advise that the judgment be reversed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; HAYNE, C.

INSOLVENCY—DISCHARGE—STIPULATIONS.

An order discharging an assignor in insolvency will be vacated where, after the time for hearing the petition for discharge has been set, it is ordered, in pursuance of a stipulation filed, that the matter go off the calendar, to be reinstated and set for hearing on stipulation or on notice by petitioner, and thereafter, on a day subsequent to that originally set, petitioner, without notice or stipulation, procures the order of discharge.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JOHN F. FINN, Judge.

Daniel Titus, for appellant. W. R. Daingerfield, for respondents.

WORKS, J. This is an appeal from an order vacating an order discharging the appellant in insolvency. The appellant filed his petition for a discharge, and gave the necessary notice to creditors of the time set for hearing. The petition for discharge was filed February 15, 1886, and the time for hearing fixed for the 22d of March, 1886. Between the time of filing the petition and the time fixed for the hearing a stipulation was entered into, to the effect that the matter go off of the calendar, to be reinstated and set for hearing upon stipulation or by notice by the attorney for the petitioner, and it was so ordered by the court. Without having the matter reset, or giving any notice, the petitioner came in, and on the 17th day of September following procured an order for his discharge. These facts were shown on the motion to vacate the order of discharge, and it was also shown that the petitioner had fraudulently omitted certain items of property from his inventory, by reason of which it was claimed that he was not entitled to his discharge. As to these charges of fraud there was evidence on the part of the petitioner tending to show that the same were not true, but upon this point the evidence was conflicting. As to the other facts relied upon they were not disputed. The court below correctly vacated the order of discharge. To allow a petitioner in insolvency to put his creditors off their guard by such a stipulation as was made in this case, and then come in, without any notice of a renewal of his proceeding, and procure his discharge on a day not named in his original notice, would be to countenance a course that might result in gross fraud and injustice. It is claimed by the appellant that his attorney could not bind him under section 283 of the Code of Civil Procedure, except by his agreement filed with the clerk, or entered upon the minutes of the court. But, conceding this to be so in a mere matter of procedure in court, the stipulation appears by the record before us to have been in writing and filed, and if it were not the petitioner could not act upon it by delaying his application until after the day fixed by the court for the hearing, and named in the notice, and come in afterwards and procure an order for his discharge on a day for which no notice had been given. It is also claimed that the time for filing objections to the discharge had passed, and therefore the objecting creditor had no standing in court for any purpose. But the time for contesting the discharge had not expired when the stipulation was entered into. The objection may have been, and probably was, prevented by the making of the stipulation. If the notice provided for in the stipulation had been given, the creditors would have had an opportunity to come in and contest the discharge by filing the necessary specifications. They were deprived of this opportunity by the failure to give such notice. Order affirmed.

JUSTIFIABLE HOMICIDE.

Where defendant, being in the actual and peaceable possession of land under a claim of title, is opposed in his entrance thereto, for the purpose of harvesting grain sown by him, by one whose wife has actual title thereto, and is, on advancing, fired at and wounded, as is also his son, who seized the opposing party when he drew his pistol, the killing of the opposing party by the defendant in firing at him is justifiable homicide. BEATTY, C. J., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Benito county; JAMES F. BREEN, Judge.

Montgomery & Scott, W. H. Webb, and T. H. Laine, for appellant. George A. Johnson, Atty. Gen., N. C. Briggs, Dist. Atty., M. T. Dooling, and J. H. Campbell, for the People.

WORKS, J. The appellant was charged with the crime of murder, convicted of murder in the second degree, and sentenced to the state-prison for 10 years. The main contention on this appeal is that the evidence was insufficient to warrant a conviction for any offense. We have examined the evidence carefully, and find the facts, as shown by the undisputed evidence for both the people and the defendant, to be that the defendant was in the possession, and had been for a number of years, of a certain tract of land, and claimed to own it; that the wife of the deceased also claimed a part of it as government land on which her grantor had filed and received a certificate of purchase, it being a part of a larger tract the balance of which was in the preemptor's possession under his claim; that shortly before the killing of the deceased the party under whom she claimed had run a wire fence across the land without the knowledge of the defendant, thereby cutting off the part of the land claimed by the deceased from the balance of the land in possession of the defendant; that this piece of land, so cut off, had been sown in grain by the defendant, which was about ready to harvest; that the defendant and the deceased had each made threats against the life of the other if he attempted to enter upon the land and cut the grain; that on the day of the shooting the defendant was about to enter upon the land through said wire fence, and had cut the same for the purpose of passing through with his header wagon; that the deceased met him at the gap, and forbade him passing through, and told him if he did it was at his peril, and defendant told deceased he would pass through, that the header was coming, and that if he stood there until it came up he did so at his peril; that the deceased stepped forward, and stooped down as if in the act of closing up the gap, when the defendant moved forward within a few feet of him, and forbade it; that the deceased at once drew his pistol, when a son of the defendant jumped between the parties, and seized the deceased around the body, when the deceased fired, inflicting a severe wound on the defendant, and then turned his pistol on the son, who was still struggling with him, and fired two shots at him, wounding him first in the leg, and then in the eye; that after the deceased had drawn his pistol the defendant drew his, and fired several shots at the deceased, some of which took effect and caused his death. Whether the first shot fired by the defendant was immediately after the first shot of the deceased, or after he had shot and wounded the son, is not clear. The defendant and his son both testified that the former did not fire until after the former was wounded, and the latter was twice shot and wounded. A number of other eye-witnesses, some of whom were called for the prosecution, testified that the deceased drew his pistol first, and fired first, but they could not tell who fired the following shots, or at what times, or by which one of the shots either of the parties was wounded. There was evidence tending to show that the defendant had, both before and after the shooting, used language indicating ill will towards the deceased. There was also evidence admitted tending to show that the wife of the deceased had title to the land in dispute, and that the defendant had not.

We have been unable to discover any evidence in the record which would warrant a conviction of murder in the second degree, or any other offense. The defendant was in the actual and peaceable possession of the land, and had a crop growing on it that he was about to harvest. This the deceased attempted by force to prevent. This he had no right to do, conceding that his wife had a valid title to the land. He was therefore the aggressor from the beginning. He had put the lives of both the defendant and his son in imminent peril before he was fired upon. However deplorable the result may have been, he alone was responsible for it. The evidence shows conclusively that he had gone there for the purpose of preventing the defendant from going on the land. The acts of the defendant were strictly in the defense of himself and his son, and as a matter of law he was justified. The fact that the defendant had gone there armed was wrong in itself, and a circumstance against him, but it could not overcome the undisputed facts showing his acts to have been justifiable. There are other questions presented, but they are of minor importance, and need not be considered. Judgment and order reversed, and cause remanded.

We concur: Thornton., J.; Sharpstein, J.

Fox, J., (concurring.) I concur in the judgment. The evidence clearly shows that the 15 or 16 acres which the wife of deceased claimed as being a part of her preemption was within the inclosure of defendant; that defendant had been in the actual possession of it, in a common field with other lands held by him, for 18 years; that he had sown it and the whole field with grain, which was nearly ready to harvest, when some one ran a fence, consisting of two wires, stretched upon pickets set 15 or 18 feet apart,—a mere sham of a fence,—through his field, cutting off from the rest the 16 acres claimed by the wife of deceased. It further shows that when defendant had finished heading the balance of his grain he undertook to go through this wire fence with his headers, to harvest that 16 acres. He was as fully in possession as he had ever been, and had a right to harvest that crop. When he had reached the fence, and his header was about to pass through, the deceased came up on a gallop, and undertook to prevent it. In the combat which ensued, (which in one sense may be called a mutual combat,) the evidence is clear and positive that the deceased was the assailant. He had drawn his pistol and fired at least two shots, one at the defendant and one at his son, both of which took effect, before the defendant fired upon him. The firing then became mutual, and both fired until their pistols were empty. When defendant commenced firing he was already smarting under the sting of a severe and dangerous wound, and saw the blood flowing from a wound in the head of his son, (whose whole effort in the case had been to prevent a collision,) and an effort being made to again fire upon the son. Not being the aggressor, the defendant was not bound to retreat or decline further struggle. He was an old man, 70 years of age, at first acting in defense only of his own property, without the use of deadly weapons, and when attacked acting in defense of his own life and of that of his son. In my judgment, it is clearly a case of justifiable homicide, under section 197 of the Penal Code.

Beatty, C. J., (dissenting.) I cannot concur in the view that the verdict of the jury in this case is wholly unwarranted by the evidence. It is not clear that the defendant, at the time of the homicide, was in the peaceable and exclusive possession of the disputed premises. Deceased, or those he represented, had at least a scrambling possession. Not such a possession, certainly, as would have justified him in resorting to extreme measures in the attempt to defend it, but certainly a show of possession, backed by a claim of right. He was standing on the land, at a gap in the fence, where he had gone armed with a deadly weapon, determined to prevent the defendant from entering. The defendant, equally armed and equally determined, accompanied by his son, approached with the manifest purpose of going on the land to harvest the crop. The parties were bitter and open enemies. Each had insulted and threatened the life of the other, and each at the time plainly declared to the other what his present purpose was,—the one to enter, the other to resist his entry. Each also plainly notified the other that he would act at his peril. Immediately ensuing these mutual threats pistols were drawn on both sides, and the firing commenced. The preponderance of the evidence certainly is that deceased drew first, though this is not perfectly clear, and all the evidence is that he fired first, though not until defendant's son was in the act of seizing him. After the struggle commenced neither party had an opportunity to withdraw, or to notify his adversary that he declined further contest, and probably neither party desired to do so. The natural and inevitable result was the death of one of the combatants. Under these circumstances, it seems to me that the jury may well have found that the case was one of mutual combat, voluntarily entered upon under circumstances insufficient to justify either party, and therefore that the defendant's plea of self-defense, or defense of his son, could not avail him; he and his son having entirely failed to manifest the slightest wish to withdraw from the combat before its fatal termination.

Phillips v. Day. (No. 13,351.)

Specific Performance—Title—Dedication.

In an action for specific performance, it appeared that the land had, at one time, been laid off into streets, lots, and blocks, but that the streets had never been accepted by the public authorities; that, after the recording of a map showing the streets, the land had been twice conveyed in a body, without reference to the streets; that several individuals had purchased lots before the recording of the map, and all of them except two had reconveyed to the original grantors; that one of the two who had not reconveyed had expressly waived any right to the streets on which his property fronts, and the other did not purchase on the faith of the map, nor does his property touch any of the streets; and that the land had been fenced and occupied by the vendor and his grantors for more than five years before the making of the contract. Held, that as no right to the alleged streets had ever vested in the public, and as whatever rights individual purchasers possessed had been cut off by the statute of limitations, the vendor's title was good.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Sonoma County; JOHN G. PRESSLEY, Judge.

George Lezinsky, for appellant. J. A. Barham and McGee & Barham, for respondent.

WORKS, J. The facts of this case and the questions presented and tried in the court below are thus stated in the opinion of the learned judge of the court below, which is set out in the transcript: "In this case the plaintiff and defendant, on the 31st day of August, 1887, entered into a contract in writing, by which defendant bound himself to sell to plaintiff, and plaintiff bound himself to purchase, a tract of land, known as the 'John Fulkerson Place,' for the sum of $8,000,—'$500 to bind bargain, and $2,000 at expiration of sixty days, the balance in one or two years,' secured by note and mortgage on the property. Upon the making of the contract the plaintiff paid to the defendant the sum of $500, and on the 20th day of September thereafter paid the further sum of $700. An abstract of the title was furnished to the plaintiff, and, upon submitting the same to his attorney, plaintiff declined to perform his part of the contract, on the ground that defendant could not give him a perfect title, and, after such refusal, commenced this suit to recover the money which he had paid. Defendant answers, and, by way of cross-complaint, insists on plaintiff's specifically performing his contract. It appears from the evidence that the land bargained for is a part of a larger tract, once the property of Richard Fulkerson, who got title from the grantee of a Mexican grant. The property was fenced and cultivated by Fulkerson for more than thirty years. He conveyed it to James B. Armstrong, and put him in possession. Armstrong laid it off into streets, blocks, and lots. The streets were marked on the ground, and the one on which the land bargained for is situated was graded and graveled, but the fence inclosing it with the rest of the larger tract was never removed by James B. Armstrong, or Walter Armstrong, his successor in interest. Where this graveled street intersects the public highway leading from Santa Rosa to Healdsburg a gate was put in, but kept closed, and the inclosure, by means of the gates and fences, was maintained. No opening of any kind was made where the street north of the property in question intersects the highway. There were two gates on two other streets. James B. Armstrong, while he was owner, sold three of the lots, but none of them on the graded and graveled street. He afterwards sold and conveyed the balance of the tract to Walter Armstrong, who conveyed several of the lots; four, at least, of them being on the graveled street. After these conveyances were made Walter Armstrong filed in the office of the county recorder a map or plat of the tract which was called 'Norwood,' showing streets, blocks, and lots, and on the same day conveyed all of the tract which he had not sold to Richard Fulkerson. The conveyances from James B. Armstrong to Walter Armstrong, and from Walter Armstrong to Richard Fulkerson, recognize the map, but include the streets. The latter conveyance was filed for record about two hours after the filing of the map. A. W. Riley, who purchased from Walter Armstrong, went into possession and erected a fence on the south line of the graveled street. It does not appear how many of the other purchasers from the Armstrongs went into possession, or to what extent they used the streets. John Fulkerson testified that some of them went into possession and used the streets to get to their lots; that there were three gates, and that they had to pass through one of these gates to get to their premises. All of the lots which had been sold by the Armstrongs came back by regular conveyances to Richard Fulkerson or John Fulkerson, except that portion of the tract which had been conveyed to J. H. Abshire, which, as delineated on the map offered in evidence by the plaintiff, consists of a part of lots 28, 29, 30, 31, and 32. It appears from this map that no part of his claim extended to or touches the graveled street, but does include the whole of so much of a street as ran near its westerly boundary, and takes a strip off the lots on the west side of that street. The evidence does not show that the general public ever used any of the streets, nor does it appear that there was any acceptance on the part of the county authorities. Richard Fulkerson, after he got the title back in himself, conveyed to John Fulkerson. In this conveyance no reference is made to streets. John Fulkerson conveyed a right of way over the south thirty feet of the graveled street to G. H. Abshire, and moved his fence, which had marked the south line of lot 3, which is a part of the land in controversy, to the middle of the street, and the north 30 feet of the graveled street was thereafter within the inclosure surrounding the land in dispute. This fence is now standing, and had been maintained for more than five years before the contract of sale was made. On the 14th of August, 1886, John Fulkerson conveyed to the defendant, by metes and bounds, making no reference to streets or to the map. This conveyance included a triangular piece of land on the north side of the Day tract, having the north-east corner of the tract for its apex, and about three feet on the Healdsburg road for its base, which had been previously conveyed by Fulkerson to Joseph Viles; but it appears from the testimony that Day had no actual knowledge, nor had Fulkerson, that the deeds overlapped. The triangle was within the inclosure of Day. On the north side of the tract described in the complaint is another street as laid down on the Armstrong map, and which, if it is a public highway, would take off another strip of 30 feet from the land bargained for. The plaintiff contends that both of the platted streets, north and south of the land, are public streets, and that, if compelled to purchase, he would lose a strip of thirty feet on the south and one of the same width on the north, and for this reason, and because the title to the triangle (which contains one-fiftieth part of an acre) is not in Day, he should not be compelled to purchase." The court below found for the defendant, and decreed in his favor that the plaintiff specifically perform the contract. There was a motion for a new trial, which was denied, and the plaintiff appeals.

The contention of the appellant in this court is that there was a dedication of a part of the land to the public, to be used as public streets, or that the facts were such as to raise a reasonable doubt as to the defendant's title to so much of said lands as was covered by these alleged streets, and that for that reason he was not bound to accept a conveyance and pay the purchase money for the land. We have had occasion very recently to consider fully the question as to what is necessary to constitute a dedication of lands to the public for street purposes, by platting and selling lots by reference to the map thereof. People v. Reed, 22 Pac. Rep. 474. Much that is said in the opinion in that case is applicable to this, and need not be repeated. The decision in the case referred to is conclusive against the appellant as to the alleged dedication to the public. There has never been any acceptance by the public authorities, and the offer to dedicate, if there ever was one, was clearly withdrawn by the subsequent sale of the property in a body, including that part designated on the map as streets. As to the right of individual purchasers, it appears that they purchased before the map was filed; that all of them, except two, have reconveyed to the original grantor, or his grantees, under a conveyance of the whole property included in the map, except the parts previously conveyed; that the property here in controversy was and always remained fenced, and was in that condition conveyed by Armstrong, who had the same platted in a body, including the alleged streets, more than a year before the map was filed; that one of these purchasers who has not reconveyed has expressly waived any right to have the streets on which his property fronts kept open, and the other did not purchase on the faith of the map, and his property does not touch any street that runs though or in any way affects the property in controversy. The question of dedication is purely one of intention, and the intention of the owner or owners of the land must be gathered from his acts and conduct in respect to the property. Harding v. Jasper, 14 Cal. 647; People v. Reed, supra.

In this case the owner of the land at the time it was platted did not file the map. The land was not within the limits of any city or town. It was at that time, and continuously thereafter remained, fenced, and no part of it was used by the public as a highway. The filing of the map was, as we have said, after the conveyance of the lots was made, and after the property had been conveyed in a body to a third party. The map was filed on the very day that the property was conveyed a second time in a body. As to that part of the lands involved in this litigation the court finds "that thereafter, in 1879, R. Fulkerson conveyed all of the lands reconveyed to him as aforesaid by metes and bounds, ignoring the designations of streets and lots as marked upon said map to J. Fulkerson, and he thereupon entered into the possession of the whole thereof under said deed, claiming title thereto, exclusive of other right; and, more than five years prior to the date of the agreement between plaintiff and defendant, inclosed the premises in the pleadings described with a good and substantial fence, and the same has continued closed ever since." Fulkerson conveyed the property to the defendant, August 14, 1886. The agreement to convey to the plaintiff was made August 31, 1887, and this suit was commenced January 12, 1888. No right to the alleged streets having vested in the public, and the property having been conveyed in a body, including the streets, and fenced and occupied for more than five years before the agreement to convey the property to the plaintiff, the right of any and all purchasers, conceding that they had any, was cut off and barred by the statute of limitations, and could not have been enforced. The defendant having proved a clear paper title to the property, the burden of proving a defect in the title for the reason relied upon in this case was upon the plaintiff; and if there were any circumstances which would have prevented the running of the statute, as against any of these purchasers, it was incumbent upon the plaintiff, in order to avoid a specific performance of his contract, to prove their existence. Shriver v. Shriver, 86 N. Y. 575. We think the facts show such a title in the defendant as that the plaintiff was bound to accept a conveyance and pay the purchase money. In Hellreigel v. Manning, 97 N. Y. 59, it was said: "The whole evidence left the case free from any reasonable doubt that the plaintiff's deed would convey a good title, and hence, notwithstanding the apparent defect in the chain of title as shown by the records, the defendant could not justly refuse to perform his agreement. A purchaser cannot justify his refusal to perform his contract by a mere captious objection to the title tendered him; nor is it sufficient for him, when the jurisdiction of an equity court is invoked to compel him to perform his contract, merely to raise a doubt as to the vendor's title. Before he can successfully resist performance of his contract on the ground of defect of title there must be at least a reasonable doubt as to the vendor's title,—such as affects its value, and would interfere with its sale to a reasonable purchaser, and thus render the land unmarketable." There is nothing in the evidence in this case sufficient to raise a reasonable doubt as to the defendant's title to the property. There was, in our judgment, no dedication of the streets, as to the purchasers, which could have been enforced by them at any time, but, if there was, they had lost such rights by lapse of time. Judgment and order affirmed.

OVERACRE v. BLAKE et al. (No. 12,146.)

NOTARY PUBLIC—NEGLIGENCE—ESTOPPEL—PRINCIPAL AND AGENT.

Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1962, subd. 3, provides that whenever a person has, by his own declaration or act, intentionally and deliberately led another to believe a particular thing true, and to act on such belief, he cannot, in any litigation arising out of such declaration or act, be permitted to falsify it. Held, that where a person executing a mortgage has been introduced to a notary by the mortgagee's agent, and the notary sees the person so introduced execute the mortgage by signing it with the name given him by the mortgagee's agent, who witnesses the signature, the mortgagee cannot, on discovering that the mortgage was not executed by the owner of the land, maintain an action against the notary's sureties for his alleged negligence in taking and certifying to the acknowledgment of the pretended owner.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; N. HAMILTON, Judge.

Action by Margaret A. Overacre against Francis Blake and others, sureties of William K. Rowell, a notary public, for the notary's alleged negligence in certifying the acknowledgment to a mortgage. From a judgment in plaintiff's favor, defendants appeal. Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1962, subd. 3, provides: "Whenever a party has, by his own declaration, act, or omission, intentionally and deliberately led another to believe a particular thing true, and to act upon such belief, he cannot, in any litigation arising out of such declaration, act, or omission, be permitted to falsify it."

Nye & Richardson, Gray & Haven, and B. McFadden, for appellants. Fred. L. Button, for respondent.

FOX, J. This was an action against a notary public and his bondsmen for damages for alleged negligence in certifying the acknowledgment to a mortgage. The notary died pending the suit, and by stipulation a dismissal was entered as to him, and the action continued against his sureties. The court found in favor of plaintiff, and judgment was entered against the defendants for $1,309.30 damages, and for costs, from which defendants appeal. The case comes up on the judgment roll. The important question in the case is whether the findings are sufficient to support the judgment.

The court found that on the 30th day of June, 1884, William K. Rowell was a notary public, duly commissioned, qualified, and acting as such, and that the present defendants were the sureties on his official bond; also that on that day one Alexander Wilson was the owner of a half interest in a certain tract of land described in the complaint, and that the value of such interest was $2,000. It then further finds as follows: "(4) That on said June 30, 1884, a person other than Alexander Wilson, the owner of said land, came before said Rowell, and in his presence signed the name of Alexander Wilson to the note and mortgage set out in the complaint; and the said Rowell then and there signed his name as a witness to the signing, sealing, and delivery of the said mortgage. That O. C. Logan and W. R. Savage, composing the firm of Logan & Savage, were the persons who negotiated on behalf of said plaintiff said loan. That, prior to the execution of said mortgage and note, said plaintiff, at the office of said Logan & Savage, but not in the presence of said defendant Rowell, met said person pretending to be Alexander Wilson, the owner of said interest in said land; and thereafter said Savage appeared with said person, pretending to be the owner of said land, at the office of said notary, and introduced him to said notary as Alexander Wilson, and thereupon said note and mortgage were executed as aforesaid, and said Savage signed his name as a witness to the execution of said mortgage; and said Rowell, as such notary, then and there took and certified to the acknowledgment of said person pretending to be Alexander Wilson, the owner of said realty, to the execution of said mortgage, which certificate was in form as set out in paragraph V of the complaint. That said certificate was and is untrue, and that the signature of Alexander Wilson thereto was and is a forgery; and at the time of taking said acknowledgment no person was by said Rowell sworn as to the identity of said person so signing; and said Rowell had no other knowledge of the identity of said person whose acknowledgment was then by him taken than the said introduction by said Savage. (5) That said Alexander Wilson, who owned said interest in said realty, did not sign said mortgage, and was not known to said Rowell, and did not appear before said Rowell, and did not acknowledge that he executed said mortgage; but what the name of the person is who executed and acknowledged said mortgage the proofs in this case do not show. (6) That on June 30, 1884, the plaintiff, believing that the person who signed said note and mortgage was Alexander Wilson, the person who owned said interest in said realty, loaned and paid over to said person executing said mortgage the sum of $1,100, and he then repaid to plaintiff $44, the interest on said principal sum for six months in advance; but nothing further was ever paid thereon. (7) That on August 29, 1885, plaintiff commenced an action in this court against said Alexander Wilson, the owner of said interest in said realty; that said Wilson appeared therein and answered, and said action resulted in a finding and decree of this court that said Alexander Wilson did not execute said note or mortgage, and that the defendants to said action should recover costs, taxed at $32.15, which plaintiff paid; that there was due by the terms of said note and mortgage, at the time of the commencement of this action, the sum of $1,189, exclusive of attorney's fees and costs; that in the attempted foreclosure of said mortgage, plaintiff incurred further expenses necessary and proper in such prosecution, to the amount of $75 for attorney's fees, and $13.15 for costs of court. (8) That since the commencement of this action defendant Rowell has died. Wherefore the court finds as conclusions of law: (1) That the defendant Rowell was negligent in taking the acknowledgment of said mortgage, and certifying the same, and that plaintiff's loss arose from such negligence. (2) That plaintiff was not chargeable with any negligence in the matter of said loan. (3) That plaintiff is entitled to a judgment against defendants Francis Blake, F. K. Shattuck, and Galen M. Fisher for the sum of $1,309.30, besides costs of this action." Defendants demurred to the complaint in the action, but, in the view which we take of the case upon the findings, it is unnecessary to discuss the point made against the order of the court overruling the demurrer.

We are clearly of opinion that the facts found do not justify the conclusions of law, or support the judgment. There is nothing in all the facts found to justify the deduction found at the close of the fourth finding of fact,—that the signature to the mortgage was a forgery, or that the certificate of the notary was untrue. The notary did not certify, and the law never requires him to certify, that the person executing the instrument is the same person who owns the realty in the instrument described, and there is an utter failure to show that the person who signed the mortgage, and who is certified by the notary to be known to him to be the person whose name is subscribed to the instrument, is not in truth and in fact named Alexander Wilson. He was so introduced to the notary by the agent of plaintiff, who was acting in that transaction on her behalf, and he had the same right to act upon the faith of that introduction as if it had been made by the plaintiff herself. It is true that the person who executed the mortgage was not the owner of the land, and, whether named Alexander Wilson or not, he personated the owner for the time being, and successfully committed a fraud; but, under the facts found, we do not see how the notary or his sureties can be held liable for the damages sustained through that fraud. There can be no doubt, under the facts found, that Savage was the agent of plaintiff in the making of that loan, and seeing that the loan papers and securities were properly executed. See Civil Code, §§ 2295-2300. The rule that a principal is responsible to third persons for injury occasioned by the negligent acts of agents, and by their own wrongful acts as part of their business as such, is not only elementary, but has been frequently upheld and applied by the courts. So held in Kline v. Railroad Co., 37 Cal. 400, and in Taylor v. Railroad Co., 45 Cal. 323. And in the case of Bank v. Telegraph Co., 52 Cal. 280, it was so held in a case of false personation,—a case so nearly parallel to this as to make it almost conclusive of this case. In that case Crowell sent a forged dispatch from Colusa, where he was temporarily acting as telegraph operator, directing the Bank of California to pay to Crowley $1,200; and sent another dispatch, addressed to Crowley at the Occidental Hotel, telling him to call at the bank and get the money. He then followed the dispatches to San Francisco, himself applied for and received the dispatch addressed to Crowley, found a young man named Spencer, whose acquaintance he had made at Colusa, and went with him to the bank, and demanded the money. Spencer had not noticed the slight difference in name, and when asked if he could identify the applicant answered, "Yes; I know him,"—and certified to the correctness of Crowley's signature. When the fraud was discovered, a dispute arose between the bank and the telegraph company as to which was guilty of negligence,—or, rather, as to who must bear the loss; the telegraph company claiming that the bank was guilty of negligence, and must bear the loss. But this court held, without a dissent, that the bank was not guilty of neglect; that if Spencer was not sufficiently acquainted with Crowell to know that his name was not Crowley, it was his want of care, rather than that of the bank; and reversed a judgment which had been rendered below in favor of the telegraph company. If the neglect was Spencer's, and not that of the bank, in that case how can it be said that the neglect in this case was not that of Savage, instead of Rowell? And, if it was the neglect of Savage, it was the neglect of plaintiff, for whom he was acting as agent at the time.

The party executing the mortgage having been introduced to the notary by the plaintiff, through her agent duly acting for her in that behalf, she being the party to whom the mortgage was being given, and most likely of all persons to know with whom she was dealing, and the notary then seeing the person so introduced execute the mortgage by signing it with the name so given him by the agent of plaintiff, and said agent witness the signature, it cannot lie in the mouth of the plaintiff to say that the notary was guilty of negligence in certifying that such person was known to him to be the person who executed the same. Not only the doctrine of contributory negligence, but the doctrine of estoppel also, applies to close the mouth of plaintiff from asserting any claim against the sureties of the notary in such a case. If Savage did not know the name of the person he introduced to the notary by the name of Alexander Wilson, then the introduction was an act of deceit, (Civil Code, § 1710,) and if loss resulted therefrom to his principal, as between the principal and third persons she must bear the loss, for the act was hers in law, and "no one can take advantage of his own wrong," (Id. § 3517.) The plaintiff having, by her agent, introduced the person who executed this mortgage to the notary by the name of Alexander Wilson, and that, too, for the express purpose of making him known to the notary by that name, and having the notary take and certify his acknowledgment to the mortgage by that name, she cannot now be permitted to falsify that introduction, or the declaration thus made that he was Alexander Wilson. Code Civil Proc. § 1962, subd. 3.

Respondent claims that the issues in this case involve three questions, viz. (1) Was the defendant Rowell negligent? (2) Was the plaintiff negligent? (3) Did plaintiff's loss occur through her own negligence, or through that of the defendant Rowell? In discussing these questions, counsel insists that all the findings of the court, which are in the record designated as findings of fact, are mere recital of the evidence of facts, and that the real and only findings of fact are found in subdivisions 1 and 2 of the conclusions of law. And he claims that these two subdivisions constitute the only findings of fact into which this court can look, and are conclusive upon the court. We do not so understand the effect of these findings. When the facts are established, as in this case and on this record we must assume that they are, the question of negligence is a question of law, and the mere deduction as to whether there has been negligence or not is a conclusion of law. Flemming v. Railroad Co., 49 Cal. 253. It is to be decided by the court as a question of law when the facts are clearly settled. Fernandes v. Railway Co., 52 Cal. 45; Siemers v. Eisen, 54 Cal. 418; Nehrbas v. Railroad Co., 62 Cal. 320. Under these authorities (and many others might be cited to the same effect) the subdivisions referred to are properly designated as conclusions of law from the facts; and in our opinion they are not supported by the facts found. On the contrary, on the facts found, we think the answer to the first of the questions suggested by counsel for respondent must be answered in the negative, the second in the affirmative, and that the proper and only true answer that can be made to the third is that the negligence of the plaintiff's agent proximately contributed to the loss which she has sustained, and as against these defendants she cannot recover. Judgment reversed, and cause remanded, with instructions to the court below to enter judgment on the findings in favor of defendants.

APPEAL—REHEARING—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—SUPREME COURT.

1. By virtue of its appellate jurisdiction, conferred on it by Const. Cal. art. 6, § 4, the supreme court has the inherent power, independent of legislative enactment, to grant a rehearing in cases on appeal until a remittitur is regularly issued; and as section 2 of the same article provides that a majority, consisting of four justices, may decide any matter within the jurisdiction of the court, Code Civil Proc. § 45, which provides that, where there has been no decision in one of the departments, an order granting a rehearing after a judgment in bank "shall be made in writing, signed by five justices," is unconstitutional.

2. The division of the supreme court into two departments made it necessary, in order to prevent conflicting decisions, that department decisions should be deemed conclusive only in case a rehearing in bank should not be ordered; and therefore Const. Cal. art. 6, § 2, providing for the rehearing of department decisions, does not by necessary implication prohibit rehearings after judgments rendered by the court in bank.

WORKS, J., dissenting.

In bank. On motion to vacate order for rehearing.

BEATTY, C. J. This cause was originally submitted to the court in bank, without any previous decision or hearing in either of the departments. On July 1, 1889, a decision was rendered, concurred in by a constitutional majority of the justices, affirming the decree of the superior court. 21 Pac. Rep. 976. On the 31st of July we decided to grant the petition of the appellants for a rehearing. No order in writing directing such a rehearing was signed by any of the justices, but the clerk was directed to enter the order in the minutes of the court, and on that day he made an entry in the minutes in the following form: "In ank. Estate of Jessup. (No. 12,941.) Rehearing granted. BY THE COURT." Subsequently, in pursuance of this order and without any objection to its sufficiency, the cause was reargued, and again submitted for decision. On November 30, 1889, a second decision was rendered, reversing the decree of the superior court and our own former judgment. Ante, 742. The respondent now moves to vacate and annul this second judgment, on the ground that it was "made improvidently, and without color of law," and demands the issuance of a remittitur upon the judgment of July 1st. His motion is based upon the ground that said judgment of July 1st became final and irrevocable on July 31st, by reason of the fact that no order granting a rehearing of the cause was made on or before that day in conformity to the requirements of section 45 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which reads as follows: "Sec. 45. The chief justice or any four justices may convene the court in bank at any time, and the chief justice shall be the presiding justice of the court when so convened. The presence of four justices shall be necessary to transact any business, and the concurrence of four justices present at the argument shall be necessary to pronounce a judgment of the court in bank: provided, that, if four justices so present do not concur in a judgment, then all the justices qualified to sit in the cause shall hear the argument, but to render a judgment a concurrence of four justices shall be necessary; and every judgment of the court in bank shall be final, except in cases in which no previous judgment has been rendered in one of the departments, and in such cases the judgment of the court in bank shall be final, unless within thirty days after such judgment an order be made in writing, signed by five justices, granting a rehearing."

Most of this section, and several preceding sections, consist of a mere repetition, in substance, of express constitutional provisions, (article 6, §§ 2, 3,) but the part italicised is not contained in the constitution either in substance or in form. Nevertheless it may be valid and obligatory as a statute, and undoubtedly is so unless it conflicts with the constitution. Therefore, since it has not been complied with in granting the rehearing in this case, it becomes necessary to determine whether or not it is constitutional. The question is by no means a new one. The provision above quoted was adopted as an amendment to the Code, April 1, 1880, and naturally became the subject of consideration by the court, within a short time after its enactment. The court at that time was composed of the seven justices first chosen by the people of the state to administer the new constitution, and the laws passed in pursuance of it. They decided, without a dissenting voice, so far as the records of this court show, and so far as can be learned from any source of information accessible to me, that the provision in question was invalid, and they continued after the act, as before it, to grant rehearings by orders entered in the minutes of their proceedings. The same practice has been continued without change or interruption to the present time, and during the year that I have occupied a seat upon the bench its propriety has not been questioned until now by any member of the court, or by any party to a cause depending here. It has not, however, always passed unchallenged. Our records show that on at least two occasions formal objection has been made by the prevailing party to the order granting a rehearing, on the ground that it was not made in the form prescribed by this statute.

In the great case of Lux v. Haggin, decided in 1884, and reported in 69 Cal. 255, 10 Pac. Rep. 674, a case which directly involved interests of very great magnitude, and, as a precedent, affected the rights of a large portion of the land-holders of the state, the decision was made by the court in bank without a previous hearing in department. A bare majority of the members of the court concurred in reversing the decree of the superior court, and on petition of respondent a rehearing was granted by a minute order in precisely the same form as the one made in this case. Counsel for appellant in that case, without waiting for a reargument, promptly made the objection that the order granting the rehearing was void, and demanded the issuance of a remittitur upon the judgment already rendered. This motion was made and submitted to the court in February, 1885, and by the court overruled. It is true that no reasons were assigned by the court for its conclusion, but no member of the court, divided as it was and continued to be as to the merits of the case, dissented, and the point was clearly and necessarily decided that an order like that in question here was valid, and had the effect of putting the case in the same position as if it had never been decided or submitted. Again, in the case of Bull v. Coe, which was originally submitted to the court in bank, the judgment was affirmed in 1887. Subsequently a rehearing was granted by a minute order entered in identically the same form as the order here. Counsel for respondent in their printed argument on the rehearing made the objection that the judgment of affirmance had become final by reason of the failure of the court to file an order in writing signed by five justices. The court nevertheless proceeded upon rehearing to reverse the judgment appealed from and its own previous judgment, just as has been done in this case, merely remarking, in response to the objection to the order: "The positions as to the power of the court to grant a rehearing, and the sufficiency of the order granting it, do not require special notice." 77 Cal. 63, 18 Pac. Rep. 808. It is to be regretted that the court in deciding these motions did not set forth explicitly the grounds of its decision, as it would probably have prevented a recurrence of the question. The omission to do so was probably due to the fact that then, as now, the time of the court was so fully occupied in formulating opinions upon cases in which a statement in writing of the grounds of its decision was made obligatory by the constitution that it could with difficulty spare the time to state fully and at large its reasons for deciding a motion involving only a question as to the form of making its orders,—a question upon which no litigant could by any possibility need either information or caution for the purpose of any action to be taken by him. But, however that may be, it is plain that the question has been twice distinctly decided in determining contested motions. It has also been decided by the uniform and unvarying practice of the court in passing upon a great number of petitions for rehearing during the period of almost 10 years since the adoption of the amendment under consideration. If any course of construction could settle a question of practice, it seems to me that this must be regarded as settled, irrespective of any doubt that may now be entertained as to the correctness of the original decision. If the question was originally doubtful, it has been resolved too often in one way to admit of an opposite solution now, even if the opinion of the court should change. At least we should not visit the consequences of our inconsistency upon litigants, though we should feel constrained to change our practice. The rights dependent upon orders that we have made are protected by the rule stare decisis.

But I do not feel it necessary in this matter to rest upon the doctrine of stare decisis, or upon the mere authority of the former members of this court. There is certainly a sufficiently strong presumption that they were right in their decision, but, aside from such presumption, I think its correctness may be easily shown. The jurisdiction of this court is derived from the constitution, and can be neither enlarged nor abridged by the legislature. What it was in the beginning it remains, and it must remain until the constitution itself is changed. If the constitution has denied to this court the power to grant rehearings in causes that have been decided in bank, the legislature cannot confer the power. If the constitution has conferred the power, the legislature cannot take it away, or, by pretense of regulating its exercise, substantially impair it. And, whatever matters are by the constitution committed to the jurisdiction of the court, the court may by a constitutional majority—that is to say, by the voice of four of its seven justices—decide. The legislature has no more right to say that we shall not decide a matter within our jurisdiction unless five justices subscribe an order in writing than we should have to require all acts of the legislature to be subscribed by two-thirds of the members of each house. The constitution has conferred the power of deciding all matters within our jurisdiction upon a majority of the court; the legislature cannot require more than a majority.

If these propositions are true, it only remains to inquire whether under the constitution, and wholly independent of legislation, we have the power to grant rehearings in cases that have been decided by the court in bank.

The constitution of 1849 conferred certain appellate jurisdiction upon a supreme court composed of a chief justice and two associate justices. By the amendment of 1863 a slightly different jurisdiction was conferred upon a supreme court composed of a chief justice and four associate justices. By the present constitution,[1] adopted in 1879, substantially the same jurisdiction was committed, in substantially the same terms, to a supreme court composed of a chief justice and six associate justices. That is to say, certain cases were enumerated in which it was declared the supreme court should have appellate jurisdiction. This was all the framers of the constitution thought it necessary to say. They did not pretend to define appellate jurisdiction, nor did they undertake to prescribe in detail what orders and judgments the court in the exercise of its jurisdiction might make. They assumed, what was undoubtedly true, that the term "jurisdiction" had a well-defined and well-understood meaning. If this had not been so, the constitution would have been without meaning, and if, in the absence of any definite provision in the constitution, it had rested with the legislature to prescribe the powers and duties of the courts, as well as their mode of procedure, the judicial department, instead of being co-ordinate and independent, would have been entirely subject to the will of the legislature. No one, of course, contends at this day for such a proposition, and the only possible controversy is as to the extent of the power implied ex vi termini by the phrase "appellate jurisdiction." That this embraces the right to review the final judgments of the courts of original jurisdiction—the right, in other words, to reverse, affirm, or modify them, and to enforce by some appropriate mandatory process the judgment of the appellate tribunal—will scarcely be denied. And yet the legislature has assumed to confer upon this court by statute these identical powers. Code Civil Proc. § 53. This is only one of many instances in which provisions have been incorporated into the statutes which, either in express terms or by necessary implication, are contained in the constitution itself, and we cite it because it is referred to by counsel in support and illustration of their argument that powers conferred upon this court by the legislature may be by the legislature regulated, limited, and restricted. It may be conceded that, in so far as the legislature can confer upon the courts created by the constitution powers that they do not possess independent of legislation, such powers may be limited and restricted to any extent, but the fact that the legislature has assumed to confer a power upon a court does not prove that the power rests upon legislative authority. This will be more clearly apparent if we suppose a statute to have been passed which, instead of authorizing this court to affirm, reverse, or modify the judgments of the superior courts, had declared that we should not reverse or modify such judgments unless five justices concurred in the order. Would any one contend that such a law was constitutional? Certainly not. And why? Merely because this court derives from the constitution the power as a court, speaking by a constitutional majority of four of its members, to decide causes, and the power to decide includes the power to reverse or modify the judgment appealed from.

We need not, therefore, have been embarrassed by the fact, if it had been a fact, as counsel contend, that the legislature has undertaken to give this court the power to grant rehearings in causes that have been decided in bank. But in truth the legislature has not assumed to confer the power. On the contrary, the statute relied on (section 45, Code Civil Proc., above quoted) assumes the existence of the power, and merely attempts to restrict the court in the mode of exercising it. On this point the court and the legislature are at one. They agree that under the constitution, and independent of statute, the power exists. If so, what is its origin? Necessarily the constitution, and, as it is not expressly mentioned in the constitution, it must owe its existence to the principle that it is one of the inherent powers of every appellate court to revise, to modify, and to correct its judgments, so long as they are under its control.

There is abundant authority for this proposition. The practice of the supreme courts of many of our sister states, and of the supreme court of the United States, is in accord with it and rests upon no other foundation. But I need only refer to the decisions of the supreme court of this state under former constitutions, for it is in the light of these decisions that the new constitution must be read. In the case of Grogan v. Ruckle, decided in 1850, and reported in 1 Cal. 193, the judgment of the district court had been reversed, and before issuance of a remittitur a rehearing ordered. Afterwards, and notwithstanding the order for a rehearing, a remittitur was improperly issued, and sent to the district court. On the rehearing, counsel for appellant challenged the power of the court to grant a rehearing after judgment. In delivering the opinion of the court, Judge BENNETT said: "On the reargument of this cause the objection was taken by appellant that this court cannot, after its judgment has been pronounced, direct a rehearing. Section 280 of the practice act provides that, 'after an appeal shall have been heard and determined, the judgment or order of the supreme court therein, and all things concerning the same, shall be remitted to the district court of the proper county, and thereupon such further proceedings shall be had in that court as may be necessary to carry such judgment or order into effect.' Section 18 of the act organizing this court is to the same effect. It declares that 'the supreme court may reverse, affirm, or modify the judgment or order appealed from, and its judgment shall be remitted as soon as practicable, after judgment pronounced, to the court below, to be enforced according to law.' We are of opinion that this court loses jurisdiction of the cause when the remittitur has been sent to and filed in the court below, but that our control over the cause does not cease until that has been done; and so are the decisions of courts the jurisdiction and powers of which are analogous to those of this court. Burkle v. Luce, 1 N. Y. 240; Martin v. Wilson, Id. 240; Delaplaine v. Bergen, 7 Hill, 591. In this cause the remittitur, it appears, was filed with the clerk of the district court, 'on or before' the 25th day of December last; but the order for a rehearing was made and entered on the 18th day of the same month, when the court had jurisdiction of the cause, and the power to make the order. The remittitur was improperly sent to the district court after the entry of the order granting a rehearing, and such act ought not to be permitted to supersede the order."

This decision was made under the constitution of 1849, which contained not one word on the subject of rehearings, and under statutes which provided, in substance, that when an appeal had been heard and determined the judgment or order of the supreme court should be remitted as soon as practicable to the court below. The only principle upon which it could be sustained was that above stated, viz., that the power to grant rehearings is inherent, —is an essential ingredient of jurisdiction, —and ends only with the loss of jurisdiction. And this principle so established in the jurisprudence of California was followed down to the adoption of the present constitution without deviation, not only in the numberless instances in which it was acted upon without express reference to its origin, but also in several cases in which it was more or less fully discussed. In all of the cases the doctrine consistently maintained is this: That from the time an appeal has been perfected until a remittitur has been regularly issued and transmitted to the lower court the jurisdiction of the case is in this court, and that we have the power to make any proper order concerning it, including an order for a rehearing. As the law did not fix a precise time after judgment for the issuance of the remittitur, the court at first made a standing rule that no remittitur should issue short of 10 days after judgment, except by consent, and this for the purpose of affording to the losing party an opportunity of moveing for a rehearing, or for an amendment or modification of the judgment. Blanc v. Bowman, 22 Cal. 26. After the reorganization of the court under the amended constitution of 1863, which, like the old constitution, was silent on the subject of rehearings,—substantially the same statutory provisions remaining in force,—the time for filing petitions for rehearing was extended by rule of court, and it was likewise provided that no remittitur should issue until the time for petitioning had expired, and that the filing of the petition should operate a stay of proceedings until the determination of the motion. Rules Sup. Ct., as amended Jan. 3, 1866, App. 28 Cal. 708, 709. See, also, Mateer v. Brown, 1 Cal. 231; Leese v. Clark, 20 Cal. 387; Rowland v. Kreyenhagen, 24 Cal. 52.

This being the uniform course of practice and decision in the highest court of the state for 30 years preceding the formation of the present constitution, it may safely be assumed that, if the framers of that instrument had intended to deny or qualify the long-asserted doctrine of the inherent power of the supreme court to order rehearings after judgment, they would have incorporated in the constitution some express provision clearly evincive of such intention. The force—the conclusiveness—of this argument has not been overlooked by counsel for the respondent, who meet it with the assertion that the new constitution has prohibited rehearings of causes decided in bank, not, they concede, in express terms, but, as they claim, by necessary implication. In support of this proposition they cite the provisions of section 2, art. 6, in regard to rehearings after decision in department, and they say this express provision that a cause decided in department may be reheard in bank is an implicit prohibition of any other rehearing. The trouble with this argument is that it proves too much. If the constitution has in any manner prohibited all rehearings except in cases decided in department, the legislature cannot authorize them; the legislature cannot confer a power inhibited by the constitution. We have seen, however, that not only has this court constantly assumed the right to grant rehearings after decision in bank, but the legislature itself has recognized the existence of the power in the very statute by which it has sought to limit and regulate it. And not only is this contention of counsel opposed to all authority, legislative and judicial, but it is wholly unsupported by any inference deducible from the section of the constitution upon which they rely. The framers of the constitution, in authorizing the supreme court to sit in two departments, made it absolutely necessary that the relations of the departments to the court, and the extent of their dependence upon it, should be exactly defined. Without express provision as to the effect and conclusiveness of department decisions, we should have had two independent supreme courts, following possibly two conflicting lines of decision. To prevent this inconvenience in the only way it could be prevented, department decisions were made conclusive only upon condition that a rehearing in bank should not be ordered. This regulation of a matter imperatively demanding regulation, in view of the powers conferred upon the departments, by no means implies an intention to deprive the court in bank of a power well understood to be inherent in it, and essential to a proper discharge of its functions.

But, conceding the power of the court to order rehearings after judgment in bank, counsel contend that the legislature has the undoubted right to regulate the exercise of such power, and that section 45, Code Civil Proc., does nothing more. We concede, to quote the language of Chief Justice WALLACE, (Ex parte Harker, 49 Cal. 467,) that "the mere procedure by which jurisdiction is to be exercised may be prescribed by the legislature, unless, indeed, such regulations should be found to substantially impair the constitutional powers of the courts, or practically defeat their exercise." We concede the power to regulate, but not the power to take away or defeat, the exercise of jurisdiction. And this, in our opinion, the legislature has, by the section referred to, attempted to accomplish. The law, by its very terms, assumes the existence under the constitution of the power to grant rehearings after judgment in bank, and then proceeds to prohibit its exercise in one class of cases, and in another to require for its exercise the concurrence of more than a constitutional majority of the court. That this is an attempt to impair the constitutional power of the court seems to admit of no doubt. The legislature may have the right to prescribe the time for the issuance of remittiturs upon the judgments of this court, and, if so, it could, by making provision on that subject, limit our power, as to time, to grant rehearings. But for 40 years the time of issuing the remittitur has been left to the court to regulate, and rules have been made fixing the period after judgment during which the remittitur should be retained. During such period it has been held without question that the jurisdiction of this court to make any proper order in the case was preserved. It would be very remarkable if it should now be discovered that this court has for 40 years been acting upon an erroneous view as to the proceeding by which its jurisdiction over a cause is terminated.

There is, moreover, no consideration of justice or expediency calling for a change of view in regard to this matter. Our rule and practice create no uncertainty or confusion as to when our judgments become final and conclusive. By a standing order, all remittiturs are directed to issue 30 days after judgment, and we had never heard that this has been found unreasonable delay. The losing party avails himself of the opportunity afforded by the rule to petition for a rehearing. If we are satisfied from the petition that, owing to any mistake of law or misunderstanding of facts, our decision has done an injustice in the particular case, or if the principle involved is important, and the decision will make a precedent establishing a rule of property or of right, and it is seriously doubted whether we have correctly decided, we grant a rehearing. The effect of this is no doubt to cause some inconvenience and delay to the parties interested, but this inconvenience is less to be dreaded than the greater inconvenience of making a bad precedent, or the injustice of allowing a decision to stand which we believe to be wrong. However, the question for decision here is not the expedience of the system, but the source of the power and the extent of the right to grant rehearings. As to that we have sufficiently stated the grounds upon which we hold—First. The perfecting of an appeal gives us jurisdiction of a cause, and that jurisdiction lasts until a remittitur is regularly issued. Second. While the cause remains subject to our jurisdiction we have the power derived from the constitution to grant a rehearing after judgment, just as we have the power, independent of legislative enactment, to reverse, affirm, or modify the judgment of the inferior court, and to enforce our own judgments. Third. By the constitution a majority, consisting of four justices, may decide any matter within our jurisdiction, and an act of the legislature requiring more than four justices to concur in a decision is unconstitutional.

These propositions are decisive of this motion, and they are sustained by many decisions of this court, and by its uniform course of practice since the organization of the state government. In one single case, (Hegard v. Insurance Co., 72 Cal. 535, 14 Pac. Rep. 180,) in an opinion by the court, after deciding that the record presented no ground for granting a rehearing, it is held that the right to petition for a rehearing will not be recognized in cases decided in department and afterwards in bank. Preliminary to this conclusion, some reference is made to the silence of the constitution on the subject of rehearings, and to the terms of section 45 of the Code of Civil Procedure. But this was only for the purpose of showing that the petitioner had no absolute right to be heard, a decision as to the power of the court to grant the rehearing being expressly reserved. This is the only evidence I have been able to discover in the reported decisions of the court that any member of it ever doubted its inherent power to grant rehearings. Since I became chief justice I have found that one or two of my associates entertained doubts as to the power of four justices to grant a rehearing after decision in bank, and for that reason no such order has been made without the concurrence of five justices, but this has happened simply because in all cases in which four justices have strongly favored a rehearing another justice has added his vote for the purpose of giving the order unquestioned validity, after which it has been entered as an order of the court. In this case the order was made with the concurrence of five justices, viz., Justices MCFARLAND, THORNTON, SHARPSTEIN, FOX, and myself, and it was an order eminently proper to be made. The case was of great importance, not only in the magnitude of the interests directly involved, but still more so as a precedent. It was originally argued before only six justices of the court, and submitted along with more than a hundred other cases, many of them of great importance, all requiring to be decided within a period of 90 days. The record of this case covers 444 printed pages, almost the whole of which consists of the condensed report of conflicting testimony upon the effect of which the correctness of the judgment depended. Besides the time required for the consideration of the conflict of the evidence, important questions of law were involved. The printed argument of counsel upon these questions of law and fact covered 439 pages, in which were cited numerous decisions of other courts. Such being the case, and considering the multiplicity of other demands upon our attention, the time allowed for its consideration was far from abundant. After such consideration as we were able to give the case, a majority of the court concurred in the decision that was made, the other members dissenting. Under such circumstances, no reasonable man can doubt the propriety of subjecting it to further examination and deliberation, and the fact that after reargument our former judgment was reversed, so far from proving that the order was improperly made, is a complete vindication of its propriety. If we are never to change our opinions after reargument, it would be difficult to suggest a reason for granting a rehearing. Motion denied.

We concur: McFarland, J.; Fox, J.; Thornton, J.; Sharpstein, J.

Paterson, J., (concurring.) I concur in the order, and in all that is said by the chief justice, except the reasons given in support of the order granting a rehearing. I did not think a rehearing should be granted, and therefore voted against it. As a matter of fact, five justices voted for a rehearing in this case, and the only thing really involved in the question debated at the bar is whether their official act was sufficiently authenticated without an order in writing signed by them, or by four of them; that is to say, whether it was sufficiently authenticated by an order purporting to emanate from the court. This question has been foreclosed by former decisions, claims to property of great magnitude have been established and denied upon the construction thus placed upon the power of the court, and, as all orders thus made would be rendered absolutely void by a judicial change of front on the proposition, and numberless judgments be set aside after it is too late to do justice between the parties, the exigencies of the case imperatively demand the application of the rule stare decisis.

Works, J., (dissenting.) I cannot concur in the conclusion reached by the majority of the court, nor in the reasoning upon which it is founded, and, considering the magnitude of the interests involved and the importance of the question presented, it is proper that I should give my reasons for this dissent. The Code of Civil Procedure provides: "Sec. 45. The chief justice, or any four justices, may convene the court in bank at any time, and the chief justice shall be the presiding justice of the court when so convened. The presence of four justices shall be necessary to transact any business, and the concurrence of four justices present at the argument shall be necessary to pronounce a judgment in the court in bank: provided, that, if four justices so present do not concur in a judgment, then all the justices qualified to sit in the cause shall hear the argument, but to render a judgment a concurrence of four justices shall be necessary; and every judgment of the court in bank shall be final, except in cases in which no previous judgment has been rendered in one of the departments, and in such cases the judgment of the court in bank shall be final, unless within thirty days after such judgment an order be made in writing, signed by five justices, granting a rehearing." It will be observed that this section provides, in direct and unequivocal terms, that the "judgment of the court in bank shall be final unless, within thirty days after such judgment, an order be made in writing signed by five justices, granting a rehearing." The statute needs no construction. It cannot be misunderstood. If it is a valid statutory provision, this court should respect it and hold itself bound to comply with its requirements. But it is contended that it is invalid, and consequently not binding upon the court, for three reasons: (1) Because it is an attempt to interfere with and abridge the constitutional powers and jurisdiction of the court. (2) Because it attempts to limit the inherent powers of the court. (3) Because this court has uniformly held that it is not a valid enactment, and this construction of the statute has thereby become a part of the law of the state, and binding upon the court and litigants. I shall consider these propositions in their order.

A complete answer to the first of these contentions is that this court has no constitutional jurisdiction or power to grant a rehearing where a cause is heard in bank. The only provision of the constitution relating to rehearings is as follows: "The chief justice shall apportion the business of the departments, and may, in his discretion, order any cause pending before the court to be heard and decided by the court in bank. The order may be made before or after judgment pronounced by a department; but where a cause has been allotted to one of the departments, and a judgment pronounced thereon, the order must be made within thirty days after such judgment, and concurred in by two associate justices, and if so made it shall have the effect to vacate and set aside the judgment. Any four justices may, either before or after judgment by a department, order a case to be heard in bank. If the order be not made within the time above limited, the judgment shall be final. No judgment by a department shall become final until the expiration of the period of thirty days aforesaid, unless approved by the chief justice in writing, with the concurrence of two associate justices." Article 6, § 2, Const. The evident intention of this constitutional provision was to limit the right to grant rehearings to cases heard and decided in department. This is apparent, not only from the fact that a rehearing is provided for in such cases only, but because it is provided that such judgments shall not be final until 30 days after their rendition, leaving it to be understood that all other judgments of the court shall be final from the time they are pronounced. But it is enough for the purposes of this case to say that the constitution does not confer upon the court the right to grant rehearings of cases decided in bank. That it does not confer such power has been expressly decided in Hegard v. Insurance Co., 72 Cal. 535, 540, 14 Pac. Rep. 180, in which it was said: "The petition is denied for the reasons: (1) That an examination of the record shows no sufficient cause therefor; and (2) that the constitution does not provide for a rehearing of causes decided in bank, and the statute (Code Civil Proc. § 45) expressly provides that 'every judgment of the court in bank shall be final, except in cases in which no previous judgment has been rendered in one of the departments.'"

The rules of this court are now, and always have been, consistent with the idea that rehearings can only be had in cases heard in departments. They provide for the procedure in applications for rehearings in such cases, and none other. Rule 30.

Having thus demonstrated that the court has no constitutional authority to grant rehearings in this class of cases, I need not dwell further on this point. If such power were given by the constitution, and the provision of the Code under consideration would have the effect to take away, limit, or abridge such jurisdiction, it would be invalid beyond any question. Haight v. Gay, 8 Cal. 300. The case of State v. Noble, 21 N. E. Rep. 244, relied upon by the appellant, decides nothing more than this. Whether it would have that effect or not will be considered hereafter.

This brings us to the second question: Has this court the inherent power to grant rehearings, and if so can that power be limited, controlled, or regulated by the legislature? Inherent power is defined to be "an authority possessed without its being derived from another; a right, ability, or faculty of doing a thing without receiving that right, ability, or faculty from another." Bouv. Law Dict. 710. This court is as much a creature of the constitution and laws of the state as the lowest judicial tribunal in it. It cannot go beyond its constitutional jurisdiction, and that jurisdiction, as we have seen, is beyond the reach of the legislative department of the state government. But is this so of the inherent powers of the court? If the inherent power resting in the court is one necessary to the preservation of its existence as a court, or the performance of its constitutional duties and functions, it stands upon the same footing as the power expressly conferred by the constitution, and should be guarded against legislative encroachments for the same reason. If it is not of such a nature, in my judgment the power cannot stand as against an express statutory enactment. To that class of inherent powers which are necessary to the preservation and proper discharge of the duties of the court belongs the right to punish for contempt, a power that is uniformly upheld and jealously guarded by the courts. It is held that the legislature cannot deprive the courts of this power, or materially limit or abridge it. But it will be found, on an examination of the cases upholding this doctrine, that the power is maintained on the ground that its exercise is necessary to the existence and preservation of the courts and the proper discharge of their duties. Neel v. State, 9 Ark. 259; State v. Morrill, 16 Ark. 384; People v. Wilson, 64 Ill. 195; Ex parte Biggs, 64 N. C. 202; Clark v. People, Breese, 340; Little v. State, 90 Ind. 338.

The power of a court to vacate its judgments properly rendered, and not affected by fraud or mistake, does not belong to this class, if we admit the existence of the right as one inherent in the court. That courts have the inherent power to vacate or set aside their judgments which have been procured by fraud or mistake; correct their records to make them speak the truth; prevent the abuse of their authority or process, and enforce obedience to their mandates,—may be conceded. Freem. Judgm. §§ 99, 100. So they may, where jurisdiction is given them but no procedure is presented by which such jurisdiction may be exercised, provide such procedure. People v. Jordan, 65 Cal. 644, 4 Pac. Rep. 683. But, where a mode of procedure is provided by the legislature, this power is thereby taken away from the courts. All of these rest upon the same principle precisely. They are permitted and exercised as powers necessary to the proper exercise of the jurisdiction expressly conferred upon the court. I know of no authority or reason for the doctrine asserted in this case that a court has the inherent and uncontrollable power to vacate and set aside its judgment, rendered in accordance with the law, and not tainted with fraud or mistake. The ground, and the only ground, upon which the right is maintained, where the judgment is the result of fraud, mistake, or inadvertence, is that the judgment is not the judgment of the court. In such cases it is due to the court as well as to the parties that the pretended or apparent judgment be vacated. But this is not a rehearing in any proper sense. It is to relieve the party from a judgment rendered without a proper hearing, and is allowed because the injured party has no remedy by the ordinary course of appeal or writ of error, no error appearing on the face of the record. Freem. Judgm. §§ 99, 100; Sanders v. State, 85 Ind. 318–328; Nealis v. Dicks, 72 Ind. 374.

The reason for according to a court the right to vacate its judgments on this ground has no application to a case like this, where the cause has been fully and fairly heard, and decided on its merits. In such a case there is no ground for equitable relief, a rehearing cannot be demanded as a right, and the court has no inherent power to vacate the judgment, except in the manner provided by the statute. Nealis v. Dicks, supra. But let us concede, for the purposes of this case, that the power exists without constitutional or statutory authority. The question remains whether the statute is an infringement of the power. The statute contains three requirements: (1) Action must be taken in granting the rehearing within 30 days; (2) it must be by an order made in writing; and (3) be signed by five justices. Code Civil Proc. § 45. A part of this section may be valid and the balance invalid. As to the first of these requirements, that action must be taken within 30 days, its validity has never been questioned, and this court has acted in conformity to it from the time of its enactment until the present day. I regard it as a proper and reasonable limitation on the power of the court, conceding that the power exists, and it has been so regarded and acted upon by the court. As to the second requirement, it is eminently just and right that the action of the court should be put in some tangible form that will give evidence to the parties interested, and the public generally, that its duty has been properly and legally performed. A court of justice is not a star-chamber tribunal, that its action, or that of any one of its members, should be kept secret. The third requirement is open to more serious question. If the court had been acting in the discharge of a duty imposed upon it by the constitution, a majority of the court would have the right to act. If so, it may be claimed with much force that a statute requiring a greater number to concur in the action taken would be to limit and abridge the powers of the court, and if this statute related to such an exercise of jurisdiction it would, in my judgment, be unconstitutional for that reason. A statute of the state of New Jersey provided that no judgment of the supreme court should be reversed unless a majority of those members of the court of errors and appeals who were competent to sit on the hearing and decision of the case should concur in such reversal. This statute, which went directly to the jurisdiction and power of the court to render a judgment, and allowed a judgment to be rendered by less than a majority of the court, but denied it to the majority in certain cases, was held to be unconstitutional. But even in so strong a case the decision was by a bare majority, the court standing seven to six. Clapp v. Ely, 27 N. J. Law, 622. The reason for this rule is thus stated: "And as a court must act as an organized body of judges, and, where differences of opinion arise, they can only decide by majorities, it has been held that it would not be in the power of the legislature to provide that, in certain contingencies, the opinion of a majority of a court, vested with power by the constitution, should prevail so that the decision of the court in such cases should be rendered against the judgment of its members." Cooley, Const. Lim. (5th Ed.) 115. But as the action taken on the motion was not in pursuance of any constitutional authority vested in the court, and was not necessary to the proper discharge of its constitutional duties, I am of the opinion that the legislature had the power to say that more than a bare majority of its members should be necessary to set aside its judgment duly rendered by a constitutional majority of the members competent to sit in the case. The supreme court of the United States exercises the right to grant rehearings, but ordinarily a rehearing is never granted in that court unless it is moved for by a justice who concurred in the decision, and not then, except by a majority of the court. If not so moved for, it is denied as of course. Brown v. Aspden, 14 How. 25; Public Schools v. Walker, 9 Wall. 603; Ambler v. Whipple, 23 Wall. 281.

With respect to the requirement of the statute that the order for a rehearing shall be made in writing and signed by the justices voting in favor of it, there can, in my judgment, be no question as to its validity and binding force. It neither takes away nor abridges the jurisdiction of the court, but provides for the procedure, and determines what shall be sufficient evidence that the rehearing has been granted. If the legislature cannot require this, it has no power to say to a superior court that its judgments shall be in writing, and entered of record; that it shall make its findings of facts and conclusions of law in writing; that it shall charge a jury in writing; or in any other way control the manner in which it shall act or the mode of its procedure. It cannot say that the verdict of a jury shall be in writing, signed by its foreman, or otherwise provide for the conduct of a case. The right of the legislature to control and provide for the procedure of the courts, in respect even to their inherent powers, as in the matter of contempt, has always been recognized by this court and by the courts of other states. Warner v. Hall, 1 Cal. 90; Railroad Co. v. Harlan, 24 Cal. 336; Ex parte Harker, 49 Cal. 466; Fabretti v. Superior Court, 77 Cal. 305, 19 Pac. Rep. 481; Batchelder v. Moore, 42 Cal. 414; Galland v. Galland, 44 Cal. 478; Johnson v. Superior Court, 63 Cal. 578; Ex parte Henshaw, 73 Cal. 486, 496, 15 Pac. Rep. 110. But the legislature cannot take away the power to punish for contempt, or declare that any act which amounts to a contempt shall not be punished as such. Little v. State, 90 Ind. 338; Holman v. State, 105 Ind. 515, 5 N. E. Rep. 556.

In Ex parte Harker, supra, this court said: "The powers of the district court, whether sitting in equity or at law, to arrest a defendant on a civil action, are defined by the Code, and the writ by which and the proceedings upon which such an arrest is to be effected are therein prescribed, and the writ of ne exeat is not one. Nor is there any force in the suggestion made at bar that it was not competent to the legislature to abolish the writ, because jurisdiction in equity cases is conferred upon the district courts by the constitution. Jurisdiction is also conferred by the constitution upon those courts in certain cases at law; but it is apparent, in equity no less than at law, that the mere procedure by which jurisdiction is to be exercised may be prescribed by the legislature, unless, indeed, such regulation should be found to substantially impair the constitutional powers of the courts, or practically defeat their exercise." There can be no pretense that the provisions of the statute under consideration could "substantially impair the constitutional powers of the courts, or practically defeat their exercise." "The filing of a petition for a rehearing is not a matter of right. It is a privilege given by the court, governed and limited entirely by its rules. The power to make these rules is given and controlled by the statute. The court, equally with the suitor, is bound by them, until they are abrogated. We must construe them as statutory provisions would be construed." Hanson v. McCue, 43 Cal. 178. But, as I have observed, there are no rules of the court affecting or authorizing petitions for rehearings in cases decided by the court in bank, and, if there were, such rules must conform to and would be controlled by the statute. Code Civil Proc. § 129; People v. McClellan, 31 Cal. 101.

As to the wisdom of these restrictions upon the power of the court there should be no two opinions. The liberality of the court in granting rehearings needs some check, and while the court has, with a sincere and conscientious desire to do justice to litigants, added largely to its labors by hearing cases more than once, I am of the opinion that it would be much better for the court and litigants if the right to a rehearing were denied in all cases decided in bank where the cause had been fully and fairly heard on its merits. The wisdom of this statutory provision, and the expediency of a too liberal exercise of the power to grant rehearings, are fully exemplified in the proceedings in this case and their results. When the case was submitted on oral argument the court consisted of six members, who alone were competent to participate in a decision. The cause was affirmed, the court standing four to two. In the mean time a newly-appointed justice had become a member of the court. He was incompetent to participate in the decision of the case, although a member of the court at the time the decision was rendered, because of the fact that he was not present at the argument. Const. art. 6, § 2. His competency to act upon a petition for a rehearing is a matter of serious question. But, conceding his competency, he did not hear the argument. The petition for a rehearing must, under the practice of this court, be heard ex parte. The respondent could not be heard, and need not be notified of the application. As to a part of the court, therefore, the judgment was vacated and set aside without any opportunity given him to be heard, and, in my judgment, in a manner not authorized by law. The positive hardship, not to say injustice, of such a proceeding, must be apparent. The judgment having been set aside, a rehearing was had, and the cause was reversed, the court standing four to three; so that, so far as mere numbers were concerned, the decision was weaker than before, there being the same number in favor of the conclusion reached, and a greater number dissenting, than on the former hearing.

But they say that all this may be so, but this court has always acted to the contrary, and has twice decided this statute to be invalid. So far as the past conduct of the court is concerned, it could not repeal a valid statute by disregarding it, and as to the decisions referred to they do not decide that the statute is invalid. They simply overrule motions made to set aside orders made granting rehearings. On what grounds we are not informed. It is not held that the court is not bound by the statute. If the statute was unconstitutional, the point should have been decided in order to bind the court in the future. Perhaps the court decided the motions on the same ground that is urged now, viz., that, as the court had uniformly acted upon the theory that the statute was invalid, therefore it was invalid. If so, I think the court should not hesitate to overrule those cases; but, as they neither lay down a rule of law nor attempt to pass upon the construction of the statute or declare its invalidity, there would seem to be no necessity for overruling them. The only case in which this statute has been even mentioned by the court has recognized the validity of the statute, and left the question whether the court has the inherent power to grant a rehearing an open one. Hegard v. Insurance Co., 72 Cal. 535, 14 Pac. Rep. 180.

The case of Houston v. Williams, 13 Cal. 24, is greatly relied upon by the appellant, but in my judgment that case, when properly understood, has no bearing on the question presented here. There the statute directly affected the constitutional power and jurisdiction of the court by providing the manner in which its decisions should be rendered. But, as I have shown, the act attempted to be regulated by the statute under consideration does not affect any right given or duty imposed upon the court by the constitution, or any act necessary to the performance of its constitutional duties or functions. The act to which the statute relates, not being a constitutional one, might not only be regulated by the legislature, but might be entirely taken away. The constitution of this state gives all legislative power not denied to the legislature, while that of the United States gives only such as is named. Const. Cal. art. 4, § 1; Baker v. City of Cincinnati, 11 Ohio St. 534, 542. Therefore, as a general rule, to hold a law unconstitutional it must appear to be a plain violation of some provision contained in the constitution of this state or in the constitution of the United States. Hagar v. Board, 47 Cal. 222; Baker v. City of Cincinnati, supra; Braddee v. Brownfield, 2 Watts & S. 271; Beauchamp v. State, 6 Blackf. 299; Doe v. Douglass, 8 Blackf. 10; People v. Gallagher, 4 Mich. 244. There may be exceptions to this rule, but, in my opinion, this case does not present one of them. Where a court is exercising a jurisdiction conferred upon it by statutory enactment, and not by the constitution, its powers are limited by the statute by virtue of which it acts, and its powers, thus conferred, are subject to be limited or entirely taken away by the legislature. U. S. v. Knight, 1 Black, 488. So it is uniformly held that the legislature of the states have full power and control over the jurisdictions of the court, so long as the statutes enacted for that purpose do not conflict with the constitution. Ex parte Bank, 1 Ohio St. 433. The only authority given this court to grant a rehearing of a case decided in bank is conferred by the section of the Code under consideration, and in my judgment the court should be bound by its limitations and restrictions.

The distribution of the powers of the government into three departments—legislative, executive, and judicial—does not place either department above the law, nor make either independent of the other. McCauley v. Brooks, 16 Cal. 10, 39. In the case cited Mr. Justice Field, speaking for the court, said: "The third article of the constitution reads as follows: 'The powers of the government of the state of California shall be divided into three separate departments,—the legislative, the executive, and judicial,—and no person charged with the exercise of powers properly belonging to one of these departments shall exercise any functions appertaining to either of the others, except in the cases hereinafter expressly directed or permitted.' There is nothing in this distribution of powers which places either department above the law, or makes either independent of the other. It simply provides that there shall be separate departments, and it is only in a restricted sense that they are independent of each other. There is no such thing as absolute independence. Where discretion is vested in terms, or necessarily implied from the nature of the duties to be performed, they are independent of each other, but in no other case. Where discretion exists, the power of each is absolute, but there is no discretion where rights have vested under the constitution or by existing laws. The legislature can pass such laws as it may judge expedient, subject only to the prohibition of the constitution. If it overstep those limits, and attempt to impair the obligation of contracts, or to pass ex post facto laws, or grant special acts of incorporation for other than municipal purposes, the judiciary will set aside its legislation, and protect the rights it has assailed. Within certain limits it is independent; when it passes over those limits, its power for good or ill is gone. The duty of the judiciary is to pronounce upon the validity of the laws passed by the legislature, to construe their language, and enforce the rights acquired thereunder. Its judgment in those matters can only be controlled by its intelligence and conscience. From the nature of its duties, its action must be free from coercion. But it is not independent of the legislature in numerous matters materially affecting its action and usefulness. The legislature fixes the places where courts shall be held, determines the number of their terms, and in the regulation of proceedings in civil and criminal cases provides the manner in which suits shall be brought, prosecutions conducted, appeals taken, and all the vast machinery by which rights are asserted and wrongs redressed. In all these matters, with certain limited exceptions, the judiciary is a dependent department." Id. 39, 40. It is as much the duty of this court to respect and protect the powers of the other departments of government as it is to uphold its own, and care should be taken that under the guise of protecting the powers of the judiciary we do not trample those of the legislative department under foot. It is right and proper that the courts should maintain and uphold their independence and freedom as a co-ordinate branch of the state government, but this can best be done, and the independence and usefulness of the judiciary more securely established and preserved, by a fair and liberal construction of laws enacted for its guidance, and by upholding and protecting the constitutional powers of the other departments of state while maintaining its own. Here is a statute plain, unambiguous, and reasonable in its terms, that takes away none of the constitutional or inherent powers of the court, that tends to the stability of its decisions, that is calculated to prevent prolonged litigation, and places no improper restraints upon the court. I know of no reason why the statute should not be upheld and enforced. The most material part of it, and that which the court might with the greatest reason have looked upon with disfavor as a limitation of its powers, viz., that five members of the court should concur in order to grant a rehearing, and that action should be taken within 30 days, has been acted upon as valid. Why should not the other requirements? The whole of the reasoning in the prevailing opinion is outside of the real question presented. It goes to prove that the provision of the statute that five justices must concur in order to grant a rehearing is unconstitutional. There is no such question in the case. Five justices did vote in favor of the rehearing. If they had not, the rehearing would have been denied. The uniform practice of the court has upheld the validity of this provision of the statute, and rehearings have been denied, although a majority of the court voted for them. If the prevailing opinion is right on this point, the court has been wrong from the time the new constitution took effect until the present day. It was hardly necessary to go outside of the case to put the court in antagonism with itself by an attempt to show that it had been violating its constitutional duty, and upholding a statute that is unconstitutional for the past 10 years, especially in an opinion the main force of which is based upon the practice of the court against the validity of another provision of the same statute. The real question in the case, viz., whether the order granting a rehearing shall be in writing and signed, seems to have been overlooked in the zeal of an attempt to prove the court to have been wrong on a point not now before us. I think the motion should be granted.

BANK OF MENDOCINO v. BAKER et al. (No. 12,228.)

BONA FIDE PURCHASER—NOTICE—POSSESSION.

Open and notorious possession of land puts a purchaser on inquiry as to the extent of possessor's title, though by the records it appears that he is holding under a deed from a stranger to the title.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Mendocino county; R. McGARVEY, Judge.

Bond & Fishback, J. M. Mannon, and C. C. Hamilton, for appellant. J. A. Cooper, for respondents.

FOOTE, C. This is an action in ejectment. A day or two before the trial of the cause the defendants offered, in writing, to allow the plaintiff to take judgment for all the land sued for, except that described in paragraph 6 of the answer. This seems to have been declined, and the result of the trial was that the plaintiff obtained judgment for all the land, except that set out in said paragraph, and for costs. From that judgment and an order denying a new trial the plaintiff has appealed.

Under the facts, as found by the court, the plaintiff was defeated in its effort to recover the land mentioned in the paragraph referred to because it appeared upon the trial that the title and right of possession to that portion of the land in dispute was in the Garcia & Point Arena Railroad Company, a corporation, not a party to the suit, and that the defendants only have possession of it as the agents of that company. The evidence on which the findings were based that the title and right of possession so existed was, in brief, that the railroad company had been for many years in the open and notorious possession of the land, and that a deed in fee-simple had been executed to it about the time that it assumed such possession, in the year 1870, from one Campbell, from whom the plaintiff also claims to derive its title by mesne conveyance. It further appears that the deed to the railroad company had never been recorded, and was lost. The plaintiff claimed title by virtue of a sheriff's deed on a foreclosure sale, under a mortgage executed by one Abbott, to whom Campbell had made a deed of the land long after the deed to the railroad company was executed. In the brief of its counsel, appellant claims that the evidence shows that the plaintiff was a bona fide purchaser, without notice of the unrecorded deed from Campbell to the railroad company, and that the findings to the contrary are wrong; and seems to rely mainly upon this point for a reversal of the judgment and order appealed from. It is said the evidence shows that the possession of the railroad company was initiated under a deed of a mere right of way from two persons, Whitmore and Stevens, to whom there was no deed of record from Campbell; that, having taken possession in such manner, and placed such a deed upon record, the railroad company had an apparent possession under that deed; and that such possession, long continued, open, and notorious as it might be, did not and should not have put the plaintiff, when it came to take a deed to the land, upon inquiry as to the true nature of the possession of the railroad company. In other words, the plaintiff contends that the possession of the railroad company was consistent with the deed from Whitmore and Stevens, although, by the record, they were strangers to the title of Campbell, the common source of title, and that the company cannot be heard to say the plaintiff should have inquired diligently as to whether the company held a deed from Campbell of prior date, although unrecorded, to that made to Abbott, from whom the plaintiff claims.

The real question in the controversy, then, is whether an open and notorious possession under the deed of one who apparently never had any connection with or conveyance from the real holder of the title is such as that an individual desiring to purchase the land from one who, by the record, seems to be the true owner, may safely do so without any further inquiry as to the true nature of the occupant's possession, and may conclude that he has possession of the true owner's land by no other conveyance than that of one who has no shadow of title to the premises. The position of the appellant is to the effect that no inquiry would be necessary; that the purchaser would have a right to assume that the possession was under one who had no title whatever, was that of a mere trespasser as to the true owner of the land, and that a purchaser might with safety take a deed from the owner. The case of Fair v. Stevenot, 29 Cal. 490, cited by the appellant, does not sustain his contention. The rule as to the matter is very aptly stated in Pell v. McElroy, 36 Cal. 277, where the appellate court quotes affirmingly from the opinion in the case of Williamson v. Brown, 15 N. Y. 354, to this effect: "The true doctrine on this subject is that, when a purchaser has knowledge of any fact sufficient to put him on inquiry as to the existence of some right or title in conflict with that he is about to purchase, he is presumed to have made the inquiry and ascertained the extent of such prior right, or to have been guilty of a degree of negligence equally fatal to his claim to be considered as a bona fide purchaser." The fact of open and notorious possession for so many years, as in this case, would certainly be sufficient to put a purchaser upon inquiry as to the existence of a deed. 3 Washb. Real Prop. (5th Ed.) 337. The disclosure by the record of a deed which was made by a stranger to the title would not clear up the doubt to a prudent man, desiring to purchase. It would hardly be presumed that a person would have had open and notorious possession of another man's land for years without any disturbance under a deed which amounted to nothing. That kind of possession, under such a deed, is equivalent to an open and notorious possession, without any deed upon record, and inquiry should be made as to whether a deed from the owner existed. Where there is such possession, held under no record title, it is clear from the authorities that the intending purchaser is at least put upon inquiry as to whether the party in possession has a deed from the rightful owner or not. Hellman v. Levy, 55 Cal. 118, and cases cited; Patten v. Moore, 32 N. H. 384. It was an easy matter to inquire of those in possession, without any record title from Campbell, under what claim they were in open and notorious possession of his land; and the mere fact that the parties in possession had a deed upon record which did not appear to be from any one connected with the title did not absolve the plaintiff from this inquiry. The possession of the railroad company, by its agents, as it seems to us, was consistent with its unrecorded deed from Campbell; and the plaintiff should have inquired of them about the actual claim of title by the railroad from the true owner. The plaintiff had no right to believe that the railroad company was maintaining open, notorious, and long-continued possession of land under a claim of title exclusively derived from one who, by the record, had no title or claim to the land held by the corporation. Fairly considered, with reference to the different defenses set up in the answer, we do not think that the defendants' admissions that they were the successors "in interest" of the railroad company should be held to preclude the court from finding from the evidence, as presented, that the title was still in the railroad company. Neither do we perceive that the court committed prejudicial error in its rulings as to the exclusion of evidence, of which the plaintiff complains. The other matters adverted to do not require special attention; and we advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: Belcher, C. C.; Hayne, C.

PEOPLE v. BINGHAM. (No. 13,415.)

QUO WARRANTO—JURISDICTION—TITLE OF RELATOR.

1. Under Const. Cal. art. 6, § 5, providing that "the superior court shall have original jurisdiction in * * * and in all other cases in which the demand * * * amounts to three hundred dollars," and providing that it shall have power to issue writs of quo warranto, it has jurisdiction, in an action in the nature of quo warranto, brought under the provisions of Code Civil Proc. §§ 803, 809, to oust a person from office, and recover a penalty of $5,000 for unlawfully holding such office.

2. The fact that the person against whom the action is brought is a member of the board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco, which board, the consolidation act, § 67, p. 16, declares, "shall be the judge of elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members," does not take away the court's jurisdiction. SHARPSTEIN and THORNTON, JJ., dissenting.

3. As Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 803, authorizes the attorney general to bring the action, in the name of the people, on his own information, or on the complaint of a private party, it is not necessary for the complaint to show that the relator is entitled to the office, or that any one else claims to be entitled to it.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; F. W. LAWLER, Judge.

Horace W. Philbrook, for appellant. J. D. Sullivan, for respondent.

WORKS, J. This action is brought, in the name of the people of the state of California, by George A. Johnson, attorney general, upon the complaint of Charles J. Swift, against the respondent, to oust him from the office of supervisor of the city and county of San Francisco, on the ground that he was not, at the time of his election, a resident of the ward of which he was elected, and to recover the penalty of $5,000 provided for by the statute in such cases. There was a demurrer to the complaint on all of the statutory grounds, which was sustained; but we are informed by the briefs of counsel that the demurrer was sustained on the sole ground that the court had no jurisdiction to hear and determine the cause. This was based upon the ground, which is attempted to be maintained in this court, that by the consolidation act of the city and county of San Francisco the board of supervisors "shall be the judge of elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members." Consolidation Act, § 67, p. 16.

It was held, in an early case, that similar language to this, applied to the common council of the city of Los Angeles, gave to the council the exclusive right to pass upon and determine the election and qualification of its own members, and that the superior court had no jurisdiction of an action, in the nature of a quo warranto, to determine the same question. People v. Metzker, 47 Cal. 525. It was said in that case: "The tenth section of the act of March 11, 1850, to provide for the incorporation of cities, (St. 1850, p. 88,) that act being applicable to that city at the time of the alleged election of the relator, provides that the common council 'shall judge of the qualifications, elections, and returns of their own members.' The eighth section of article 4 of the constitution, relating to the legislative department of the state government, is as follows: 'Each house shall choose its own officers, and judge of the qualifications, elections, and returns of its own members.' The words of the constitution and of the statute, being identical, should receive the same construction. It is settled beyond controversy that those words of the constitution confer upon each house the exclusive power to judge of and determine the qualifications, elections, returns of its own members; and it follows that the common council of a city to which that section of the act is applicable possesses the like exclusive authority to judge of and determine the qualifications, elections, and returns of its own members. The court, therefore, had no jurisdiction of the action." As to the effect of such language, the opposite conclusion was reached by the court of appeals of New York in a well-considered case. People v. Hall, 80 N. Y. 117. There it was said: "But it is further urged that the clause of the charter, taken without regard to that likeness, gives exclusive power in the first instance to the board. It does not, unless it takes away jurisdiction from the courts, or, in this case, from the supreme court of the state. That court, from its origin, has had general jurisdiction in law and equity. Const. art. 6, § 6. Within that jurisdiction formerly fell the proceedings by quo warranto, and by information in the nature thereof; and now falls the action by which the remedies once got by them are yet reached. The jurisdiction is not taken away by a statute, unless there be express words in it to take it away. 'It is a maxim in the common law that a statute made in the affirmative, without any negative expressed or implied, does not take away the common law.' 1 Coke (2d Inst.) 199, cap. 20–24; Rex v. Moreley, 2 Burrows, 1040. And see, per COWEN, J., Ex parte Heath, 3 Hill, 52; People v. Turnpike Road, 23 Wend. 222. That rule applies here. There is no word in the clause in the charter that, either in terms or by necessary implication, expresses a legislative purpose to take from the supreme court its jurisdiction, and to make the power of the board exclusive, and its judgment final and conclusive. It creates a cumulative jurisdiction. It enables the board to pass speedily, and by simple proceeding, upon the right to membership in it, so that it may not be hampered in the performance of its functions; and, when it has done so, the board, as composed thereby, is for the time a legal body, and its doings authoritative. The courts of competent jurisdiction are not shut out, however, from inquiring, in behalf of the people, the origin of all authority, into the right of any person who, by the action of the board, in fact holds a place in it, and claims thereby to exercise a public office. The officer is such as to be liable to such an inquiry in behalf of the public; and it needs express and unequivocal words, or an irresistible implication, to take away from the judiciary a jurisdiction always possessed. The supreme court has, by its constitution, control over all inferior jurisdictions, of which the board of aldermen is one. To take away its general superintending power, the lan guage, to that end, should be clear and unequivocal, and not to be collected from doubtful inferences or incomplete analogies."

We are inclined to the opinion that the rule laid down by the case last cited is the correct one, but it is unnecessary to so hold in this case. In the case of People v. Metzker the question as to the constitutionality of the statute, which is the controlling question in this case, was not presented or considered. The constitution then in force did not in terms confer jurisdiction on the superior court in this class of cases. The present constitution expressly confers such jurisdiction. Section 5, art. 6, provides: "The superior court shall have original jurisdiction in all cases in equity, and in all cases at law which involve the title or possession of real property, or the legality of any tax, impost, assessment, toll, or municipal fine, and in all other cases in which the demand, exclusive of interest, or the value of the property in controversy, amounts to three hundred dollars." This is an action at law, and is for the recovery of $5,000. Therefore, the section of the constitution referred to gave the superior court jurisdiction. People v. Perry, 79 Cal. 106, 21 Pac. Rep. 423. The same section provides, further: "Said courts, and their judges, shall have power to issue writs of mandamus, certiorari, prohibition, quo warranto, and habeas corpus," and confers jurisdiction on said court in cases of this kind. People v. Perry, supra; State v. Railway Co., 34 Wis. 197; State v. Leatherman, 38 Ark. 81; People v. Boughton, 5 Colo. 487; State v. Gleason, 12 Fla. 190; People v. Keeling, 4 Colo. 129; State v. Vail, 53 Mo. 97. In People v. Perry we said: "Quo warranto was a case at law. It afforded the legal remedy for the usurpation of an office; and we think this court retains jurisdiction of the case, notwithstanding the legislature may have changed the procedure, enlarged the remedy, and given it a new name. To hold otherwise would be to admit a power in the legislature to abridge our jurisdiction, and take from parties the right of appeal by the easy device of a change of procedure, in many cases, where the right and jurisdiction are unquestioned." Jurisdiction in this class of cases having been conferred on the superior court by the constitution, such jurisdiction could not be taken away or abridged by the legislature; and a statute existing at the time the constitution was adopted, conferring jurisdiction on some other tribunal, was superseded by such constitutional provision, so far, at least, as it could be held to have conferred exclusive jurisdiction upon such tribunal. Haight v. Gay, 8 Cal. 300; People v Turnpike Road, supra; Montross v. State, 61 Miss. 429; High, Extr. Rem. § 615.

It is contended by the respondent that the demurrer to the complaint was properly sustained, because the action was brought on the relation of Charles J. Swift, and it was not shown that he was he entitled to the office, or that any one else claimed to be entitled to the office, and for that reason no right to recover the penalty of $5,000 was shown. The statute authorizes the attorney general to bring the action in the name of the people of the state, upon his own information, or upon the complaint of a private party. Code Civil Proc. § 803. This is a conclusive answer to the contention that a party not entitled to the office cannot be the relator. Section 809 of the Code of Civil Procedure is equally conclusive as to the right to recover the penalty where the relator is not shown to be entitled to the office. It provides: "When a defendant, against whom such action has been brought, is adjudged guilty of usurping or intruding into, or unlawfully holding, any office, franchise, or privilege, judgment must be rendered that such defendant be excluded from the office, franchise, or privilege, and that he pay the costs of the action. The court may also, in its discretion, impose upon the defendant a fine not exceeding $5,000, which fine, when collected, must be paid into the treasury of the state." The recovery of the fine is for the benefit of the state, and must be paid into the state treasury, no matter who is the relator. Judgment reversed, with instructions to the court below to overrule the demurrer to the complaint.

PATERSON, J. I concur. Each house of the legislature derives its power to "choose its own officers and to judge of the qualifications, elections, and returns of its own members," directly from the constitution. The fact that the words of the statute are identical with the words of the constitution is a matter of no importance. The power of the court to inquire, on behalf of the people, into the right of any person to hold and exercise a public office, is derived from the same source as that of the legislature to "choose its own officers," etc., i. e., from the people themselves.

SHARPSTEIN, J. I dissent. In People v. Metzker, 47 Cal. 524, the precise question involved in this case was decided. The act of March 11, 1850, which was held to be applicable to the city of Los Angeles, provided that the common council should judge of the qualifications, elections, and returns of their own members. Mr. Justice RHODES, speaking for the court, said: "The eighth section of article 4 of the constitution, relating to the legislative department of the state government, is as follows: 'Each house shall choose its own officers, and judge of the qualifications, elections, and returns of its own members.' The words of the constitution and of the statute, being identical, should receive the same construction. It is settled beyond controversy that those words of the constitution confer upon each house the exclusive power to judge of and determine the qualifications, elections, and returns of its own members; and it follows that the common council of a city to which that section of the act is applicable possesses the like exclusive authority to judge of and determine the qualifications, elections, and returns of its own members. The court, therefore, had no jurisdiction of the action." The language of the consolidation act, which confers all the powers which the board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco may rightfully exercise, provides that "the board of supervisors shall be the judge of elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members." The language of the court in People v. Metzker, supra, is as applicable to this case as it was to that; and I am not satisfied that that case should be overruled.

DEEDS—CONSIDERATION—JUDGMENT LIEN—DEPOSITION—NEW TRIAL.

1. The signing of a note as surety is a consideration for the transfer of property

2. Where the maker of a note transfers land as security to a surety on the note, and then sells it to a third person, who, in consideration therefor, pays the note, a deed of the land executed thereafter to such third person by the surety, on an order given by the maker of the note at the time of such payment, relates back to the time of the payment, and takes precedence over a judgment rendered in the mean time against the maker of the note.

3. Where plaintiff has testified fully in his own behalf, and is still present in court, it is in the discretion of the court to refuse to allow his counsel to read his deposition, taken by defendants before the trial.

4. The granting of a new trial for insufficiency of evidence to justify the decision will never be disturbed except for an abuse of discretion

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Napa county; R. CROUCH, Judge.

Bill for an injunction by R. F. Grigsby against H. Schwarz, a judgment creditor of T. L. Grigsby, and George W. Allen, a constable, to restrain the latter from giving a constable's deed to said Schwarz of certain premises sold on execution sale under the judgment of said Schwarz against said T. L. Grigsby. Prior to said judgment, said T. L. Grigsby had transferred the premises to A. F. Grigsby and W. A. Trubody, as security, and had then sold it to plaintiff, and directed said A. F. Grigsby and W. A. Trubody to deed it to plaintiff. This deed, however, was not executed until after the judgment was obtained.

Spencer & Henning, for appellants. Wallace & Johnson, for respondent.

THORNTON, J. The appeal in this case is by defendants, from an order granting plaintiff's motion for a new trial. The complaint states facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. Shattuck v. Carson, 2 Cal. 588, and cases cited in note to second edition of 2 Cal. 588, Pixley v. Huggins, 15 Cal. 127; Englund v. Lewis, 25 Cal 337.

Plaintiff's motion for a new trial was made on the ground, inter alia, of insufficiency of the evidence to justify the decision. Nothing appearing to the contrary, we must presume that the court granted the motion on this ground. Every intendment is to be made consistent with the record to sustain the correctness of the judgment of the court below Where a new trial is granted on the ground above stated, this court never interferes with it, unless there has been an abuse of discretion. Such a motion is submitted to the sound legal discretion of the court below, and a manifest abuse of such discretion only induces this court to reverse it. This is settled by more than a dozen cases decided here. In Breckenridge v. Crocker, 68 Cal. 403, 9 Pac. Rep. 426, nearly all the cases on this point, decided before the decision in that case, are cited. There have been several cases since decided the same way. We find no abuse of discretion by the court below in this case.

The trial court did not err in refusing to allow plaintiff's counsel to read the deposition of plaintiff, taken previous to the trial by defendants The plaintiff had been offered as a witness on his own behalf, and fully examined by his counsel. He was then present in court. It is not made to appear that there was anything in the deposition concerning which the plaintiff might not have been fully questioned by his counsel when he was on the stand as a witness. Under these circumstances, we regard it as entirely a matter of discretion in the court below to permit the reading of the deposition or not, and its refusal to permit it is a matter which this court would not revise on appeal. In ruling as above we do not intend to hold or not to hold that, if the deposition of a party has been taken by his adversary, it may not be read on behalf of the party whose testimony has been so taken, though the latter is present in court. The question just stated we do not wish to be regarded as deciding. The ruling here is confined to the facts stated above, arising on the record before this court.

The finding that A. F. Grigsby and W. A. Trubody paid no consideration for the transfer of the premises to them, is not sustained by the evidence. They paid for it by becoming sureties for T. L. Grigsby on a note for more than $1,000 in favor of J. H Goodman & Co. This was a very valuable consideration, and this consideration they paid by executing the note. It is a paltering with words to say that they did not pay anything, because they did not pay money. They paid money's worth,—worth much to T. L. Grigsby, their principal. It is immaterial whether they paid the money or not, as they paid a money value. The legal title passed to A. F. Grigsby and Trubody by the conveyance from T. L. Grigsby, and we see no reason why the latter could not sell his interest, and the full title pass to A. F. Grigsby by the deed executed at T. L. Grigsby's request, by his grantees, Grigsby and Trubody, to the plaintiff. See Carter v Hopkins, 79 Cal. 84, 21 Pac. Rep. 549. The evidence tends to show that T. L. Grigsby sold the land in suit to the plaintiff as early as the 18th of March, 1885; that plaintiff about the same time paid the purchase money by paying off the note of T. L. Grigsby to Goodman & Co., on which A. F. Grigsby and Trubody were sureties, after which T. L. Grigsby directed the conveyance to be made to the plaintiff by the parties above named, which was done. When the note was paid, Grigsby and Trubody held the bare title for T. L. Grigsby, their grantor, and T. L. Grigsby could deal with the title, sell it or not, as he saw fit. The deed made by his order to the plaintiff invested him with the full title, and a further conveyance by T. L. Grigsby was unnecessary. It must be borne in mind that the evidence tended to show an absolute purchase by the plaintiff of T. L. Grigsby. If such was plaintiff's purchase, the deed, though executed in November, 1885, related back to the purchase in the preceding March, (Landes v. Brant, 10 How 370; Waterman v. Smith, 13 Cal. 419, 420; Hibberd v. Smith, 67 Cal. 561, 4 Pac. Rep. 473, 8 Pac. Rep. 46,) which was prior to the day (the 16th of May, 1885) on which the lien of Schwarz's judgment attached. When the plaintiff paid the purchase money on the contract for an absolute purchase, his equity to have a deed from T. L. Grigsby was perfect, and this should be regarded as a legal title. Morrison v. Wilson, 13 Cal. 495. When the lien of the Schwarz judgment attached in May, 1885, nothing remained in T. L. Grigsby, the judgment debtor; not even the equity to have a deed from A. F. Grigsby and Trubody. The right to a deed from them had passed to the plaintiff, whose equity was perfect. A sale under Schwarz's judgment could pass nothing to a purchaser, for nothing vendible remained in the judgment debtor. The court below properly finds that there was no fraud in the transaction between T. L. Grigsby and the plaintiff. The title passed to the plaintiff, though he knew that the conveyance to his grantors from T. L. Grigsby was made to them to secure them from loss on the note to which they had become sureties.

What is said herein is not to embarrass the court on a new trial below in dealing with the evidence and finding the facts. The rules of law herein laid down only apply to the facts, if found to exist as above indicated. The order is affirmed.

We concur: McFARLAND, J.; SHARPSTEIN, J.

KENNEDY v. BOARD OF EDUCATION. (Nos. 12,584 and 13,029.)

SCHOOL-TEACHERS—REMOVAL—MANDAMUS.

1. Pol. Code Cal. § 1617, confers on boards of education unlimited power to employ teachers, contains no limitations as to the time for which they may be employed, and no restrictions on their right to dismiss or remove for or without cause. Section 1793 provides that "the holders of city certificates are eligible to teach in the cities in which such certificates were granted, in schools of grades corresponding to the grades in such certificates, and, when elected, shall be dismissed only for violation of the rules of the board of education, or for incompetency, unprofessional or immoral conduct." Held, that the power of the board to remove a teacher "when elected," at least where there has been no formal contract fixing the time of such employment, is limited to the cases enumerated in the last section.

2. Under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1085, providing that the writ of mandamus may issue "to compel the admission of a party to the use and enjoyment of a right of office to which he was entitled, and from which he is fully precluded," such writ will lie against a board of education, to restore a teacher who has been "elected" to a position from which she has been removed without cause, her right to retain the position being given by express provision of law.

3. The fact that the clause of section 1793, which forbids the removal of a teacher except for cause, was enacted after the election of a teacher, does not affect her right to be protected thereby.

4. The removal of a teacher to a lower grade is as much a violation of the statute as if she had been dismissed and not given another position.

5. A general statute, made applicable to all cities, controls special statutes, made applicable to particular cities.

6. The position of teacher not being an office, the right to have a writ of mandamus to restore her to her position is not affected by the fact that another person has been placed in her position.

Fox and McFARLAND, JJ., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; WILLIAM T. WALLACE, Judge.

Barber & Bishop and Jos. Rothschild, for appellant. Horace W. Philbrook and Hall & Rodgers, for respondent. Alfred Clarke, amicus curiæ.

WORKS, J. This was a proceeding or action for a writ of mandate, to compel the defendants to admit the plaintiff to the place and position of principal teacher of the North Cosmopolitan Grammar School of the city and county of San Francisco, to which she claims the right, and from which, she alleges, she has been wrongfully excluded by the defendants. The facts relevant to the points herein considered, as found by the trial court, are substantially as follows: In January, 1887, and more than 10 years next prior thereto, "plaintiff was, and ever since has been, and now is, elected and employed by said board as the principal teacher of said school, which is a public grammar school of said city and county; and during all which time she was and now is, the holder of a teachers' first-grade city certificate of said city and county; and during all that time the salary and compensation for the duties and services of principal teacher of said North Cosmopolitan Grammar School has been, and still is, $175 per month;" and during all that time "she was, and still is, eligible as said principal teacher of said school." That on January 26, 1887, upon application of the plaintiff, the board of education granted her leave of absence until May 1, 1887. At the time this leave of absence was granted, and during the entire term of plaintiff's absence, there was in force the following rule of the board of education: "Sec. 158. Whenever a leave of absence is granted to an assistant teacher in the primary or grammar schools for a longer period than three months, or renewed so that the total absence shall amount to more than three months, a regular teacher shall be assigned to the class; but the absentee shall be entitled to the first vacancy of like grade, or lower grade, at his or her option, officially declared after he or she reports for duty. But, when a principal or an assistant has been employed in the public schools of San Francisco for a period of not less than ten years, the board may grant such principal or assistant a leave of absence for not exceeding one year; and the party to whom such leave is ganted shall, at the expiration of the leave of absence, be entitled to a position of the same grade, in the same school, as he or she held when the leave was granted." That on March 16, 1887, during plaintiff's absence, and without notice to her,—without her consent, and without any charges against her,—the board of education made an order that she be transferred to the position of principal teacher of the Ocean View School,—a public school of said city and county, but of lower grade than the North Cosmopolitan School,—at a salary of only $100 per month. At the close of the term of her leave of absence the plaintiff returned, and demanded of the superintendent of schools, and of the board of education, that she be placed in what she claims to be her position of principal teacher of the North Cosmopolitan Grammar School, which demand was refused; and on Monday, May 2, upon the first opening of the school after the term of her leave of absence, she was at said school, "and then attempted to resume the performance of the services and duties of principal teacher thereof, but was resisted in such attempt, and prevented in the performance of all and singular said services and duties, by the defendants." On the 4th day of May, 1887, she delivered to the board of education a letter, in which, among other things, she said: "At the opening of schools on the 2d day of May, 1887, I was at the North Cosmopolitan Grammar School, and was then ready, able, and willing to resume the duties of principal of that school; but I was prevented from doing so by Miss H. M. Fairchild, who claimed to prevent me by your authority, and to be herself principal of that school. I thereupon informed James W. Anderson, the superintendent, of this, and demanded of him to be reinstated in the position of principal of the North Cosmopolitan School, and to be allowed to resume the duties of that position; but he again refused, and, in doing so, told me that I was prevented by you from resuming those duties." The defendants thereupon refused, and ever since have refused, and still refuse, the demands in said letter contained. That on the 26th day of January, 1887, the following were, and ever since have been, and still are, the rules or regulations of the board of education: "Sec. 45. All complaints against teachers or other employes of the school department must be made in writing, and verified, and shall be addressed to the secretary of the board of education." "Sec. 80. Upon a report from the committee on rules and regulations charging a teacher with unprofessional conduct, or upon a report of inefficiency by the committee on classification, a substitute teacher, a probationer, a regular teacher, or an inspecting teacher, may be dropped from the rolls at any time; but no such action shall be taken against a teacher, unless such teacher has had an opportunity of a due hearing before the proper committee." The plaintiff refused to accept or take the position in the Ocean View School to which the board had ordered her to be transferred, but otherwise never had violated any rule or regulation of the board of education, nor failed to perform any duty of her position as principal teacher of the North Cosmopolitan Grammar School; and no charge was ever made against her of which she had notice, or against which she had any opportunity to defend herself. Teachers elected or employed by the board of education have been liable to be dismissed, during the times herein mentioned, for failure or refusal to perform the duties and services required in the positions to which they were or are respectively elected, and for the violation of the rules legally adopted by the board, as well as for other reasons. Ever since the 2d day of May, 1887, plaintiff has been able, ready, and willing to perform all the services and duties of principal teacher of the North Cosmopolitan Grammar School. The trial court adjudged "that plaintiff was on the 2d day of May, 1887, and ever since has been, and now is, eligible and elected as principal teacher of the North Cosmopolitan Grammar School, and entitled to perform the duties and services of principal teacher of said North Cosmopolitan Grammar School, and to receive out of the school fund of said city and county her salary and compensation of $175 per month, and that defendants admit plaintiff to the use and enjoyment of said right, and to allow plaintiff to perform said services and duties." The defendants' motion for a new trial having been denied, they appeal from the judgment, and from the order denying their motion.

The two appeals have been submitted together. The statement on motion for new trial contains no sufficient specification of insufficiency of the evidence to justify any of the findings of fact; and, as the specified errors of law therein seem to be groundless, and are not urged by counsel for appellants, the order denying a new trial should be affirmed.

The questions presented by this appeal are whether the board of education had the power to remove the respondent from her position, and, if not, is mandamus the proper remedy, or must she resort to an action for damages, as for a breach of contract? The solution of these questions depends upon the construction to be given to certain sections of the Political Code. Section 1616 provides: "Boards of education are elected in cities under the provisions of the laws governing such cities, and their powers and duties are as prescribed in such laws, except as otherwise in this chapter provided." Section 1617 further provides: "The powers and duties of trustees of school-districts and of boards of education in cities are as follows: * * * (7) To employ the teachers, janitors, and employes of schools; to fix and order paid their compensation, unless the same be otherwise prescribed by law: provided, that no board of trustees shall enter into any contract with such employes to extend beyond the 30th day of June next ensuing." Pol. Code, §§ 1616, 1617. Section 1617 confers upon boards of education unlimited power to employ teachers, and contains no restrictions upon their right to dismiss or remove for or without cause. Therefore, if this section stood alone, we might consistently hold that the teacher became, by such employment, an employe, in the ordinary sense of the term; that her right to the position must depend upon her contract, and that alone; and that the only restraint upon the right of the board to dismiss her or remove her would rest in the contract, and a violation of such contract would only entitle her to an action for damages, and not to mandamus, to be restored to her place. This section contains no limitation as to the time for which a board of education in a city may employ a teacher. There is such a limitation, but it is confined in terms to boards of trustees. Therefore, such board of education may, under this section, employ a teacher for 1 year or 10, or for an indefinite time, as, for example, during the competency or good behavior of the teacher employed. But we have another section, forming a part of the same statute, bearing directly upon the question; and the two must be construed together. Section 1793 provides: "The holders of city certificates are eligible to teach in the cities in which such certificates were granted, in schools of grades corresponding to the grades of such certificates, and, when elected, shall be dismissed only for violation of the rules of the board of education, or for incompetency, unprofessional or immoral conduct. The holders of special city certificates are eligible to teach the special studies mentioned in their certificates, in all the schools in the city in which such certificates were granted." It seems to us that this section of the Code fixes the time for which the right to hold the place shall continue, at least, where the board of education has not limited the time in selecting the teacher. The section does not provide for any contract to be made by the board, but does provide, in plain and unequivocal terms, that "when elected" the teacher "shall be dismissed only for violation of the rules of the board of education, or for incompetency, unprofessional or immoral conduct." It is clear to our minds that it was the intention of this section to provide for just what is mentioned in it,—an election of a teacher, and not an employment by a formal contract, fixing the term of such employment. But it is unnecessary to hold in this case that the board had not the power to limit the term of service by an express contract. It is enough to say that this was not done in this instance. She was elected precisely as provided in this section, without limitation as to time. The action of the board and the rules adopted by it, as set out above, all indicate that this has been the understanding of the board as to the manner in which teachers should be selected and retained. The respondent having been elected in this way, the power of the board of education to remove her is expressly and plainly limited by the section last referred to. A teacher so elected "shall be dismissed only" for the causes named in the section. It seems to us that nothing could be plainer than this. It is only the apparent or possible effect of such a provision that seems to call for any hesitation in giving the section its proper construction. It is said, with an apparent fear of disastrous consequences to our free institutions, that such a construction confers upon the teachers of our public schools life positions. But it does not confer a life position. It gives the teacher a right to hold the position so long as he is competent and faithful. When he ceases to be either, his removal is easy. The means by which it may be accomplished is amply provided for, and the board of education has the matter fully within its control. Are any serious consequences likely to result from such a status? Why should the length of service of a competent and faithful teacher in our public schools be left to the arbitrary will of the board of education, and subject to the varying personal, and, it may be, political, interests of its change in members? In our judgment there is no reason. We think the clause in this section of the statute was intended to prevent just such results, and their consequences, and that it should not be construed out of existence because of a fear that the positions held by teachers may be made perpetual. The same construction of these statutory provisions, it seems to us, determines the question of remedy against the appellant.

The writ of mandamus may issue in this state "to compel the admission of a party to the use and enjoyment of a right or office to which he is entitled, and from which he is unlawfully precluded." Code Civil Proc. § 1085. It may be conceded that a right to hold the position of teacher in the public schools would not be a "right," within the meaning of this section, if such right depended solely upon a contract with the board of education, and the term for which such position should be held were not fixed by the statute. But such is not the case. As we have seen, the term for which the respondent was entitled to hold her position was not fixed by any contract with the appellant. The duration of her term of service is fixed by the statute; and her removal from it was not merely a violation of a contract, but of an express provision of law forbidding such removal. Although her right to take the position depended upon the act of the appellant, the right to continue in it was preserved to her by the statute; and to take it from her was to deprive her of a right given her by law, and to which she has a right to be restored by mandamus. People v. Van Siclen, 43 Hun, 537. The object being to restore her to a right given her by law, mandamus is the proper remedy; and, as her term of service is uncertain, and depends upon the action of the board of education, based upon the causes named in the statute, her damages could not be ascertained with certainty, and an action for such damages would not be an adequate remedy.

The clause of section 1793 which forbids the removal of teachers except for cause was added thereto as an amendment in 1881, (St. 1881, p. 38,) and after the respondent wa selected a teacher; but this fact does not affect the question before us. The statute applies to all teachers elected by boards of education, and protects them in the right to continue in their positions, whether they were elected before or after its enactment.

It will be observed from the statement of the case that the respondent was not dismissed entirely from service as a teacher. She was removed from the grade in which her certificate and the statute entitled her to teach, which was as much a violation of the statute as if she had been dismissed, and not given another position. We do not wish to be understood as holding that the board of education has not the power to transfer a teacher from one school to another of the same grade. The statute does not guaranty to a teacher the right to continue in any particular school, but to continue, as such teacher, in a certain grade; and the transfer of teachers from one school to another may be necessary for the good of the schools, and should not be prohibited.

We cannot concur in the view so earnestly contended for by the learned counsel for appellant, that, because the respondent is an employe, and not an officer, she may be removed at the will of the board of education. It may be conceded that this would be so ordinarily; but in this case there is a direct statutory prohibition against a removal, except for cause. This, it seems to us, renders the authorities cited by counsel wholly inapplicable.

It is contended that the provisions of the Code above cited are not applicable to the city and county of San Francisco, and that the consolidation act alone is applicable. But this court has held to the contrary in a number of cases. The general statute, which applies to all cities, must control special statutes, made applicable to particular cities. People v. Henshaw, 76 Cal. 436, 18 Pac. Rep. 413; In re Ah You, ante, 929, (opinion filed January 1, 1890.)

The fact that some one else has been placed in the position to which the respondent is entitled cannot affect her right to maintain this action. It is conceded by both parties that the place is not an office; and therefore the case is not within the doctrine that mandamus cannot be used to regain an office claimed by, and in possession of, another. It may be well to say that cases may arise in which a teacher cannot compel the board of education to continue his employment, and enforce payment of his salary,—for example, where the school in which he is teaching is abolished, or for any other reason the position has ceased to exist; but no such question is presented here.

We have not referred specifically to the rules of the board of education, for the reason that, in our opinion, they have no bearing on the question presented. They seem to us to be in entire harmony with the construction we have placed upon the statute; but, if they were not, they could not control its provisions. Judgment and order affirmed.

We concur: BEATTY, C. J.; SHARPSTEIN, J.; THORNTON, J.

FOX, J. I dissent.

1. The position claimed by plaintiff was an office, in everything but name; but she disclaimed it being such, because to call it an office defeated the life-estate, under the constitution. But, whether it be an office, or a mere right to place, it is a franchise; and in it she shows by her own complaint that there is another incumbent, one holding the place de facto. Mandate is not, therefore, the proper remedy. People v. Olds, 3 Cal. 167; Meredith v. Board, 50 Cal. 433; People v. Harvey, 62 Cal. 508; Kelly v. Edwards, 69 Cal. 460, 11 Pac. Rep. 1.

2. I cannot subscribe to the doctrine of a life-estate in the position of teacher in the public schools, which is the effect of the leading opinion. It is contrary to the entire spirit and intent of the constitution, and of all the legislation of the state, and, in my judgment, would be most disastrous to the public service. The people of this state require that all their public servants shall be subject to frequent visitation, and, at stated intervals, to opportunity in the appointing or electing power to determine whether the public service can be improved by change. Full force and effect can be given to section 1793, Pol. Code, without doing violence to section 1617 of the same Code; and, when this can be done, it is the duty of the court to do it.

3. The position of a teacher is distinctly defined by the Code (Pol. Code, § 1617) to be that of an employe. If the statutes and rules of the board determine his duties, powers, and rights, all that remains to complete the contract is his selection for the place; and it makes no difference whether that selection is made by a vote of the board, commonly called an "election," by appointment, or by specially negotiated contract. It does not change the fact that he is still an employe, and that his rights are based upon his contract of employment. Any violation of those rights was a breach of contract, for which the plaintiff has an adequate remedy at law; and, in that view of the case, mandate is not the proper remedy.

4. Whatever may have been the rights of the plaintiff at the time of commencing the action, May, 1887, in my view of the case, those rights had ceased before the entry of the judgment, February 11, 1888; and it was error to enter judgment declaring that she is now entitled to be restored to the place demanded, and to the emoluments thereof down to that date. As I view it, her contract expired by operation of law, at the end of the school year in which the action was brought, June 30, 1887; and there is no pretense that she was re-elected, reappointed, or that any new contract had been made with her.

MCFARLAND, J. I dissent. In my opinion, respondent shows no right, either by mandamus, quo warranto, or other proceeding, to compel the board of education to oust the present principal of the North Cosmopolitan Grammar School, who has occupied the place now for a year and a half, and put the respondent in her position. Certainly, a doctrine so destructive of the discipline, unity, and efficiency of the public school system should not be entertained, unless the statutory language upon the subject is so absolute as to leave no room for the play of ordinary and well-settled rules of construction. If respondent's relation to appellants was merely one of employment, then, of course, mandamus would not lie; and subdivision 7 of section 1617, Pol. Code, speaking of the relations between school officers and teachers, uses the words "employ" and "contract." No one ever heard of an employer being compelled by a judicial writ to retain an employe in his service. The remedy, in such case, is an action for damages for breach of contract. On the other hand, if the position was an office, then, in the first place, as it appears that another person is in the possession of the office, claiming a right to it, mandamus would not lie to oust her. The remedy would be the statutory action to determine the right to the office between the two contestants. But, in any event, respondent would have to show that she is entitled to the office for some definite term, which has not yet expired; and this she utterly fails to do. The only pretense which she makes in this regard, is to present the theory that the term of her office is "for life," to be forfeited only by such gross misconduct, or by such utter failure of qualification, as would warrant an extreme proceeding, in the nature of impeachment. If there be any statutory provision that must necessarily bear that construction, such provision, considering the position an office, is in contravention of section 16, art. 20, of the state constitution, which provides that the term shall not exceed four years. But, in my opinion, there is no statutory provision bearing such a construction. It is admitted that "section 1617, Pol. Code, confers upon boards of education unlimited power to employ teachers, and contains no strictures upon their right to dismiss or remove for or without cause," and that, if this section stood alone, respondent could not maintain the proceeding. And respondent's case is based on section 1793, which provides that teachers, "when elected, shall be dismissed only for violation of the rules of the board of education, or for incompetency, unprofessional or immoral conduct." And the whole stress of the argument rests on the construction to be given the words, "when elected;" and the construction given by respondent is "elected for life." But is there any other nook or corner in the whole body of our statutory and constitutional law in which "elected" means "elected for life?" Why should a meaning be given the word here which it bears nowhere else, and which is in the teeth of the constitution itself? Considering the position of a teacher as an office, then, in my judgment, the word "elected" should be given its ordinary and constitutional meaning, namely, chosen for some definite term; and, as respondent has not shown that she is entitled to any unexpired term of the alleged office or employment, she, in my opinion, shows no right which can be enforced by mandamus or otherwise.

SPRING VALLEY WATER-WORKS v. CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO. (No. 13,411.)

For majority opinion, see ante, 910.

THORNTON, J. I dissent. I am of the opinion that the superior court had jurisdiction of this case. It has jurisdiction of all cases in equity. Const. art. 6, § 5. I have no doubt it has jurisdiction of the case attempted to be made by the complaint herein, as presented in that pleading. It is a case brought for preventive relief. Its general purport is to prevent the property of the plaintiff from being taken by the action of the board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco, claimed to be unauthorized by law, without due process of law, and without compensation. All other relief sought is incidental to that just mentioned. Surely there can be no doubt at this day that such a case is within the equity jurisdiction of the superior courts of the state. The questions here to be considered relate to the exercise of jurisdiction, and the limits the law prescribes to the exercise of that jurisdiction. If the court has not exceeded such limits, its judgment must stand. The only real questions presented in this case relate to error in the employment of its jurisdiction. The judgment is correct, unless there can be found error in the record.

The question of the sufficiency of the complaint first attracts attention, and I am of opinion that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The complaint is defective in this: that it does not show on its face, by proper averment, that the rates fixed by the defendant board of supervisors are unjust or unreasonable or oppressive, and will not yield to the plaintiff all the revenue to which, under the law, it is entitled. The averments in regard to the fixing of rates are general and indefinite. The one most particular and definite, and on which, in my opinion, the decision of the case must turn, is contained in the following paragraph of the complaint: "That the said ordinance or order is, and the rates purporting to be prescribed and fixed thereby are, grossly unjust, unreasonable, and oppressive; that said rates do not permit of, nor provide for, a just or fair or reasonable compensation for the water to be supplied during said year by this plaintiff to said city and county, and to the inhabitants thereof; and that if said ordinance or order is enforced, and if the plaintiff is prevented from charging and collecting any other or greater rates than those prescribed, its gross income from the said rates for the year commencing July 1, 1889, and ending June 30, 1890, will not and cannot possibly exceed the sum of $750,000; and it will be wholly insufficient to pay the interest on the plaintiff's indebtedness, its operating expenses, and taxes, and not only will not and cannot yield any dividend to its stockholders, but will render it necessary to levy heavy assessments upon said stockholders to pay said interest, expenses, and taxes." It is here averred that the rates allowed by the ordinance will not and cannot produce an income, and will not allow the plaintiff to collect a sum which exceeds in amount $750,000. The plaintiff must show to the court by the averments that this is so; general averments of the character above set forth are insufficient. The facts must be pleaded from which the court can perceive and itself make an estimate, and the estimate so made by the court must show a result from which it can perceive that the rates fixed are unjust and unreasonable, and will produce an income less than that to which the plaintiff is by law entitled. Such a result must be shown by the facts stated in the pleading. The data on which the computation is to be made must appear by distinct allegation on the face of the complaint. The mere statement of the plaintiff as to the amount of money which the rates will bring to its coffers cannot be accepted by the court. Branham v. Mayor, etc., 24 Cal. 602. The facts in this regard are not sufficiently pleaded, and for this reason they are not admitted by the demurrer. A party demurring admits only such facts as are well pleaded. Branham v. Mayor, etc., supra; Johnson v. Kirby, 65 Cal. 487, 4 Pac. Rep. 458; Steph. Pl. 143; Gould, Pl. c. 9, §§ 5, 6, 24, 29. In Branham v. Mayor, etc., the court said: "Had the Ayuntamiento power to mortgage the pueblo lands to Aram, Belden, and Reed, under the circumstances, for the purposes narrated in the complaint? This question is not discussed by counsel for appellant, under the pretense that it cannot be made upon demurrer holding that, inasmuch as he has averred that the Ayuntamiento had full power and authority to make the mortgage, such power and authority is admitted by the demurrer. The Ayuntamiento, being a municipal body, could take and exercise only such powers as were conferred by the will of the sovereign, as expressed in the laws creating it. Every question as to what power has been conferred by such laws is a question of law and not of fact; and the averment in the complaint that the Ayuntamiento had full power and lawful authority to do the act in question, is but an averment of a conclusion of law, and does not tender an issue of fact. A demurrer admits the truth of such facts as are issuable and well pleaded; but it does not admit the conclusion which counsel may choose to draw therefrom, although they may be stated in the complaint." In Johnson, v. Kirby supra, the following observations were made by the court on this point: "It is also averred that this assessment was not levied in accordance with law, and is void; but the defendants insist that it is valid, and treat it as valid. The pleader does not state any fact showing, or tending to show, that the assessment was not made in accordance with law, or that it is not valid. It is stated in the complaint, as matter of law, as a legal conclusion. A demurrer only admits such facts to be true as are well pleaded. It does not admit matter of law or legal conclusions. Such averment, then, goes for nothing. We cannot take it into consideration in deciding the questions in this cause; nor can we take into consideration the averment that the company sold the 13,000 shares of stock to the Lanes, and thereby Kirby became possessed of the benefits of this stock. It is not alleged in what mode he became possessed of these benefits. It is not averred that the Lanes were Kirby under another name; that they were in fact Kirby himself. It is not stated that Kirby became in any way the owner of the shares, but became possessed of benefits. What these benefits are does not appear. That he became possessed of benefits is a legal conclusion. No facts are alleged, and therefore none are admitted by the demurrants."

The facts above stated, taken from the complaint, are conclusions of fact, or conclusions made up of law and fact, and, whether conclusions of fact or conclusions of law and fact, they are alike insufficient. As said in Branham v. Mayor, etc.: "A demurrer admits the truth of such facts as are issuable and well pleaded; but it does not admit the conclusions which counsel may choose to draw therefrom, although they may be stated in the complaint." 24 Cal. 602. I cannot perceive how a court can accept the conclusions drawn by the pleader in the paragraph above quoted as well pleaded and admitted by the demurrer. That the allegation "the said ordinance or order is, and the rates purporting to be prescribed and fixed hereby are, grossly unjust, unreasonable, and oppressive," is a conclusion either of fact, or of law and fact, is too plain to admit of doubt. The same is true of the succeeding allegation, "that said rates do not provide for a just or fair or reasonable compensation for the water to be supplied during said year by the plaintiff to said city and county, and to the inhabitants thereof." The above allegation states no issuable fact; it is full of conclusions, and nothing beside. The next allegation is of the same character. The defendant should not be called on to answer such allegations. Under our system of pleading, facts only must be stated. This means the facts as contradistinguished from the law, from argument, from hypothesis, and from the evidence of the facts. Green v. Palmer, 15 Cal. 412, and cases cited in note of second edition of 15 Cal. Such allegations of fact the defendant is only required to answer. See case last cited.

The rule that should control in this is that which is applied to pleadings in which fraud is charged. Though fraud is not expressly charged, still the charges are of a gross dereliction of duty; and the facts showing such dereliction should be set forth in the complaint. The counsel for plaintiff strenuously asserts and contends that it is a case of fraud, and bases an earnest argument on it to sustain the jurisdiction of the court below. It is not sufficient to aver fraud in general terms; the facts constituting the fraud must be alleged. This is held in many cases decided by this court. This course of decision commenced at an early date in this state, as in Gushee v. Leavitt, 5 Cal. 160, decided in 1885; Kinder v. Macy, 7 Cal. 207, decided in 1857, and continued in Kohner v. Ashenauer, 17 Cal. 580; Meeker v. Harris, 19 Cal. 289; Castle v. Bader, 23 Cal. 76-79; Semple v. Hagar, 27 Cal. 163; Hager v. Chindler, 29 Cal. 60; Kent v. Snyder, 30 Cal. 674; Perkins v. Center, 35 Cal. 713; and many other cases which can be found by reference to the digest. Dow v. Beidelman, 125 U. S. 680, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1028, is a strong authority to support the contention herein put forth. The question in that case was as to the reasonableness of rates of transportation prescribed by the statute of the state of Arkansas on a railroad within that state. Justice GRAY delivered the opinion of the court, in which he quoted with approval the rule laid down in Stone v. Trust Co., 116 U. S. 307, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 334, 388, 1191, as to the limitation of the power to prescribe rates in such cases, viz.: That the rates must not be so fixed as to amount to a taking of private property for public use without compensation, or without due process of law. The opinion subsequently proceeds as follows: "The plaintiffs in error do not contend that it is always or generally unreasonable to restrict the rate for carrying each passenger to 3 cents a mile. They argue that it is so in this case, by reason of the admitted fact that, with the same traffic that their road has now, and charging for transportation at the rate of 3 cents per mile, the net yearly income will pay less than 1½ per cent. on the original cost of the road, and only a little more than 2 per cent. on the amount of its bonded debt. But there is no evidence whatever as to how much money the bonds cost, or as to the amount of the capital stock of the corporation as reorganized, or as to the sum paid for the road by that corporation or its trustees. It certainly cannot be presumed that the price paid at the sale under the decree of foreclosure equaled the original cost of the road, or the amount of outstanding bonded debt. Without any proof of the sum invested by the reorganized corporation or its trustees, the court has no means, if it would, under any circumstances, have the power, of determining that the rate of 3 cents a mile fixed by the legislature is unreasonable. Still less does it appear that there has been any such confiscation as amounts to a taking of property without due process of law." The action in Dow v. Beidelman was brought against certain trustees, who were alleged to be the owners, and in possession, of the railroad. The defendants did not prove the facts referred to in the above extract from the opinion to show that the rates prescribed by the statute were unreasonable, and therefore they failed in the suit. Such facts could not be proved without being alleged. It is so held in Green v. Palmer, supra, and it is common law and common learning. A party must allege every material fact which he is required to prove, and will be precluded from proving any fact not alleged. 15 Cal. 412, 415. In view of this rule, which is of frequent application in courts, Dow v. Beidelman is a strong authority to show that the view of the complaint above taken is correct, and that it does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The complaint here does not furnish data or state facts from which a court can see that the rates allowed by the ordinance are not just and reasonable, or that the income which will be received by the plaintiff from the adoption of such rates in making collections will not furnish all the revenue which the law allows, or that it can claim. One cannot perceive or calculate from any facts set forth in the complaint the amount which the rate-payers will have to pay under the rates prescribed by the ordinance each month or for the year. Until such facts are set forth, so as to make manifest to judicial cognition what such amount must and will be, it cannot be held that the complaint is sufficient.

A court should not consider a cause when such grave charges of an intentional dereliction of duty (for it is clear that intentional wrong is intended here to be charged) against a public officer are stated in the complaint. Nor should such officer be held to answer them. They should be make specific in statement, so that the defendant may see in advance what he has to admit or deny, and what evidence he will have to produce to disprove the charges made against him. The board of supervisors have important and responsible duties to perform, and, when they are charged with a dishonest and intentional failure to discharge their duties, the complaint should aver in what particulars they have so failed. Fraud lurks in generalities, and the law imposes on every plaintiff the obligation, in making such charges, to make them in distinct and specific language. The complaint should not be argumentative, nor an attempt to show, by inference to be drawn from general statements, that public officers have been guilty of intentionally dishonest conduct in the discharge of their official duties. Courts are bound to assume that the supervisors are men of ordinarily respectable standing, and they have a right to ask and demand of courts that they should be protected as far as the law allows from charges of dishonest official conduct, couched in general statements. They should be stated specifically, so that each of them may know what the charge is, and what they have to defend against. This is common justice, every day administered by courts, and never otherwise administered.

I do not think, for the reasons above stated, that the statements of the complaint generally made, as pointed out, are sufficient to justify the court in coming to the conclusion that the board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco, in fixing rates for water to be paid by the rate-payers in February, 1889, have failed in discharging their duty honestly and uprightly, and I am of opinion that the court below erred in overruling the demurrer to the complaint, for which error the judgment should be reversed.

I am of opinion that it is incumbent upon the board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco to so fix the rates for which water is to be sold by the plaintiff as to furnish it a fair income on its investment, employed in furnishing water to the rate-payers, but not on any investment made by it not so employed. What is such a rate is submitted by the constitution and laws to the discretion of the board. This discretion, when fairly exercised, cannot be controlled by this court or any other court. It is so held in all the cases cited by counsel for the plaintiff. When the fairness of the rates so established is attacked in a court of justice, and the court can see that such a discretion has been exercised as to allow a compensation to the company furnishing water, beyond the cost of furnishing it, it cannot interfere in the rates so fixed. Its power is then at an end. It is so limited by the law, and courts cannot pass this limit without usurpation. Such must be the rule, or the courts must assume the duty vested by the constitution in the board of supervisors. Take the rule as stated in the cases cited and relied on by the able and learned counsel for plaintiff. In Water-Works v. Schottler, 110 U. S. 347, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 48, this was said with reference to the power of the defendant, board of supervisors, to fix rates: "Like every other tribunal established by the legislature for such a purpose, their duties are judicial in their nature, and they are bound in morals and in law to exercise an honest judgment as to all matters submitted for their official determination." In Stone v. Trust Co., 116 U. S. 307, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 334, 338, 1191, the court, in speaking of the power of the legislature through the agency of a commission to fix rates of fare and freight on railroads within the state, said: "This power to regulate is not a power to destroy, and limitation is not the equivalent of confiscation. Under pretense of regulating fares and freights, the state cannot require a railroad corporation to carry persons or property without reward; neither can it do that which in law amounts to a taking of private property for public use without just compensation, or without due process of law. What would have this effect we need not now say," etc. In Dow v. Beidelman, 125 U. S. 680, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1028, reference is made to the cases above referred to, and the same rule is stated. In this case, the defendants, who were the railroad trustees, failed in their defense for lack of proof that the rates fixed by the legislature of Arkansas were unreasonable. In Banking Co. v. Smith, 128 U. S. 174-179, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 47, the court, speaking by Field, J., said: "It has been adjudged by this court in numerous instances that the legislature of a state has the power to prescribe the charges of a railroad company for the carriage of persons and merchandise within its limits, in the absence of any provision in the charter of the company constituting a contract vesting in it authority over those matters, subject to the limitation that the carriage is not required without reward, or upon conditions amounting to the taking of property for public use without just compensation." The cases of Railroad Co. v. Dey, 35 Fed. Rep. 866; Railway Co. v. Becker, Id. 883, are decided on the same rule. The above rule, as is seen in the case of Railway Co. v. Becker, above mentioned, only amounts to this: that in fixing rates something must be allowed beyond the expense of cost or service. In that case the rates fixed by a state railroad commissioner for switching cars was $1 per car, while it cost the plaintiff railroad company $1.14 for such service. The court below held that this rate could not be enforced; quoting this remark from the Railroad Commission Cases, 116 U. S. 331, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 334, 348, 349, 388, 391, 1191: "The state cannot require a railroad corporation to carry persons or property without reward." See, further, Railroad Co. v. State, 5 South. Rep. 833; State v. Gas-Light Co., 18 Ohio St. 298, 301, 302. The rule established by the cases cited may be formulated thus: The rates fixed must allow something beyond the cost of service. This something is compensation. If such compensation is allowed there is no taking of property without compensation. See cases cited above. What the compensation shall be is left entirely to the discretion of the state or the railroad commission, and here to the board of supervisors. This is plainly set forth in Railroad Co. v. Dey, supra. Brewer, J., after quoting the rule from the cases decided by the supreme court of the United States, and particularly from Stone v. Trust Co., 116 U. S. 307, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 334, 388, 1191, said: "It is obvious from these last quotations that the mere fact that the legislature has pursued the forms of law in prescribing a schedule of rates does not prevent inquiry by the courts; and the question is open, and must be decided in each case, whether the rates prescribed are within the limits of legislative power, or mere proceedings which, in the end, if not restrained, will work a confiscation of the property of complainant. Of course, some rule must exist, fixed and definite, to control the action of the courts; for it cannot be that a chancellor is at liberty to substitute his discretion as to the reasonableness of rates for that of the legislature. The legislature has the discretion, and the geneal rule is that, where any officer or board has discretion, its acts within the limits of that discretion are not subject to review by the courts. Counsel for complainant urge that the lowest rates the legislature may establish must be such as will secure to the owners of the railroad property a profit on their investment at least equal to the lowest current rate of interest,—say 3 per cent. Decisions of the supreme court seem to forbid such a limit to the power of the legislature in respect to that which they apparently recognize as the right of the owners of the railroad property to some reward; and the right of judicial interference exists only when the schedule of rates established will fail to secure to the owners of the property some compensation or income from their investment. As to the amount of such compensation, if some compensation or reward is in fact secured, the legislature is the sole judge. The question is then one alone of policy. Whether, by reducing the compensation to a minimum, railroad enterprises shall be discouraged, or, enlarging, encouraged, is a matter for legislative and not judicial determination. Take a kindred matter. It is within the power of the legislature to prescribe the rate of interest, and to punish by severe penalties the exaction of larger than the legal rate. What that legal rate shall be is not for the courts, but the legislature, to determine. Suppose the legislature of Iowa should reduce the legal rate of interest to 1 per cent. Although such legislation would prevent capital from coming into the state, would the courts have power to declare the law unconstitutional? In like manner the rulings of the supreme court imply that the legislature may reduce railroad rates until only a minimum of compensation is secured to the owner. The rule, therefore, to be laid down is this: That where the proposed rates will give some compensation, however small, to the owners of the railroad property, the courts have no power to interfere. Appeal must then be made to the legislature and the people. But where the rates prescribed will not pay some compensation to the owners, then it is the duty of the courts to interfere and protect the companies from such rates."

In regard to the contention that as to the rates fixed the courts must decide what is reasonable, and not the legislature, it was said: "Where property has been clothed with the public interest, the legislature may fix a limit to that which shall in law be reasonable for its use. This limit binds the courts, as well as the people. If it has been improperly fixed, the legislature, not the courts, must be appealed to for the change." Peik v. Railway Co., 94 U. S. 178. In Dow v. Beidelman, supra, the above language of Chief Justice WAITE was quoted with approval, and the rule laid down in it acted on. That it was acted on in that case will appear so plainly from a perusal of the opinion, that it is not necessary to spend time in pointing it out. The rule thus declared by the chief justice is supported by Peik v. Railway Co., 94 U. S. 178; Railroad Co. v. Ackley, Id. 179; Railroad Co. v. Blake, Id. 180; Stone v. Wisconsin, Id. 181; Dow v. Beidelman, 125 U. S. 687, 688, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1028.

In my judgment, those cases establish the rule that, in fixing rates, the compensation to be allowed must exceed running expenses or cost of service. What the amount of that compensation shall be is confided entirely to the discretion of the tribunal fixing the rates. When such compensation is allowed, it "limits the courts as well as the people. If it has been improperly fixed, the legislature, not the courts, must be appealed to for the change." As said by BREWER, J.: "It cannot be that a chancellor is at liberty to substitute his own discretion as to the reasonableness of rates for that of the legislature." 35 Fed. Rep. 878. That an enlarged discretion is committed by the constitution and statute to the board of supervisors in the matter of fixing rates for water cannot be disputed. They cannot so exercise this discretion as to compel the plaintiff to render the service of supplying water without reward. They must so fix the rates that a sufficient amount of money may be derived on their collection by the plaintiff to pay the cost of services, and beyond that some reward or compensation. What such reward or compensation shall be is a matter left entirely to the discretion of the board, and with the exercise of such discretion the courts cannot at all interfere. The above is the result of all the decisions which have been cited and relied on by the plaintiff's counsel. After a diligent examination, I can find no other principles or rules established. According to this rule, the rates must be so fixed as to allow money to be raised to pay the fairly necessary operating expenses of the plaintiff in rendering the service required. In this I include taxes on the property of the plaintiff, invested and used in rendering such service as part of such operating expenses.

In fixing the compensation, regard must be had by the board to the value of the investment of the plaintiff in rendering the service required of it. The board must get at the value of the property of which the investment of the plaintiff consists, and upon such value they will allow such compensation as in their discretion they shall think fair and right. The obligation does not rest on the board to fix the rates so as to furnish money to the plaintiff to pay the interest on the bonds negotiated by it. If the plaintiff has invested the money borrowed on the bonds in purchasing property used by it in rendering the service due from it, the value of the property, as said above, must be taken into consideration in fixing the reward or income it is to receive. When the value of such property has been taken into consideration, and the compensation fixed in regard to it, to allow rates so as to raise a sum sufficient to pay the interest on the bonds would be to allow compensation for the property bought with the money raised on the bonds, and for interest on such money in addition. This would be to allow for it twice. If any portion of the money borrowed on the bonds was not invested in the property, needful and used in rendering the service required of plaintiff, it would be manifestly unjust to compel the rate-payers to pay interest on money so borrowed. If the bonds bear too high a rate of interest, the rate-payers should not be required to furnish any money, if bound at all to furnish it for such purpose, to pay more than a reasonable rate of interest.

The above considerations show that the rates should be fixed so as to furnish compensation to the plaintiff based on the amount invested, and not on their bonds or any other debts. Nor is the board bound to fix rates to furnish the money to be used in the further extension or construction of the water-works of plaintiff. The rate-payers cannot be called on to pay for the construction of water-works which the plaintiff is to own, and on the value of which compensation is to be allowed it. This would be to compel the rate-payers to furnish money to buy property for plaintiff, and also to pay plaintiff an income on such property when so paid for by them. The rate-payers in such case would buy the property for the plaintiff, and pay it interest on it. This cannot be just or right. In dealing with this subject of rates, the rate-payers have rights which are to be regarded. The board must remember that, while they owe a duty to the plaintiff, they also owe a duty to the rate-payers. Their rights are to be regarded as well as the rights of the plaintiff; and while a fair compensation, considering the value of its investment, should be allowed to the plaintiff, this compensation should be adjusted with regard to the rights of those who have to pay such rates to the plaintiff. The notice to the plaintiff was sufficient. The constitution and statutes, of which plaintiff must be held to have been cognizant, informed plaintiff that the rates had to be fixed by the board in the month of February of this year and of each year. Const. Cal. art. 14, § 1, and section 1 of Act of March 7th, (St. 1881, p. 54.) A tax-payer has no more notice of the assessment of his taxables, and of the meeting of the board of equalization. If a tax-payer desires the valuation of his property fixed by the assessor reduced by the board of equalization, he must take notice of its meetings which are fixed by law, and must apply to the board to be heard for that purpose. The law as to the notice requisite is clearly set forth in the State Railroad Tax Cases, 92 U. S. 575, and the rule there declared is clearly applicable to the notice required in this case. The point as to notice claimed by the railroad corporation in these tax cases was there disposed of by the court, (all concurring,) speaking by MILLER, J.: "There is, however, an objection urged to the conduct of the board of equalization, resting on the action of the board in these particular cases, in which they are charged with a gross violation of the law, to the prejudice of the corporations, which we will consider. The statute requires the proper officers of the railroad companies to furnish to the state auditor a schedule of the various elements already mentioned as necessary in applying the statutory rule of valuation. It is charged that the board of equalization increased the estimates of value so reported to the auditor, without notice to the companies, and without sufficient evidence that it ought to be done; and it is strenuously urged upon us that for want of this notice the whole assessment of the property and levy of taxes is void. It is hard to believe that such a proposition can be seriously made. If the increased valuation of property by the board without notice is void as to the railroad companies, it must be equally void as to every other owner of property in the state, when the value assessed upon it by the local assessor has been increased by the board of equalization. How much tax would thus be rendered void it is impossible to say. The main function of this board is to equalize these assessments over the whole state. If they find that a county has had its property assessed too high in reference to the general standard, they may reduce its valuation; if it has been fixed too low, they raise it to that standard. When they raise it in any county, they necessarily raise it on the property of every individual who owns any in that county. Must each one of these have notice, and a separate hearing? If a railroad company is by law entitled to such notice, surely every individual is equally entitled to it. Yet if this be so, the expense of giving notice, the delay of hearing each individual, would render the exercise of the main function of this board impossible. The very moment you come to apply to the individual the right claimed by the corporation in this case, its absurdity is apparent. Nor is there any hardship in the matter. This board has its time of sitting fixed by law. Its sessions are not secret. No obstruction exists to the appearance of any one before it to assert a right or redress a wrong; and in the business of assessing taxes this is all that can be reasonably asked." 92 U. S. 609, 610. The subject of notice was also considered and passed on in Davidson v. New Orleans, 96 U. S. 97, and the Kentucky Railroad Tax Cases, 115 U. S. 331, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 57; and by this court in Lent v. Tillson, 72 Cal. 413, 14 Pac. Rep. 71. In the last-cited case, where the point was fully argued by counsel, and considered and discussed by the court, this court said: "It is claimed that the act does not provide for due process of law, because the notices prescribed are insufficient. The notices provided for in the act which are criticised under this head are the notice of the organization of the board, and the notice that the report of the board is open for inspection. The sufficiency of the notice will depend, to a very considerable extent, on the nature of the proceeding, and the statute on which it is based. The statute is always presumed to be known, and whether the notice really affords the necessary information, and gives the party whose interests are affected an opportunity to be heard, must depend largely upon those provisions. It has been repeatedly held that proceedings for the levy and collection of taxes are not necessarily judicial, and that due process of law, as applied to such matters, does not require such notice as is considered essential to the validity of a judgment. In the Kentucky Railroad Tax Cases, 115 U. S. 331, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 57, it is said: 'Notice by statute is generally the only notice given, and that has been held sufficient. "In judging what is due process of law," said Justice BRADLEY, in Davidson v. New Orleans, 96 U. S. 97, "respect must be had to the cause and object of the taking, whether under the taxing power, the power of eminent domain, or the power of assessment for local improvements, or none of these; and, if found to be suitable or admissible in the special case, it will be adjudged to be due process of law; but if found to be arbitrary, oppressive, and unjust, it may be declared to be not due process of law."' In other words, the sufficiency of the notice must be determined in each case from the particular circumstances of the case in hand. And, further, in matters of assessment and taxation the same character of notice is not required as in ordinary actions in a court of justice, for the reason, I presume, that in such summary proceedings it is not practicable or usual." The court then proceeds to argue the question fully, and holds that the provisions of the statute gave notice, and no more particular notice was required; that the notice so given was all that "due process of law" required.

I am of opinion that the cases above cited should be regarded as settling the law on this question, and settling it adversely to the contention put forth in behalf of plaintiff. It cannot be said that any more specific notice is required in a case like this, where a plaintiff is seeking to acquire a right to levy and collect rates or taxes on the rate-payers, than there is required for the assessment of taxes, or for an assessment for local improvements on the property benefited thereby. In accordance with the criterion stated and adopted in Davidson v. New Orleans, supra, if the notice is found to be suitable or admissible in the peculiar case, it will be adjudged to be due process of law, but, if found to be arbitrary, oppressive, or unjust, it may be declared to be not due process of law.

I cannot find the notice to the plaintiff here to be either arbitrary, oppressive, or unjust. On the contrary, it is clearly suitable and admissible. The contention preferred here on the point is manifestly destitute of merit. It does not appear that the plaintiff made any application to the board for a hearing until the last day of the month (February) in which the rates were to be fixed. It could have made such application at any time during the month of February, or of January or December preceding. Nothing prevented it from informing the board of its desire to be heard, and requesting the fixing of a day for such hearing. The board of supervisors on the 3d of December, 1888, in accordance with the provisions of section 2 of the Act of March 7, 1881, adopted an ordinance requiring plaintiff to furnish the statement required by section 2 of the act above mentioned, with which it (plaintiff) complied on the 31st of January, 1889. Certainly there was no impediment to its asking the board for a hearing, and to fix a day for such hearing at any time after the 3d of December above mentioned. No court has a right to assume that the board would not have complied with such a request if seasonably made. In my opinion it was not bound to comply with the request when made on the last day of February, and on the last day of the month within which the board was required by the constitution and by the statute, under a penalty of removal from office, (section 8) to act. The request then made was unseasonable and unreasonable, and the board denied no right of plaintiff in refusing such a request.

As to the right of the plaintiff to introduce evidence before the board, this must be left to the discretion of the board. I cannot see that the law clothes the plaintiff with any such right. It seems to me that the legislature has regulated the matter of evidence by the act of March 7, 1881. This is done by section 2 and 3 of the act of 1881. See St. 1881, pp. 54, 55. By section 2, the plaintiff corporation is required, upon the requisition of the board of supervisors, to furnish to the board, in the month of January of each year, a detailed statement, verified by the oath of the president and secretary of the corporation, showing the name of each water rate-payer, his or her place of residence, and the amount paid for water by each of such water rate-payers during the year preceding the date of such statement, and also showing all revenues derived from all sources, and an itemized statement of expenditures made for supplying during said time. By section 3 it is provided that, accompanying the statement above mentioned, the plaintiff corporation shall furnish to the board a detailed statement, verified in like manner as the other statement, showing the amount of money actually expended annually, since commencing business, on the purchase, construction, and maintenance, respectively, of the property necessary to the carrying on of its business, and also the gross cash receipts annually, for the same period, from all sources.

I remark here that, though the first statement is required by law to be furnished in the month of January of each year, it was not furnished by the plaintiff in the year 1889, until the 31st day of January. It does not appear that the other statement required by section 3 has ever been furnished. The averment that the plaintiff, ever since the passage of the act of 1881, has complied in every respect with all the requirements thereof, is insufficient to show that it furnished in January, 1889, or at any other time, the statement required by section 3. The general averment of performance is allowed in pleading the performance of conditions precedent in a contract, (Code Civil Proc. § 457,) but here there is no contract, and the section is not applicable. The general allegation of compliance is manifestly insufficient. I know of no rule of pleading which permits or justifies it.

The legislature, under the first clause of article 14 of the constitution, has clearly fixed the evidence on which the board is to act. The evidence required to be furnished to the board is all that is necessary to be supplied by the plaintiff, as will be seen on examination of the contents of the statements provided for in the act of the legislature. It is entirely in the discretion of the board to permit the plaintiff to offer any further evidence. It may do so or not, as prompted by its discretion. The refusal by the board to permit the plaintiff to introduce further evidence in regard to the adjustment of rates was matter wholly within their discretion, and was not a denial of any legal right of the plaintiff. Neither was the board bound to hear argument on behalf of plaintiff. This also is submitted to its discretion. It was no more under obligation to hear argument on behalf of plaintiff than is a legislature to hear argument on behalf of parties interested in a bill before them for their action. All the allegations of the complaint just above referred to relate to immaterial or superfluous matters, which the defendants did not admit by their demurrer.

It is averred in the complaint that the ordinance of the board fixing the rates was not duly or lawfully passed, or that it was not published as required by the statute for five successive days. It appears by averment that it was published on six days, viz.: On the 21st, 22d, 23d, 25th, 26th, and 27th of February, 1889. It was not published on the 24th of February, 1889. In the year 1889 the 24th of February fell on Sunday. I am of opinion that the publication was sufficient. If it were not duly or lawfully passed, it was void. The board then had not acted at all, and was therefore guilty of an act subjecting them to the penalty fixed by law, of removal from office for non-action. If it is void, I cannot see why this action should be brought, unless to procure a judgment that such ordinance is void; certainly there is no need for an injunction to restrain the enforcement of a void ordinance, nor do courts, nor should they, exercise such power, or waste their time in considering such an application. That which is void injures no one, and no preventive relief is required or granted in such case, for the plain reason that there is no wrong to be redressed or prevented. As it does not appear that the plaintiff ever furnished to the board of supervisors the statement (second statement) required by section 3 of the Act of 1881, I am of opinion it has failed to place itself in a position entitling it to be heard in a court of equity. The plaintiff must have complied with all the requirements which the statute has imposed on it to enable the board to act understandingly in fixing rates before it is entitled to complain or to be heard in court; when it has failed to comply with the lawful requirements made upon it, it has not done equity. Equity does not act in favor of those who have failed to do equity.

In conclusion, in my opinion, this complaint does not show that the plaintiff has been deprived of due process of law, or that any of its property has been or will be taken for public use without just compensation. Conceding that the rates fixed by the ordinance will, n its enforcement, yield but $750,000, and that its operating expenses, including taxes, will amount to $442,278.05, (this is the amount stated in paragraph 13 of the complaint,) there still remains as compensation the sum of $307,721.95, the excess of $750,000 over $442,278.05. It thus appears that the compensation will exceed the cost of service by $307,721.95. The amount of the compensation, it may be said, is small, but with the rate or amount of compensation, when it is allowed, courts have nothing to do. This is left by the constitution and statute to the discretion of the board of supervisors, which courts can no more control than the board can control the discretion or judgment of courts. See cases above cited from the federal courts.

For the reasons heretofore given, I am of opinion that the court erred in overruling the demurrer to the complaint, and therefore that the judgment should be reversed.

MUIR v. MEREDITH et al. (No. 12,576.)

EJECTMENT—PLEADING—VERDICT—APPEAL—TAXATION OF COSTS.

1. A complaint and judgment in ejectment sufficiently describe the land in controversy by calling for a well-ascertained beginning point, from whence the line is to be run to a designated monument, a "station fence post," and then giving the course of every other call in the description.

2. A verdict, in ejectment, finding that plaintiff is entitled to recover the land in controversy, is sufficient, and the words "in accordance with the United States survey," appended at the end, will be presumed to be consistent with the former part, in the absence of a showing to the contrary, and may be rejected as surplusage.

3. An objection to the taxation of costs will not be considered, on appeal, where no motion was made to retax, and no exception reserved below.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Contra Costa county; JOSEPH P. JONES, Judge.

Ejectment by Susan Muir against William Meredith and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal.

A. H. Griffith and James G. Maguire, for appellants. Chase, Chase & Miller, for respondent.

THORNTON, J. The record is free from error. The descriptions in the complaint and judgment are sufficient. The land is described in the complaint as that certain lot of land situate in the county of Contra Costa, and described as follows: "Beginning at a point in fence line at the center of section 7, T. 1 N., R. 1 E., Mount Diablo base and meridian; thence along fence line 1.20 chains to station fence post; thence N., 89½° W., along fence line, 8.37 chains, to station in fence line; thence S., 88½° W., 6.80 chains, to station in fence; thence S., 74½° W., 8.80 chains, to station on the ¼ section line between the N. E. and N. W. ¼ sections of section 7, T. 1 N., R. 1 E., Mount Diablo base and meridian; thence W., along the ¼ section line, 22 links, to station; thence N., 13° W., 1.06 chains, to station in fence; thence N., 73¾° W., 1.00 chain, to station in fence; thence S., 83½° W., 1.06 chains, to station in fence; thence S., 66° W., 3.00 chains, to station in fence on the ¼ section line between the N. E. and the N. W. ¼ of section 7, T. 1 N., R. 1 E., Mount Diablo base and meridian; thence easterly, along said ¼ section line, to the point of beginning,—containing 2.49 acres of land." The same description is in the judgment. The beginning point of description is certain. It is easy enough to find that point. The description then proceeds: "Thence along fence line 1.20 chains to station fence post." The course is given by designating a fixed monument, the station fence post. The line is to be run from the beginning point to the "station fence post," in whatever direction that is. If it was said, "thence to a tree marked in a blaze with the letter 'A,'" the line would run to this tree, and the location of the tree would determine the direction or course. Rarely can it be said that there is no sufficient description of a lot of land where the beginning point is, or can be, fixed. A surveyor who understands his business can, with the description before him, when the starting point can be fixed, identify and survey the tract. The course of every other call in the description is given. It cannot be presumed or assumed, as a matter of law, that the station fence post called for cannot be found. On what principle of law it can be held that the judgment is a nullity for want of description, we cannot divine. The evidence is not before us. The case comes up on the judgment roll. It nowhere appears in the transcript that the location and identity of the land sued for was not established by the evidence. The fact that the jury found a verdict for it, and the court rendered judgment on the verdict, is sufficient to show to this court that the location of the land sued for was proved by the testimony. At any rate, this court would so presume, to sustain the judgment of the trial court. Error cannot be presumed. It must be made to appear. The transcript fails to show that any objection that the land was not identified by the evidence was made when the case was on trial. There was no demurrer to the complaint. But, waiving all this, the land was sufficiently described in the complaint and judgment.

The verdict is sufficient. It finds that the plaintiff is entitled to recover the land in controversy. The words, "in accordance with the United States survey," appended at the end of the verdict, may be rejected as surplusage. The verdict is sufficient without them. But we will say, further, that we have no doubt that this latter part of the verdict is consistent with the former part of it, and that the reference to the survey is to the survey of the land by the United States referred to in the complaint and judgment, and will aid in fixing the location and identity of the land sued for. At any rate, we cannot say as a matter of law, on construing the language of the verdict, that there is any want of consistency in the first and last clauses of the verdict. In the absence of a showing to the contrary in the verdict, we must presume it to be so. The sheriff can, no doubt, with the proper writ of execution in his hands, find the land recovered, and put the plaintiff in possession. If he cannot, we have no doubt the court below can.

The objection to the costs in the judgment is not well taken. If the costs were not regularly taxed, the defendants should have moved to retax. On such motion the court below could have corrected any error or mistake in the judgment of the costs. The defendants might have reserved an exception to the ruling of the court below as to the costs, and could have had such ruling reviewed by this court on a bill of exceptions. By failing to do so, any such question is waived, and there is nothing before this court to be considered. The judgment and order are affirmed.

(No. 12,468.)

RIGHT OF HEIRS—DECREE OF DISTRIBUTION.

Defendant conveyed his interest in his father's estate to his mother, and afterwards a decree was entered in the probate court distributing the land belonging to the estate among the heirs at law, including defendant. Held, that the decree of distribution did not invalidate defendant's deed, under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1666, which provides that a decree of distribution is conclusive as to the rights of the heirs, legatees, or devisees.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; T. H. REARDEN, Judge.

Action by Edward E. Chever and others against Ching Hong Poy and others to recover rents for certain lands. From an order granting a new trial defendant William J. Chever appeals.

James M. Seawell, for appellant. F. W. Van Reynegom, Jarboe, Harrison & Goodfellow, H. R. Cotton, and T. D. Riordan, for respondents.

McFarland, J. This action was brought against certain Chinese tenants to recover rent for certain land, and against William J. Chever, who claims a certain interest in the land and rent, and who was made a defendant because he refused to join as plaintiff. The Chinese defendants paid the rent due into court; and the only matter in controversy is the right to a certain one-fifth of the rent, which is claimed by both plaintiff and defendant William J. Chever. The court first decided the issue in favor of said defendant, but afterwards granted a new trial; and from the order granting the new trial the said defendant William J. Chever appeals. The plaintiff Edward E. Chever sues in his own right, and also as administrator of his deceased mother, Lydia D. Chever; and it is in his capacity as such administrator that he claims the said one-fifth of the rent.

The facts are that James W. Chever, who was the father of plaintiff and defendant, died seised of the land in question in the year 1857. He left surviving him his widow, Lydia D. Chever, and five sons, viz., Edward E., (the plaintiff,) David A., George F., Charles G., and the defendant William J. Chever. He left a will in which he devised all his property to his widow, Lydia D., during her widowhood, with a proviso that if she should marry again it should immediately go to his said children in equal proportions. As she did not marry, the effect of the will was simply to give her a life-estate in the property, without further dispostion of it; leaving it to go after her life according to the law of descents. Afterwards, on May 10, 1860, but before the settlement of the estate of the deceased father, the defendant herein, William J. Chever, duly executed to his mother, the said Lydia D., a deed in which he did "give, grant, sell, devise, release, and forever quitclaim" to said Lydia D. "all his right, title, and interest in and to all the real property * * * which might be coming to the said William J. Chever as heir at law of said James W. Chever, deceased;" and further covenanted to warrant and defend the same to said Lydia D., her heirs and assigns, forever, etc. His interest at that time was one-fifth. Afterwards, and prior to April, 1878, the said brother, George F. Chever, died unmarried, without issue, and intestate. On April 8, 1878, on the petition of the administrator of the said father, James W. Chever, a decree was entered in the probate court distributing the land described in the complaint to the said widow, Lydia D. Chever, during her widowhood, and afterwards in equal proportions to the surviving sons, Edward E., (plaintiff herein,) David A., Charles G., and the defendant William J. Chever. Afterwards, on January 15, 1883, Lydia D. died; and plaintiff is her administrator.

Upon this state of facts, the contention of appellant is that, notwithstanding his said deed to his mother of May 10, 1860, by which he conveyed to her all his right and title to the property, the subsequent decree of distribution entirely destroyed the effect of that deed, and conclusively established the title in appellant as of the date of the decree. The contention of respondent is that the title vested in appellant on the death of his father by operation of law, and passed by the deed to his mother. And we think that the view of the question taken by respondent, and adopted by the court below, is the correct one. Section 1666, Code Civil Proc., provides that a decree of distribution "is conclusive as to the rights of heirs, legatees, or devisees;" but it is conclusive against them only as heirs, legatees, or devisees,—only so far as they claim in such capacities. The probate court has jurisdiction to determine who are the legal heirs of a deceased person who died intestate, and who are the devisees or legatees of one who died testate; but its determination of such matters does not create any new title. It merely declares the title which accrued under the law of descents, or under the provisions of the will. The decree of distribution has nothing to do with contracts or conveyances which may have been made by heirs, devisees, or legatees, of or about their shares of the estate, either among themselves or with others. Such matters are not before the probate court, and over them it has no jurisdiction. An heir may contract about or convey the title which the law had cast upon him on the death of his ancestor; and the validity or force of such contract is not affected by the fact that a probate court afterwards, by its decree of distribution, declares his asserted heirship and title to be valid. Section 1678, invoked by appellant, applies particularly to cases of partition between heirs or devisees, where commissioners are appointed to make division, etc., and merely gives the right to a grantee of an heir or devisee to have the share of his grantor set off to him. Whether, even in such a case, the probate court would have jurisdiction to hear and determine a contested issue between an heir and alleged grantee, when the former denied the right of the latter, or whether it was intended to apply merely to admitted claims, is a question which need not be answered here. It is clear that on rendering ordinary decrees of distribution probate courts deal only with issues and parties legitimately before them. In opposition to these views, appellant cites Freeman v. Rahm, 58 Cal. 114. It is not very clear what principles were intended to be determined in the leading opinion in that case, or if they would be applicable to the case at bar. At all events, we cannot hold that that case rules this one differently from the conclusion herein reached. Views opposite to those claimed to be stated in Freeman v. Rahm are expressed in Theller v. Such, 57 Cal. 447; Bath v Valdez, 70 Cal. 350, 11 Pac. Rep. 724; and Barnard v. Wilson, 74 Cal. 512, 16 Pac. Rep. 307. Order appealed from affirmed.

Traverso v. Tate et al. (No. 12,560.)

Fraudulent Conveyances — Findings — Bona Fide Holder.

1. In an action to quiet title, where the pleadings admit that the fee is held by plaintiff, a finding that an undivided half interest is owned by another, without finding the facts from which such legal conclusion is drawn, is insufficient to support a judgment against plaintiff for half the land.

2. The answer alleged that the deed made by plaintiff's vendor was without consideration, and to hinder, delay, and defraud one F., a creditor of vendor, which allegation was denied. Held, that no issue was raised as to whether the deed was made to delay or defraud the creditors of the vendor, generally.

3. The payment of taxes on land by one in possession, who was also the owner of an undivided half interest therein, is not evidence of the bona fides of the deed from his co-tenant for the other half, under which he holds.

Davis Louderback, for appellant. W. B. Tyler, for respondents.

FOX, J. This is an action to enjoin the sheriff of the city and county of San Francisco from selling the interest of one Francisco Traverso, otherwise called Frank Traverso or Frank Travers, in a certain piece of land in said city and county, upon an execution issued out of the superior court, on a judgment in favor of the defendant Tate, and against said Frank Traverso or Frank Travers. The plaintiff, Giuseppe Traverso, claims to be the owner in fee of the entire interest in said lot of land, and that a sale on the execution against said Frank Traverso, of all his interest in said land, will operate as a cloud upon plaintiff's title. In his complaint plaintiff has set out a deraignment of his title, from 1879 down to the time of the levy under the execution against Frank, who is his brother, and by it shows that, as to an undivided half interest therein, he claims under a deed from Frank dated October 4, 1882. The answer admits the plaintiff's deraignment of title, but as to the deed from Frank to plaintiff of October 4, 1882, under which plaintiff claims to have acquired the undivided half interest which at that date stood in his brother Frank, it claims that the same was not made for a full or for a valuable consideration, was not bona fide, and avers that the same was made without consideration, and to hinder, delay, and defraud the said Tate, and that said Frank Traverso is still the owner of an undivided half interest in the said tract of land. Prior to the making of said deed, Tate, by Tyler, his guardian ad litem, had commenced an action for damages, in tort, against the said Frank Travers, but judgment thereon was not recovered until May 8, 1885, two and a half years after the making of said deed. May 11, 1885, execution was issued on said judgment, under which the sheriff is threatening to sell the interest of Frank Traverso in the property, and this is the threatened sale which it is now sought to have enjoined. The findings of the court below are as follows: (1) That the plaintiff is not the owner in fee of the entire lot of land described in the complaint, but that Frank Traverso, otherwise known as Frank Travers, owns an interest in said real estate at least equal to an undivided one-half thereof. (2) That the deed of Frank Traverso to the plaintiff of date 4th day of October, 1882, was not bona fide, but was made with intent to hinder, delay, or defraud the creditors of said Frank Traverso; and judgment was entered for defendants. The points made by appellant are that the evidence is insufficient to support the findings; that the findings are insufficient to support the judgment; that the court has not found on all the issues in the cause necessary to support the judgment, that the finding that the conveyance was made to hinder, delay, and defraud the creditors of Frank Traverso is not within the issues framed by the pleadings; that the judgment is against law; and that the court erred in the exclusion of certain testimony offered by the plaintiff.

The findings are not only unsupported by, but they are in direct conflict with, the undisputed evidence and the admissions of the pleadings. The pleadings admit, and the evidence without conflict shows, that the whole fee-simple title to the property stood in the plaintiff. An attempt was made to frame the pleadings, and they were treated as having been framed, so as to present an issue upon the question of whether or not the deed from Frank to plaintiff was simulated, without consideration, and made to hinder and defraud the defendant; in effect, whether or not the plaintiff held the title as to an undivided half thereof for the benefit of Frank. The findings are wholly insufficient to meet these issues. It being conceded by the pleadings that the legal fee-simple title stood in plaintiff, it was necessary for the court to find, in order to support this judgment, the facts from which the legal conclusion could be drawn, that as to the undivided half thereof it was held by plaintiff for the use and benefit of Frank Traverso, which has not been done. There was no issue as to whether or not the deed was made to hinder, delay, or defraud the creditors of Frank Traverso, generally.

The judgment is against law, because it is against the admissions of the pleadings. The court did not err in excluding the evidence offered by plaintiff as to the assessment and payment of taxes on the property. Plaintiff was not entitled to offer the assessment for the purpose of proving value; it was inadmissible for such a purpose. Before the making of the deed from Frank, and ever since 1879, the plaintiff was the owner, as a tenant in common, of the undivided one-half of the property, in the actual possession of the whole, and living on it with his family. It was therefore not improperly assessed to him, and it was his duty to pay the taxes on it. The fact that it was so assessed, and that he paid the taxes thereon, did not, therefore, tend to prove the bona fides of the deed from Frank to him. Judgment and order reversed, and cause remanded.

I concur in the judgment: WORKS, J.

CASE v. MANUFACTURERS' FIRE & MARINE INS. CO. (No. 11,652.)

INSURANCE—AMOUNT OF LOSS.

1. A clause in a policy that, "in case of differences touching any loss or damage after proof thereof has been received in due form, the matter shall, at the written request of either party, be submitted to impartial appraisers, whose award in writing shall be binding on the parties," not providing for the number of appraisers or the mode of their selection, is too vague to give the company a right to demand arbitration, and the insured's refusal of such demand does not deprive him of the right to sue on the policy, or to prove the full amount of his loss, even though it is more than stated by him in the proofs.

2. In an action on an insurance policy, it appeared by plaintiff's calculation that his loss amounted to more than $4,000. One of his witnesses placed the loss at $3,000. Plaintiff's clerk testified that he usually had a stock worth $5,000; and another witness testified that three weeks before the fire it was worth $5,000, but that during that time large amounts of goods had been sold, and little purchased. Witnesses for defendant put the value of the stock at much less than $4,000. Held, that a finding of $4,000 loss was supported by the evidence.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. F. SULLIVAN, Judge.

Action on insurance policy by George A. Case against the Manufacturers' Fire & Marine Insurance Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. For former report, see 21 Pac. Rep. 843.

Wright & McCormac and T. Z. Blakeman, for appellant. Haggin, Van Ness & Dibble, for respondent.

BEATTY, C. J. The order denying defendant's motion for a new trial in this case was reversed by a decision of department 1, (21 Pac. Rep. 843,) on the sole ground that the finding as to the amount of respondent's loss was contrary to the evidence. A rehearing having been granted we are satisfied, after reargument and reexamination of the record, that we misconstrued the testimony of the witness Pam, and were led to an erroneous conclusion as to the effect of it by failing to add to the invoice price of the goods purchased the whole amount of the freight, $893. This was necessary in order to obtain a proper basis for the computation as to the value of the goods destroyed. Making this correction, the computation shows that the goods destroyed were worth a little in excess of $4,000, and so there is evidence sufficient to support the verdict. As to other points involved in the appeal we adopt the opinion of the department. Judgment and order are affirmed.

GREGORY v. KEATING et al. (No. 12,472.)

MORTGAGES—FORECLOSURE—MODIFICATION OF JUDGMENT.

Where a defendant in a mortgage foreclosure claims an interest in the property adverse and superior to that of the mortgagee, and the findings by the trial court do not determine such claim, the judgment, which bars only the right, title, and equity of redemption of such defendant, will be modified so as to preserve, unaffected and unprejudiced, the adverse right so claimed.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; E. B. MAHON, Judge.

Action by James B. Gregory against Denis Keating and Mary Jane Keating to foreclose three mortgages executed by said Denis Keating to plaintiff. Defendant Mary Jane Keating claimed an adverse and paramount title to the buildings on the mortgaged premises. Plaintiff obtained a judgment, and defendants appealed.

Mich. Mullany, for appellants. A. H. Laughborough, (Carter P. Pomeroy, of counsel,) for respondent.

THORNTON, J. In this case the judgment forecloses the mortgages executed to plaintiff, and subjects to sale the right, title, and interest of the mortgagor, Denis Keating, in the mortgaged premises. It forecloses and bars only the right, title, and equity of redemption of defendant Mary Keating as to such possession. It does not purport to affect in any way her prior adverse right to the buildings on the premises, if she has any. Nor do we see in the findings of facts anything determinative of the claimed adverse right of Mary Keating. The facts found as to her only bear on her right to remove the buildings from the land involved in the suit under the terms of the lease. On the return to the court below, that court is directed to modify the judgment so as to preserve the adverse right to the buildings set up by her, unaffected and unprejudiced by the judgment. On the making of such modification of the judgment, the judgment and order will stand affirmed.

In bank. On rehearing. For hearing in department 2, see supra.

PER CURIAM. Appellants, in their petition for rehearing, complain that the court has not noticed their contention that the findings of the superior court are unsupported by the evidence. The point was not overlooked, although not expressly adverted to. We think that the evidence was sufficient to sustain all the findings of the superior court. Rehearing denied.

MCLAIN v. BAKER. (No. 13,231.)

WEIGHT AND SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

In an action to recover for money had and received, and for services rendered, plaintiff testified that he had deposited $220 with defendant, who had returned $165, and had rendered services to defendant reasonably worth $480; in which he was corroborated by other witnesses. Defendant controverted plaintiff's evidence by testimony that he had received but $124.50, had expended for and returned to plaintiff $385, and that plaintiff's services were agreed upon at a much less sum than plaintiff claimed; and there was only the conflicting testimony of the parties as to an alleged prior settlement between them. Held, that the evidence was sufficient to sustain a finding in favor of plaintiff for $535.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county; HENRY M. WILLIS, Judge.

Paris, Goodcell & Fox, for appellant. Rowell & Rowell, for respondent.

GIBSON, C. This action was to recover of the defendant the sum of $220 received from and to the use of plaintiff, and for services rendered by plaintiff to defendant at his request from about May, 1886, to on or about September 20, 1887, for which defendant agreed to pay the reasonable worth of such services, which were alleged to be reasonably worth the sum of $30 per month. Defendant, by his answer, denied that he received from plaintiff any greater sum than $124.50, and that the plaintiff rendered him any services other than from April 20, 1887, to October 20, 1887, which he avers were at the agreed price of $15 per month. And as an affirmative defense, that he (defendant) expended for the use of plaintiff, at his request, from December, 1885, to October, 1887, the sum of $437; that at plaintiff's request he boarded and pastured three horses for plaintiff, for different periods, which board and pasture were reasonably worth $170; that through the negligence of plaintiff he (plaintiff) lost a horse worth $50, loaned to him by defendant, for which he agreed to pay the latter sum; that he (defendant) furnished a hayrack to plaintiff, and rendered certain services to him, at his request, reasonably worth $45. The action was tried without a jury, and the court found that defendant received $220 which belonged to plaintiff, and returned only the sum of $165 thereof; that during the years 1886 and 1887 the plaintiff, at request of defendant, performed labor for defendant, for a period of 16 months, reasonably worth $30 per month, amounting in all to the sum of $480; and that all other accounts and demands existing between the parties and set forth in defendant's answer were fully settled by them prior to the commencement of this action. Judgment was accordingly entered in favor of plaintiff for the sum of $535 and $130.10 costs. From the judgment and an order denying a new trial comes this appeal.

The only question raised by the appellant is that the findings are not sustained by the evidence; or, in other words, that they are against the weight of evidence. As was said in Spring Val. Water-Works v. San Mateo Water-Works, 64 Cal. 123, "In this court it is incumbent upon the appellant, on such a contention, to show that in the evidence upon which the findings are based there was no substantial conflict, and that the facts and the inferences deducible from them, as found by the court, were contrary to the evidence." In the present case the appellant has not attempted to show that no substantial conflict existed in the evidence upon which the findings complained of are based; nor that the facts and inferences deducible therefrom, as found by the court, are contrary to the evidence. But the record shows that such a conflict exists, and does not show that any of the facts found are contrary to the evidence. Regarding the sum of $220 claimed by the plaintiff, he testified that in May, 1886, early one morning, while suffering from a sudden illness, which he thought might prove fatal, and when no one else but himself and defendant were present, he gave the defendant two packages of money, containing $100 each, $25 in gold, and a handful of silver. He heard the defendant, in counting all but the silver, make $190 of it. And further on he said defendant counted $220 in all. Defendant testifies that he received but $124.50. Poole, who was called for defendant, testified that he did not see Baker take the money from plaintiff, and that all he knew about the amount was from what Baker showed him, viz., one package of $120, and $5 in silver. Thus it appears that upon this point there is a decided conflict in the testimony of the parties. The testimony of Poole was of little value, as he was not present when the transaction occurred, and only knew what the defendant exhibited to him afterwards; and it was for the trial court to say whether it added sufficient weight to that of defendant to overcome the testimony of plaintiff. A similar conflict of testimony exists as to the amount returned by the defendant to plaintiff. The latter said he received $50, with which to go to San Diego, and on his return he gave $10 back to defendant; that he received $50 for a pair of colts he sold, which presumably belonged to the defendant, and at another time received about $75, making $165 in all, as found by the court, while the defendant says he gave him $220 additional. So it is with regard to the services, and the value thereof. The plaintiff says he was employed by defendant, and worked for him for 16 months; that nothing was said as to the rate of compensation, but he expected $30 per month; and there is abundant testimony to show that such services as he rendered were reasonably worth $30 per month. Defendant's evidence tends to show that plaintiff worked for less than that period for the agreed price of $15 per month, and that his services were not reasonably worth more. As to the affirmative matter set up in defendant's answer, found by the court to have been settled before the commencement of the suit, there is but the conflicting testimony of the parties. The defendant denies that the items thus claimed by him were included in the settlement, while the plaintiff says: "I heard some of the testimony of defendant Baker, about a settlement we had at the time I quit work,—a portion of it; not all. I sold Baker some horses at that time,—three head of horses,—a cow and a yearling, a buckboard, a wagon and a harness, that he sold before he went out there. I put the whole thing together, and told him I would take two hundred dollars for the whole thing, and call it a trade. I told him that did not include everything,—not my services and the two hundred and twenty dollars. I started to take my things off, and he said: 'Hold on. We will call it a trade, if you say so.' 'All right, I will give it.' The trade was for two hundred dollars for that stuff, and to pay my expenses there, and did not include my services there or the money. That don't look reasonable." It therefore clearly appears that there was evidence enough to sustain the findings, and that there was such a conflict in the evidence upon which the findings are based that, under numerous decisions of this court, among which Mallett v. Swain, 56 Cal. 171; Stockman v. Irrigating Co., 64 Cal. 57,—may be cited, they cannot be disturbed; and the judgment and order appealed from, therefore, ought to be affirmed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; HAYNE, C.

CARTER v. MULREIN et al. (No. 12,203.)

INJUNCTION—BOND—SURETIES.

Where an order is made that an injunction issue on the filing of a bond, and the bond recites that it is given in consideration that the said writ of injunction may issue, but the injunction is issued and served before bond is given, the sureties on the bond are not liable.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; WALTER H. LEVY, Judge.

Action by Charles H. Carter against David Mulrein and others to recover damages for a breach of an injunction bond. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial, defendants Alpers and Westphal appeal.

Langhorne & Miller, for appellants. Wm. T. Baggett and J. M. Lesser, for respondent.

MCFARLAND, J. This is an action on an injunction bond alleged to have been executed by the defendant Mulrein as principal and the other defendants as sureties, in a certain action in the superior court on which the said Mulrien was plaintiff, and I. S. Kalloch and Carter, the plaintiff herein, and others, were defendants. Judgment in the case at bar went for plaintiff, and the defendants Alpers and Westphal, two of the sureties on the bond, appeal from the judgment, and from an order denying a new trial.

The first point made by appellants is that the complaint does not state a cause of action; that point having been made, also, in the court below, on an objection by defendants to the admission of any evidence on the part of plaintiff. And we see no escape from holding that the point is well taken. It fully appears from the complaint, and is admitted on the argument, that in the said case of Mulrein v. Kalloch et al., an order was signed by the judge of the court on March 3, 1881, and filed March 4, 1881, that an injunction issue "on the filing by plaintiff of a joint and several undertaking to the defendants in the sum of $7,500, with two sufficient sureties;" that on said March 4th a writ of injunction was issued and served; that said writ was the only writ of injunction ever issued in said action; that all the alleged damage to plaintiff was caused by his obedience to that writ; and that the bond sued on in the case at bar was not executed until March 12, 1881, eight days after the issuance and service of said writ. The bond recites that, "whereas the above-entitled court has made an order that upon the filing by the above-named plaintiff of an undertaking in the sum of $7,500, with two sufficient sureties, a writ of injunction issue: * * * now, therefore, in consideration of the premises, and that said writ of injunction may issue, we" undertake, etc. No writ issued after the filing of the undertaking. It is well settled that sureties on statutory bonds, having no personal interest in the litigation, can stand upon the express terms of their undertaking, and cannot have their liability forced beyond those terms. "A surety has a right to stand on the precise terms of his contract. * * * He can be held to no other or different contract." People v. Buster, 11 Cal. 220. "His liability arises under his contract merely, and is limited by its terms and conditions." McDonald v. Fett, 49 Cal. 355. "If there is any principle of law well settled, it is that the liability of sureties is not to be extended beyond the terms of their contract. To the extent, and in the manner, and under the circumstances pointed out in their obligation, they are bound, and no further. They are entitled to stand on its precise terms." Pierce v. Whiting, 63 Cal. 543. In the bond sued on in this case there is no undertaking by the sureties to protect against the injunction which had been issued on March 4th. It referred entirely to a writ of injunction which might issue, by virtue of the undertaking, upon or after its filing; and no such writ ever issued. No doubt the defendant in that case (plaintiff in this) relied upon that undertaking; but we cannot wrest settled principles of law from their foundations in order to condone the carelessness of parties who fail to look after their rights at the proper time. If the defendants in the injunction suit had paid the slightest attention to their interest when the bond sued on was filed, they would have discovered that it afforded no protection against the writ which had for several days been issued and served, and that said writ was invalid, unless, indeed, we must presume that some other bond had been filed before the writ issued. Whether the real facts are different from those averred, and whether plaintiff could better his case by amending his complaint, these are matters of which we have no knowledge. Judgment and order reversed.

CRIMINAL LAW—POSTPONEMENT OF TRIAL.

1. Where a trial is commenced within 60 days after information is filed, but after the evidence is in, a juror becomes disabled from attending court and the jury is discharged, defendant has been brought to trial within Pen. Code Cal. § 1382, providing that the court must order the prosecution to be dismissed unless defendant is brought to trial within 60 days after the filing of the information.

2. Where a case has been continued for more than 60 days in violation of Pen. Code Cal. § 1382, the objection is not available, on a motion to dismiss, until the 60 days have expired, as a trial may be had within the 60 days.

In bank. Application for habeas corpus. C. V. Scanlan, for petitioner.

BEATTY, C. J. The petition shows that the petitioner has been accused of robbery by information filed October 12, 1889. October 27th he was put upon trial. After the evidence was all in, a juror was by accident disabled from attending court, and the jury was necessarily discharged. Petitioner thereupon demanded an immediate trial, but the superior court continued the further hearing of the case to February 4, 1890. December 14, 1889, petitioner moved the superior court to dismiss the information, and discharge him from custody, on the ground that he had not been brought to trial within 60 days after information filed. His motion was denied, and hence this petition.

Section 1382 of the Penal Code is relied upon. It is as follows: "The court, unless good cause to the contrary is shown, must order the prosecution to be dismissed in the following cases: (1) When a person has been held to answer for a public offense, if an indictment is not found or an information filed against him within thirty days thereafter; (2) If a defendant, whose trial has not been postponed upon his application, is not brought to trial within sixty days after the finding of the indictment or filing of the information." The case made by the petition is not within the section. Petitioner was brought to trial within 60 days. There was a mistrial, and the case was necessarily continued.

Conceding that the court had no power to continue it for more than 60 days without petitioner's consent, that period has not expired. Non constat that another trial may not be had before the expiration of 60 days, notwithstanding the order for continuance. This is a sufficient reason for denying the writ, irrespective of other questions, as to which we refrain from expressing any opinion in the present stage of the case. Writ denied.

King v. Ponton. (No. 13,257.)

Will Contests—Findings.

In a proceeding to probate a will it was stipulated by the parties that, according to the finding of the issues by the jury, the form of their verdict should be: "We, the jury, find for the contestant, K.," or "for the petitioner, P." The stipulation was not in writing, nor was it entered on the minutes, nor were special findings waived in any other manner. The verdict was for contestant, and an entry thereof was made in the minutes, in the presence of the petitioner and his counsel, without any objection thereto. Held, that the absence of any findings of fact was an irregularity which, as it did not affect the substantial rights of the parties, could be disregarded, within Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 475.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; M. K. Harris, Judge.

The petition of Thomas Ponton for the probate of the will of James McCalman, deceased, was opposed by E. J. King, as public administrator. From a judgment denying admission of the will to probate, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, petitioner appeals.

T. P. Ryan, Wharton & Shorb, and Goucher & Geis, for appellant. Sayle & Coldwell and W. D. Tupper, for respondent.

Sharpstein, J. Appellant presented to the superior court of the county of Fresno, sitting in probate, an instrument which he alleged to be an holographic will—the last will and testament—of John McCalman, who died in said county on or about the 16th day of July, 1888. Appellant was named in said alleged will as sole executor; and he prayed that said alleged will be admitted to probate, and that letters testamentary therein be issued to him. At the time appointed for hearing said application, respondent appeared to contest said will, and filed written grounds of opposition to the probate thereof; to which appellant filed an answer traversing the objections. Thereupon the contest came regularly on trial before the court and a jury of 12 men, who were duly sworn to try said cause. An instrument which appellant offered to prove as the last will and testament of John McCalman was read in evidence. It is written on one side of one sheet of writing paper, of foolscap size, and is not signed at the foot or end in any manner, but said sheet of paper is torn at the lower end thereof, and that part usually occupied by the signature is torn away, and not produced. That part which is torn away, and not produced, is described as follows. "Commencing at the right-hand edge of said sheet of paper, about two and one-half inches from the lower edge thereof, and less than one inch below the last line of said instrument, and extending thence, towards the left-hand corner, and reaching the lower edge of said sheet, about one and one-half inches to the right of the lower left-hand corner. The torn edge is slightly circular towards the left and bottom of the sheet, from a point about the middle thereof. There appears just above the torn edge, and about three inches to the right-hand side, a pen-mark in ink, almost circular, with the open side down, and resting in the torn edge." It was admitted by the contestant before the court, and in the presence of the jury, that the paper instrument in evidence as the last will and testament of John McCalman was executed and signed by him, and that he had sufficient reason for devising his property to the parties named in the will, and that the reason was strong enough to induce him to do that. By that admission all the issues were eliminated from the contest except one, viz., whether "the said John McCalman did before his death tear, cancel, and destroy his signature from said instrument, with the intent and for the purpose of revoking the same as a will." Respondent insists that the evidence shows that he did, and appellant that he did not. The evidence shows that decedent, after writing and subscribing his name to the instrument alleged to be his last will and testament, put it into a valise, and said to appellant, who is named as executor in said instrument: "Ponton, if ever you require this paper, you will know where to find it." The valise was one in which he left his papers; and after his death said will was found therein, minus the signature. After his death the valise was found in decedent's bedroom, in his own house. "Anybody could have had access to the house or valise at nearly all times." It is therefore quite possible that some person other than decedent tore his signature from the will. The evidence that decedent did it with intent to revoke the will consists of statements made by him during his last illness. In a conversation between him and appellant, decedent said: "Ponton, I don't know what's going to come of this thing. I believe I ought to do something about a will." To which appellant replied: "Why, Mac, you made a will long ago." He said: "That is destroyed." The next day decedent said to appellant and Mrs. Thomas: "Now, I have got my will all planned." To a witness (Curtis) he said: "I destroyed that will, Curtis, and I think I had better fix up my affairs. I don't know what is coming of this." At the time of saying this "he was very sick, and very weak. He was laboring under such weakness and pain that he was really not himself." As to the mental condition of deceased at the times when these circumstances occurred, the evidence is somewhat conflicting, and we could not disturb a finding that he was sound of mind.

Although a jury was impaneled to try the issues, no special issues were framed and submitted to them, and no special verdict was returned by them. But the record shows: That "it was stipulated and agreed by and between the parties in the presence of the court, and during the trial, and after the jury had been instructed upon the law and upon such stipulation and agreement, it was by the court ordered that, if the jury should find the issue in said contest for the said contestant, then they might and should return their verdict in the following words: 'We, the jury, find for the contestant, E. J. King;' and that, if said jury should find said issue for the petitioner, then their verdict might and should be returned by them in the following words: 'We, the jury, find for the petitioner, Thomas Ponton.'" But said stipulation and agreement was not made in writing, nor was the same entered on the minutes, nor were special findings by the jury waived in any other manner than as appears in this statement or motion for a new trial. That thereupon the jury retired, and after deliberation returned into court on said 2d day of October, 1888, and gave the following verdict: "'We, the jury, find for the contestant, E. J. King. October the 2nd, 1888. D. D. Hudson, Foreman.' Said verdict was then and there received by the court, and an entry thereof made by the clerk in the minutes of the court, as the law requires, all in the presence of said petitioner, and in the presence of his attorneys, without any objection being made by said petitioner or his attorneys to said verdict, or to the form thereof, or to the reception and entry of the same, unless said objection be implied from the silence of said petitioner and his attorneys. That there were and are no findings of fact upon the issues joined herein, made and filed by the court, nor were said findings waived by the proponent herein. That thereafter, and in the absence of such findings, the following judgment was made, entered, and filed by the court." This was an irregularity which we hope may never be repeated; but it did not in this case, we think, affect the substantial rights of the parties, and therefore must be disregarded. Code Civil Proc. 475. Judgment affirmed.

MOONEY v. DETRICK. (No. 12,551.)

INSOLVENCY—DISCHARGE.

A discharge in insolvency is not a bar to an action on a contract for hiring for a certain length of time, for money which became due thereon after defendants were declared insolvent, as under Insolvency Act Cal. 1880, c. 87, § 42, only such sums as were due at the time they were declared insolvent could be proved, and would be affected by the discharge.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; T. K. WILSON, Judge.

Action by John H. Mooney against E. Detrick and J. H. Nicholson. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant Detrick appeals.

Kellogg & King, for appellant. Dorn & Dorn, for respondent.

SHARPSTEIN, J. This action is for the recovery of money alleged to be due plaintiff from defendants under a contract between them, to the following effect: Plaintiff having sold and assigned a patent-right to defendants, in consideration thereof promised to serve said defendants in and about their business for the term of five years from the 1st day of January, 1881; and the defendants agreed to employ the plaintiff during said entire period of five years, and to pay him for every day of his employment, during said entire period, (Sundays and holidays excepted,) the sum of four and one-half dollars. Pursuant to the terms of said agreement, defendants employed plaintiff in and about their business constantly, and paid him in full therefor, until the 1st day of March, 1884. Since March 1, 1884, defendants have failed and refused to give plaintiff employment, except for the space of 166 days, and refused to pay plaintiff anything more than $664 under said contract. Judgment was entered in favor of plaintiff, and against the defendants, for the sum of $1,333.40, interest and costs. Defendant's motion for a new trial was overruled, and from that order and the judgment this appeal is taken by defendant, Detrick. The defendants in their answer allege that as a firm and individually they and each of them were on the 14th of July, 1884, discharged of and from all debts, liabilities, and claims whatever, except such as were by the insolvent laws excepted from its operation, and that the claim sued on in this action is not one of the claims so excepted. The petition of the defendants as a firm and as individuals was filed on the 28th day of February, 1884, and the plaintiff's cause of action, if any, has accrued since that date. The discharge, and proceedings leading up to it, are well pleaded, and the allegations of the defendants in relation thereto are admitted by the plaintiff to be true. The plaintiff presented his claim against the defendants to the assignee in insolvency, and he refused to allow it; whereupon plaintiff applied to the court in which the insolvency proceedings were pending for leave to sue the assignee, but such application was denied. The demand sued on in this action was not set forth in the schedule of claims, debts, liabilities, and demands filed by the defendants or either of them in the insolvency proceedings, and was not, and, we think, could not have been, proved therein. When the defendants were adjudged to be insolvent there was nothing due from them, or either of them, to the plaintiff under their contract with him. Had anything then been due from defendants to plaintiff, he might have proved his claim for the amount, and no more. Insolvent Act 1880, c. 87, § 42. The certificate of discharge is only a bar to debts and demands which were or might have been proved, but not as against personal covenants which were not provable. If a demand is not provable, it is not barred by the certificate. This is the just and settled rule. Murray v. De

Civil Code Cal. § 3005 provides that a sale by the pledgee of property must be made by public auction, "upon the notice to the public usual at the place of sale, in respect to auction sales of similar property, and must be for the highest obtainable price." Held that, though a chattel mortgage waives demand for payment, and notice to mortgagor of time and place of sale, and stipulates that the mortgagee may become the purchaser, a sale under it is invalid as against a junior mortgage, where the mortgagee purchases the property for $1,000, when it is worth $5,000, and on a notice of the sale for only two days, when the usual notice was not less than five days.

WORKS, J. The Crystal Ice Company executed a chattel mortgage to one Wainwright to secure the payment of a promissory note, and a subsequent mortgage, on the same property, for a like purpose, to the respondent. The mortgage to Wainwright contained the following clause: "And in case default shall be made in the payment of said note or of the interest thereon when due, or any part thereof, according to its terms, or in case default be made in the performance of any of the covenants thereof, then the said mortgagee is hereby empowered to proceed to sell the above mortgaged property, either by proceedings of foreclosure, as provided by the Code of Civil Procedure, or by a sale of the mortgaged property, and proceedings had and taken as in case of pledges without any previous demand for the performance or notice of time and place of sale; the said mortgagor having waived demand and notice, and at any such sale the mortgagee may become the purchaser, if he so desire, either directly or indirectly." Default was made in the payment of the note, and Wainwright, acting under the authority above quoted, sold the property; and after several transfers the same was purchased by the appellant Pauson. The respondent brought this action against the ice company and Pauson to foreclose his junior mortgage. The ice company made default. There was a trial as to the defendant Pauson, and judgment rendered foreclosing the mortgage as against him. He moved for a new trial, which was denied; and he appeals.

The only question worthy of consideration presented on this appeal is as to the validity of the sale by Wainwright under his mortgage. The Code provides: "The sale by a pledgee of property pledged must be made by public auction, in the manner and upon the notice to the public usual at the place of sale, in respect to auction sales of similar property; and must be for the highest obtainable price." Civil Code, § 3005. There are other sections, requiring that the pledgee demand performance from the debtor, if he can be found, and that he give such pledgeor actual notice of the time and place at which the property pledged will be sold, at such reasonable time before the sale as will enable the pledgeor to attend. Id. §§ 3001, 3002. But these last requirements may be waived by the pledgeor. Id. §§ 3003, 3004. It will be observed that by the clause in the mortgage above set out the property might be sold as provided by the sections above quoted, except that a demand of performance and notice to the pledgor were waived, and it was provided that the pledgee might become the purchaser at the sale. Therefore, the question is whether the statutory requirements not waived were so far complied with as to render the sale valid as against a junior mortgagee. The court below found against the appellant on this point. The finding is as follows: "That said sale was made at San Francisco on October 24, 1884, but the same was not made or conducted in the manner prescribed by law for the sale of pledged property at public auction, nor in the manner, nor upon the notice to the public, usual at said city and county of San Francisco, the place of sale of similar property, nor for the highest obtainable price." It is claimed by the appellant that this finding was not sustained by the evidence. The requirements of the statute, that the sale must be made "in the manner and upon the notice to the public usual at the place of sale, in respect to auction sales of similar property, and must be for the highest obtainable price," were not waived. It appears from the evidence that the property was of such a kind that but few persons would be likely to want to purchase it, and that it was of the value of from $5,000 to $6,000. The notice given was for two days, and did not show that the property was to be sold for the satisfaction of the Wainwright mortgage, or any other mortgage. There was nothing in the notice to call to the attention of the respondent, who was an interested party, or to any one else, that the property to be sold was the property covered by these mortgages, except the description of the property. The property was bought in by the mortgagee at $1,000, which was not more, and was probably less, than one-fifth of its actual value. The evidence showed, beyond controversy, that the notice, as to time, was not such as was "usual at the place of sale in respect to auction sales of similar property." The undisputed evidence was that notices of such sales were never for less than 5 days, and the great weight of the evidence was that the usual notices of like sales were from 10 to 20 days. We think that the finding that this sale was not made in conformity to the statute was sustained by the evidence, and that the judgment was right. Judgment and order affirmed.

BIENENFELD v. FRESNO MILLING CO.

(No. 13,378.)

APPEAL—JURISDICTIONAL AMOUNT.

Under Const. Cal. art. 6, § 4, which confers on the supreme court appellate jurisdiction in cases at law in which the demand, exclusive of interest, or the value of the property in controversy, amounts to $300, the supreme court will dismiss an appeal from a judgment of the superior court dismissing a writ of certiorari, and affirming a judgment of a justice's court in defendant's favor for $106.65, costs, though counsel fail to raise the point of jurisdiction on the argument of the case.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; J. B. CAMPBELL, Judge.

Trover brought in justice's court by Bernard Bienenfeld against the Fresno Milling Company. There was a verdict for defendant, and the justice rendered a judgment for $106.65, costs, in its favor. Plaintiff obtained a writ of certiorari from the superior court. From a judgment dismissing the writ, and affirming the justice's judgment, he appeals.

Meux & Edwards, for appellant. Oliver Wolcott, (T. P. Ryan, of counsel,) for respondent.

SHARPSTEIN, J. This is an appeal from a judgment and order of the superior court of Fresno county, dismissing a writ of certiorari and affirming a judgment of a justice's court in the above-entitled action. The judgment of the justices' court is in favor of the defendant and against the plaintiff for the sum of $106.65, costs incurred by defendant in said action, in which there was a verdict and judgment in his favor. We think the appellate jurisdiction of this court does not extend to such a case. This court has "appellate jurisdiction in all cases in equity, except such as arise in justice's courts; also in all cases at law which involve the title or possession of real estate, or the legality of any tax, impost, assessment, toll, or municipal fine, or in which the demand, exclusive of interest, or the value of the property in controversy, amounts to $300; also in cases of forcible entry and detainer, and in proceedings in insolvency, and in actions to prevent or abate a nuisance, and in all such probate matters as may be provided by law; also in all criminal cases prosecuted by indictment or information in a court of record on questions of law alone." Const. art. 6, § 4. This case does not appear to be within the appellate jurisdiction of this court, as defined by the constitution. Therefore we cannot entertain jurisdiction of it. If there had been an appeal from the justice's to the superior court, we are confident that no appeal from the judgment of the latter to this court would have been attempted. Our appellate jurisdiction is the same in both cases. Not having jurisdiction of the appeal we must dismiss it. The only embarrassment we experience in arriving at this determination is caused by the omission of respondent to raise the point. But we cannot proceed further in a case after discovering that we have no jurisdiction, whether the point is raised by counsel or not. Appeal dismissed.

In re MILLER. (No. 20,606.)

HABEAS CORPUS—MISDEMEANORS—JURY TRIAL—PUNISHMENT.

1. The denial of a jury on a trial for a misdemeanor does not affect the jurisdiction of the court, and is an error which cannot be reached by habeas corpus.

2. Under Pen. Code Cal. §§ 1446, 1456, a justice of the peace may, on conviction for a misdemeanor, impose in the alternative a sentence of imprisonment in the county jail, in case the fine assessed is not paid, though the ordinance under which the prosecution was instituted does not provide for such imprisonment.

In bank. On petition for habeas corpus.

The petitioner, J. H. Miller, was tried and convicted on the 2d day of September, 1889, in the justice's court of Yuba township, Sutter county, Cal., for the violation of a certain ordinance declaring it to be a misdemeanor to sell, or engage in selling, any malt, spirituous, or vinous liquors without first obtaining a license therefor, and providing as a punishment for the violation of said ordinance, that any person who should carry on, or attempt to carry on, any kind of business specified in said ordinance without first having taken out the necessary license therefor, should be guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction by any court having jurisdiction thereof, should be punished by a fine not exceeding $500, and not less than $25, or by imprisonment in the county jail not exceeding six months, or by both such fine and imprisonment. Under this ordinance the prisoner was arrested and taken before a justice of the peace, and tried and convicted. At the trial of the cause the prisoner demanded that he should be tried by a jury. This demand being refused, the prisoner was tried by the justice of the peace, without the intervention of a jury, was found guilty, and was sentenced to pay a fine of $100, or, in default thereof, to serve 100 days in the county jail of said county. Pen. Code Cal. § 1446, provides: "A judgment that the defendant pay a fine may also direct that he be imprisoned until the fine be satisfied, in the proportion of one day's imprisonment for every dollar of the fine." Section 1456 provides: "When a judgment is entered imposing a fine, or ordering the defendant to be imprisoned until the fine is paid, he must be held in custody during the time specified in the judgment, unless the fine is sooner paid."

M. C. Barney and A. L. Hart, for petitioner. Geo. A. Johnson, Atty. Gen., and W. T. Phipps, for respondent.

WORKS, J. This is an application for a writ of habeas corpus. The principal ground of the application is that the petitioner, upon a trial for a violation of an ordinance of the board of supervisors of Sutter county, was by the justice's court denied a jury, and, upon a trial by the justice, convicted and fined $100. The offense charged was not a felony, and a jury might have been waived. The return of the officer to the alternative writ shows a valid commitment by a court having jurisdiction of the subject-matter and of the party. If a jury trial was denied, it was a mere error, which could not be reached by a writ of habeas corpus. Ex parte McCullough, 35 Cal. 97; 4 Crim. Law Mag. 798 et seq; Ex parte Brandon, 49 Ark. 143, 4 S. W. Rep. 452; Turney v. Barr, 75 Iowa, 758, 38 N. W. Rep. 550; Zelle v. McHenry, 51 Iowa, 572, 2 N. W. Rep. 264; Kelly v. People, 115 Ill. 583, 4 N. E. Rep. 644.

It is further contended that the judgment of the justice's court was void, because it provided for the alternative of imprisonment in the county jail in case the fine assessed was not paid. This is placed on the ground that the ordinance under which the petitioner was prosecuted did no provide for such imprisonment. But the offense for which the petitioner was convicted was a misdemeanor, and the Code provides for such imprisonment as a means of enforcing the fine. Pen. Code, §§ 1446, 1456; Ex parte Ellis, 54 Cal. 204; Ex parte Chin Yan, 60 Cal. 78; Ex parte Baldwin, Id. 432. The judgment was in proper form and valid. Writ denied and prisoner remanded to the custody of the sheriff of Sutter county.

MILLS v. DEARBORN. (No. 12,534.)

MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL—STATEMENT.

1. Code Civil Proc. Cal. §§ 659, 660, provide that the application for a new trial shall be heard at the earliest practicable period after the bill of exceptions or statement is filed, and that the statement must be filed with the clerk. Held, that the clerk's certificate, showing that the statement was not filed before the motion for a new trial was submitted, is conclusive in the appellate court, appellant's affidavit to the contrary notwithstanding.

2. Respondent is not estopped from denying that the statement was filed by a stipulation made by him before the time for filing that it had been served in time, and was correct, and might be presented to the court for settlement without further notice.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Mateo county; E. F. HEAD, Judge.

George H. Buck and George H. Filkins, for appellant. George C. Ross, for respondent.

WORKS, J. The questions attempted to be presented in this case depend upon a statement of the case, which appears in the record. It is contended by the respondent that the statement should be stricken out, and must be disregarded by this court, because it was not filed in the court below at the time the motion for a new trial was submitted and denied. The motion for a new trial was submitted December 10, 1887. There is no indorsement of filing on the statement as it is copied into the record, nor is there any evidence of any kind that it was then on file, or that it was before the court, or made the basis of the motion. The certificate of the clerk, at the close of the transcript, after certifying to copies of papers constituting the judgment roll, recites: "And I further certify that the foregoing printed transcript, beginning at folio one (1) and ending at folio three hundred and seventy-three, (373,) excepting, however, and excluding, the map attached to page 35 of said transcript, is a correct copy of a document filed in said court on the 10th day of February, 1888. And I further certify that the map attached to page 35 of said transcript is a true copy of said map received by me and attached on the 13th day of February, 1888." The "document" referred to is the entire transcript, commencing with the complaint and ending with the notice of appeal. If this can be construed to be a certificate of the filing of the statement, it shows that it was not filed until two months after the motion for a new trial was passed upon. In addition to this, another certificate of the clerk is filed in support of the motion to strike out the statement which appears in the transcript, which certificate recites: "I have carefully examined all entries made in the Register of Actions of said superior court in the case of D. O. Mills, plaintiff, vs. Lydia Dearborn et al., defendants, No. 720, and all of the original papers in said action, and that there is no entry in said Register of Actions of any 'statement on motion for a new trial' having been filed in said action between April 4, 1887, and February 10, 1888, and that no paper whatever indorsed or entitled, or purporting to be, a statement on motion for a new trial in said action, is contained among said original papers, other than a document which is not entitled or named on the back thereof, but which consists of numerous papers attached together, and on the back of the whole thereof marked, 'Filed February 10, 1888,' and among which said papers so filed is one entitled on the face thereof, 'Statement on Motion for a New Trial.'" The attorney for appellant makes affidavit that he left the statement with the clerk for filing; and this is corroborated by another witness, but it is most positively denied in the affidavit made by the clerk, in which he says: "That deponent never saw such a statement on the 10th day of December, 1887, or at any other time; that he never had any information or notice whatever that said Buck desired any such statement filed in said court or matter; that no statement on motion for a new trial in said action was ever filed, or presented to deponent to be filed, in the superior court of said county of San Mateo; that on the 10th day of February, 1888, said Buck did come to the office of deponent, and then and there had a conversation with deponent, and applied to, and requested of, deponent, as such county clerk, to certify to the correctness of the printed transcript now on file herein; that deponent examined said transcript, and then stated to said Buck that he could not truthfully certify to its correctness, as no statement on motion for a new trial had ever been filed in said cause, and declined to so certify; that said Buck thereupon produced and exhibited to deponent a document of which the entire printed transcript herein, excepting the map at page 35, is a copy, and then and there requested deponent to file the same, and to date the filing thereon 'December 10, 1887,' but that said deponent refused to so file and date said filing, as the same would not be a true indorsement thereon; that the character or description or name of said document was not indorsed upon the same when so presented to deponent, nor is it now indorsed; that in such conversation said Buck stated that he had had all the papers comprising said document at San Francisco, and had there given the same to a printer, for the purpose of having the transcript in said cause printed, and that the map was still in San Francisco, but that he (Buck) would get it, and have it attached to said document; that upon the refusal of deponent to certify to the said transcript being correct, and deponent declining to file said document, and date the filing thereof December 10, 1887, said Buck stated that he would apply to the judge of said superior court for an order directing said document to be filed nunc pro tunc as of December 10, 1887; and that said Buck did thereafter, in the presence of deponent, apply to and request the judge of said court to make such an order, but that said judge refused to do so; and that said Buck then requested deponent to file said document as of and on said 10th day of February, 1888; and that deponent did thereupon so file it, and thereafter, and on the 13th day of February, 1888, said Buck brought said map, as he stated, from San Francisco, to deponent, and requested deponent to attach said map to said document; and that deponent did thereupon pin said map to one of the sheets of said document; and that said document, in the condition it was presented to deponent on the 10th day of February, 1888, with the indorsement thereon, is now on file in the office of the clerk of said superior court, with said map still attached with a pin thereto; that said Buck at no time, during the conversation with deponent hereinbefore mentioned, said, asserted, or contended that he had ever prior to said day, or on said 10th day of December, 1887, presented to or left with deponent, or in his office, any statement on motion for a new trial in said cause; and that deponent was first informed of such claim on the part of said Buck on yesterday, viz., September 16, 1889. Deponent further avers that said document shows that the sheets of paper have been taken apart, and subsequently pasted together, and that its whole appearance indicates that it has been through the hands of a printer." This court must be bound by the certificate of the clerk, as against the affidavit of the appellant, and it shows that no statement was filed. If the certificate was false, the appellant should have taken steps to have it corrected. Not having done so, it is binding on this court. The Code requires the statement to be filed with the clerk. Code Civil Proc. § 659. And the "application for a new trial shall be heard at the earliest practicable period after * * * bill of exceptions or statement * * * are filed." Id. § 660. Until the statement is filed, it is no part of the record, and cannot properly be considered by the court; and, from what we can learn from the record before us, the court below may have denied the motion for the reason that no statement had been filed, and therefore no error was shown.

The appellant contends that the respondent is estopped to claim that the statement was not filed by a stipulation made by him that the statement had been served in time, and that the same was correct, and might be presented to the court for settlement without further notice. But this was before the time for filing, and before the settlement of the statement, and could not affect the question now presented. A statement was settled, as shown by the judge's certificate; but this does not show that it was filed. As indicated by the affidavit of the clerk, the attorney for the appellant may have kept it in his possession until it was printed, and then have presented it for filing. It is true, as counsel for appellant contends, that it is not necessary that the paper should have been indorsed and filed by the clerk. If it was actually left with him to be filed, this would have been enough. Boyd v. Desmond, 79 Cal. 250, 21 Pac. Rep. 755. But here the fact is, as shown by the certificate and the clerk's affidavit, that it was not left with the clerk for filing. The statement not having been before the court below when the motion for a new trial was submitted, the motion was properly denied. No reason is shown why the judgment should be reversed.

While, as stated, we could not properly look into the alleged statement for the purpose of reversing the judgment or order, we have examined it, and other parts of the record, sufficiently to satisfy us that the judgment was right on the merits. Judgment and order affirmed.

BATES v. GERBER, City Treasurer. (No. 13,329.)

MUNICIPAL BONDS—OVERDUE COUPONS—INTEREST.

1. As St. Cal. 1858, pp. 279, 280, providing for the payment by the city of Sacramento of certain bonds, makes no provision for the payment by the city treasurer of other than annual interest, mandamus will not lie against him for the payment of interest on unpaid interest. Davis v. Porter, 6 Pac. Rep. 746, followed.

2. As the bonds were issued under a special statute which provided for the payment of the principal and annual interest, and nothing more, and which created a specific fund for the payment of the bonds, the city, on the insufficiency of the fund for any one year to meet the annual interest, does not become liable to pay interest on overdue coupons, under the general statute providing for interest on all contracts after maturity. THORNTON, J., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county.

W. C. Belcher and A. C. Freeman, for appellant. Taylor & Holl, (A. P. Catlin, of counsel,) for respondent.

WORKS, J. Mandamus to compel the respondent, as treasurer of the city of Sacramento, to pay interest on overdue coupons of certain bonds of said city. The court below sustained the demurrer to the complaint, and rendered judgment for the defendant thereon. The plaintiff appeals.

The precise question presented here was decided adversely to the appellant in Davis v. Porter, 66 Cal. 658, 6 Pac. Rep. 746. On the authority of that case, the judgment of the court below must be affirmed, not alone because it has been so decided by this court, but because it was correctly decided for the reasons stated in the opinion. In this case a demand was made on the treasurer for the payment of the annual interest provided for by the coupons, and interest on the amount due on such coupons from the time the same matured. The treasurer offered to pay the amount called for by the coupons, on delivery of such coupons to him, but declined to pay interest on the interest or to pay any part of the indebtedness unless the coupons were surrendered as fully paid and satisfied.

It is earnestly contended by the appellant that, conceding that mandamus would not lie to compel the treasurer to pay interest on the annual interest, such coupons drew interest from their maturity under the general statute providing for such interest, after maturity, on all contracts; and that as the debt existed the treasurer had no right to impose, as a condition upon which he would pay the annual interest, that the coupons should be surrendered. We cannot accede to this view of the law. These bonds are provided for by special statute, which provided a specific fund out of which they should be paid. The act provided for the payment of the principal and annual interest, and nothing more. St. 1858, p. 279, § 35. There was no other fund out of which the interest demanded could have been paid, and to have paid out a part of the fund on a liability not provided for or allowed by law would have been to divert a part of the fund from the purpose intended, and thereby to deprive other bondholders of their annual interest, and perhaps of their principal. The statute having provided specifically what should be paid out of this fund, and of what the fund should consist, it cannot be presumed that it was the intention of the legislature that there should be a general liability over against the city for interest on the annual interest, in case the fund for any year should be insufficient to meet such interest. The statute under and by virtue of which these bonds were issued was the basis of, and became a part of the contract, and the bondholders must be held to have taken the bonds with the understanding and agreement that they were only entitled to the principal and the annual interest, and that if the fund provided for the payment thereof should be insufficient to meet the same that no interest on the coupons were provided for or could be recovered. Judgment affirmed.

We concur: McFarland, J; Paterson, J.

Fox, J., (concurring.) I concur in the judgment. Even if these coupons bear interest after maturity, or after non-payment for want of funds at or after maturity, (which is not conceded,) the treasurer did all that he was required or authorized to do when he offered to pay the face of the coupons upon condition of their surrender to him; and the condition was one which he was not only authorized, but which it was his duty, to impose. The bond from which each coupon was severed, as well as the act under which it was issued, was a part of the contract made between the municipality and the person to whom the bond was issued, at the time it was issued, and all the conditions of that contract followed the bond, and every coupon attached to it, into whosesoever hands it might thereafter go. The act was a special one for the incorporation of a municipality, the funding of the indebtedness of its predecessors, for which it would be liable, and providing for the general government of the new municipality. It constituted the whole law of the state on the special subjects with which it dealt, and for which it provided; taking those subjects out of the operation of all general laws, which might otherwise have been applicable thereto. The holders of claims against the former municipality or the former county were not bound to accept its provisions, but, if they did, they and their subsequent assignees were bound by them. Quoad these bonds, and the coupons attached to them, that act becomes a part of the contract. The act provided for the issuance of the bonds, for the time of their maturity, for the payment of annual interest thereon at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, payable at the office of the treasurer on the 1st day of January in each year, and that coupons for the interest should be attached to each bond; and also provided for a fund to meet these several sums as they should fall due. It did not provide for either principal or interest bearing interest after maturity, and provided no fund to meet such an added liability. The holders of the bonds accepted them with full knowledge of these provisions, and that this statute constituted the whole law by which their rights and remedies were to be ascertained and determined; for every man dealing with a municipal corporation is bound to know that its powers are only such as are conferred by the statute under which it is authorized to act, and its obligations can only be such as it is by the statute authorized to assume, or those necessarily incident to the exercise of the powers expressly conferred. Knowing this, they knew that no provision was, or without further legislation could be, made for the payment of interest after maturity upon any of these obligations. They also knew that they could not maintain any action against the municipality upon any obligation arising under this act, and accepted their obligations upon that condition. Nothing in the act prohibited them from maintaining any proper action against the officers of the municipality for neglect to perform any of the duties prescribed by the act, but they were forbidden to maintain any action against the municipality itself, upon any liability incurred under the act, and they voluntarily accepted these obligations upon that condition.

This act provided for the funding of the old indebtedness; for the creation of a fund to meet the obligations specially authorized in that behalf; and also for a fund to meet the current expenses of the government of the municipality; but it not only, ex industria, omitted to provide for any of these obligations bearing interest after maturity, or for the payment of any such interest, but it also expressly provided that no officer nor any person should have power to contract a debt against the municipality for any purpose or under any pretext whatever. See section 45, p. 281. If any of the officers had made any provision, express or implied, to the effect that any of the obligations which they were authorized to issue under the act should bear interest at a greater rate or for a longer period than that provided in the act itself, to that extent it would have been in direct violation of this provision, and void. In view, then, of the fact that all the rights and obligations of the parties in relation to these bonds and coupons are limited and controlled by the provisions of this act under which they were issued, the able argument of counsel in support of the proposition that the coupons bear interest after maturity, based upon other statutes and upon decisions rendered under other laws, seems to me to have no application. This act takes the subject-matter upon which it operates out of the general laws in relation to interest, and out of the operation of all other laws. Under this act the rule laid down in Soher v. Supervisors, 39 Cal. 134, seems to me the only rule that can be applied: "When no provision is made in a funding statute for the payment of interest after the bonds issued under it have become due, no interest will accrue thereon after that date." And the rule that will apply to the bonds will also apply to the coupons. As was said in Beals v. Supervisors, 28 Cal. 450, "there is no express contract to pay interest, and no rule of law, independent of statutory provisions, that would require interest to be paid." The statute under consideration in the case of David v. County of Yuba, 75 Cal. 452, 13 Pac. Rep. 874, and 17 Pac. Rep. 533, was so widely different from the one now under consideration as to make the decision in that case of no value as an authority in this case. There it was expressly provided that other funds might be resorted to than the one created under the funding act, and that the board might make other provisions than those specified in the act, if those were found insufficient. The payment of interest in consideration of forbearance might well be allowed in that case, as the provisions of the statute were sufficiently liberal to allow that to be done.

It is claimed that the case of Davis v. Porter, 66 Cal. 658, 6 Pac. Rep. 746, holds that the coupons upon the bonds issued under this act bear interest after maturity, but I do not so read the decision. The effect of that decision is that, even if it be conceded that they so bear interest, the plaintiff was not entitled to the relief demanded, for the reason that the treasurer was not authorized to pay more than the face of the coupons. It was not necessary in that case to decide that they did (or did not) bear interest, and the language used does not import a decision to that effect. I am unable to find any decision that will support that theory, as applicable to bonds or coupons issued under a statute like the one here under consideration. But as said in the case last referred to, and as I have said in the beginning, even if these coupons did bear interest after maturity or presentation the plaintiff is not entitled to this writ, for the reason that the treasurer is not by the act authorized to pay anything more than the face of the obligation, and he offered to pay that upon the only terms and conditions upon which he was authorized to pay it, namely, upon surrender of the coupons. The bond, as well as the act, forms a part of the contract, and every coupon refers to the bond, and declares upon its face that it is for interest upon the bond. The holder is therefore bound to look at the bond, as well as the coupon, for the conditions of his contract; and when he does so he finds it specified in express terms that the interest (for which the coupon is attached) is payable upon surrender of the coupon. Plaintiff was not therefore, entitled to the payment of even the principal sum named in the coupon, except upon surrender of such coupon.

THORNTON, J., (dissenting.) I concur in the judgment for the reasons stated in the decision in Davis v. Porter, 66 Cal. 658, 6 Pac Rep. 746. In that case the main question presented in this case was fully argued by counsel, considered and decided. I am of opinion that the decision there made was correct in every particular, viz., that mandamus would not lie to command the payment of interest on the interest mentioned in the coupons. The prayer in the petition for the mandate herein is for a writ commanding the payment of both coupons and interest on them. It was properly refused, for the reason that as asked for it would include interest on coupons, which the court could not lawfully grant. The demand on the treasurer also included both coupons and interest on coupons. It was therefore proper to refuse the writ. Price v. Irrigating Co., 56 Cal. 436. While it would have been error to refuse the writ for the payment of the coupons, it was not error to refuse it for the payment of coupons and interest on them.

I am, however, of opinion that the holder of overdue coupons has the right to have, under the statute as it has stood from the date of the first statute on the subject of interest enacted in this state, and as it stands now, from the city of Sacramento interest on such overdue coupons. In that respect the city of Sacramento is like any other debtor. The refusal to pay such interest would be repudiation, nothing more nor less. I am of opinion that the treasurer had no right to demand, as a condition of paying such coupons that they should be surrendered to him. The holder of such coupons has a right under the general statute, (Civil Code, § 3137,) and under the law, if no statute had been enacted, to retain them, for the reason that he has a claim upon them for interest. The payment of the principal of the coupon does not pay it in full; a partial payment is only thus made. The debtor (the city of Sacramento) can only require that a receipt for the amount paid be written on each coupon. Id. § 3137, supra. The treasurer can require no more, and the holder has a right to retain in his possession the coupons, with the receipts written on them, as evidence of his claim for interest not paid.

DAVIS v. CITY OF SACRAMENTO. (No. 13,249.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 23, 1890.)

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county; JOHN HUNT, Judge.

W. C. Belcher and Freeman & Bates, for appellant. A. P. Catlin, for respondent.

WORKS, J. The object of this action is the same as Bates v. Gerber, ante, 1115, (opinion filed January 16, 1890;) the case referred to being mandamus against the treasurer to compel the payment of interest on overdue coupons, and this an action directly against the city to recover such interest. We held in Bates v. Gerber that the coupons did not draw interest after maturity, and the decision in that case is decisive of this. It was held in Davis v. Yuba Co., 75 Cal. 452, 13 Pac. Rep. 874, and 17 Pac. Rep. 533, that the coupons of certain bonds issued by said county bore interest after maturity, but that case differed materially from this. Here a specific fund is provided for the payment of the bonds and annual interest, and nothing more, and no other means of paying anything more is provided. In the case cited it appears that the county was made generally liable to pay the bonds and interest, and, if the fund specifically provided for their payment was insufficient, the treasurer was authorized to draw on the general fund, and if that proved insufficient the board of supervisors was authorized to raise the necessary funds by contracts or loans. As the county was made generally liable for the annual interest, and means provided for meeting it, we see no reason why the county should not have been held liable for interest on the coupons, if the same were not paid at maturity. But for the reasons stated in the opinion first above referred to, we are of the opinion that no such liability attached under the circumstances of this case, and that for that reason the demurrer to the complaint was properly sustained. Judgment affirmed.

WOODARD v. WRIGHT. (No. 12,405.)

TRUSTS—EXPENDITURES BY TRUSTEE—PAYMENTS TO BENEFICIARY.

1. Where a trustee has expended money in necessary repairs and improvements of the trust-estate, and the outlay has been approved by the cestui que trust, he may hold the land on which the money was expended till the sum is repaid.

2. In the absence of an express agreement to the contrary, money paid to the cestui que trust by the trustee will be presumed to be payments on account of the rents, issues, and profits of the trust-estate.

Estee, Wilson & McCutchen, for appellant. Jos. McKenna and John McKenna, for respondent.

PATERSON, J. This is an action brought by the plaintiff for a decree adjudging the defendant to be her trustee of the tract of land described in the complaint, and requiring him to execute a deed of conveyance to her. Plaintiff had judgment in the court below, and from that judgment, and an order denying a motion for a new trial, defendant has appealed.

Plaintiff averred in her complaint that the defendant undertook and assumed as her agent, and at her special instance and request, to purchase the land described in the complaint and take a deed therefor in her name, and for her benefit; but fraudulently, and without her knowledge or consent, on the 19th day of November, 1877, took a conveyance of the land in his own name, and for his own benefit. The defendant admitted that the conveyance was taken in his own name, but denied that it was in fraud of the plaintiff, or against her wish or consent, and averred that the plaintiff knew that the deed was taken in his own name, and that the same was taken at her solicitation and request. He further averred that, of the purchase price paid, $5,000 belonged to the plaintiff, and the balance thereof, namely, $832.50, was the money of the defendant; that, although the deed was taken in his own name, he received the property in trust for the benefit of the plaintiff, subject, however, to advances of money made and to be made by the defendant to the plaintiff; that since the purchase was made he has paid over to the plaintiff all of the net income arising from the property; that in addition to the net income derived from the property which has been paid over to the plaintiff, the defendant has paid, laid out and expended for, and loaned to, the plaintiff since the creation of the trust, and at her special instance and request, various sums of money, amounting to $7,383, in which sum he claims the plaintiff is indebted to him. The court found that, at the request of the plaintiff, defendant purchased the property, and took a deed in his own name to secure the repayment to him of the sum of $832.50 only, the same being the balance of the purchase price loaned by him to plaintiff to make the purchase; that of the purchase price, to-wit, $5,832.50, $5,000 belonged to the plaintiff, and the balance, $832.50, to the defendant; that defendant, immediately after the purchase and pursuant to his agreement with the plaintiff, took possession of the land as security for the money advanced to make the purchase, and has ever since been in possession of the same; that the defendant, since the purchase, has laid out considerable money for taxes and for necessary repairs, and for expenses of farming the same when the premises were not leased. The court further found: "Tenth. That the rents, issues, and profits arising from said land and premises, and collected by the defendant since the date of purchase, up to the date hereof, are more than sufficient to pay the $832.50, the amount advanced to purchase, and the interest thereon from the 19th of November, A. D. 1877, at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum up to the date hereof, and all the taxes on said premises paid by defendant, and all the sums of money expended by him for the necessary repairs of said premises, and for the expenses of farming the same, when the said premises were not leased. * * * Twelfth. That the defendant has never paid to plaintiff any part of the income of said land and premises, as such, but has made loans to plaintiff, as hereafter set forth. Thirteenth. That defendant has made since the purchase valuable improvements on said land and premises, but said improvements were put on said land and premises without the consent or knowledge of plaintiff, and there were no special circumstances to justify the making of any of them. Fourteenth. That the defendant, after the purchase, made loans of divers sums of money to plaintiff; but that plaintiff never agreed with defendant before, or at the time, or after said loans, either by express verbal terms, or in writing, or in any other way, that said loans, or any of them, should be a lien against said land and premises, or against the proceeds thereof. Fifteenth. That defendant, after the purchase, made for plaintiff expenditures of money for purposes having nothing to do with the preservation of the land and premises, and in no way concerning the property, but that the plaintiff never agreed with the defendant before, or at the time, * * * or in any other way, that said expenditures, or any of them, should be a lien against the said land and premises, or against the proceeds thereof." As conclusions of law the court found that the defendant took the land simply as a mortgagee, to secure only the repayment to him of $832.50, with interest thereon at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum; that he was entitled to be allowed for his expenditures for taxes, necessary repairs, and expenses of farming when the premises were not leased; that plaintiff was entitled to have the income arising from the rents, issues, and profits of the land, less said sums allowed the defendant; that the defendant is not entitled to be allowed for moneys expended by him in making improvements, nor for divers sums of money which he had lent to plaintiff after the purchase of the land; that defendant has now no lien or claim against the land, but that plaintiff is entitled to the possession thereof, together with a good and sufficient deed of conveyance from the defendant, and her costs of the action.

There is no doubt that the defendant took the property to be held in trust by him for the plaintiff. The only question in the case is how much, what items of expenditure, he should be allowed before he is required to convey to the plaintiff. We think the court erred in refusing to allow the defendant his necessary expenses incurred in erecting a fence around the property, for constructing a windmill, in laying water-pipes for carrying water to portions of the property and the house, for digging a new well, and for the construction of a new bridge. The evidence shows that the defendant, with the consent of the plaintiff, had the entire management of the property. His power to manage the same at will seems not to have been disputed. There is nothing in the record, so far as we can see, to indicate any abuse of authority thus given him. Trustees thus invested with the general power to manage and control the property of the cestui que trust are justified in laying out money for the repair and ordinary improvement of property, such as draining, fencing, necessary farm buildings, etc., and they are allowed to hold the estate until the moneys thus expended are repaid. The question of reimbursement does not depend upon the knowledge or consent of the cestui que trust. Mannix v. Purcell, 19 N. E. Rep. 572; Myers v. Myers, 2 McCord, Eq. 214; Hidden v. Jordan, 28 Cal. 309; Harper's Appeal, 64 Pa. St. 315; 2 Perry, Trusts, §§ 485, 915; Hill, Trustees, 673. Assuming that it is necessary in such cases for the trustee to show special circumstances justifying the making of improvements, we think that the thirteenth finding of the court, that there were no such special circumstances, is not supported by the evidence. Nearly all of the items of expenditure for which the defendant claims reimbursement were presented to the plaintiff in an account, and by her approved. This amounted to ratification of the defendant's acts. Furthermore, the testimony, without substantial conflict, showed that all of the improvements made were absolutely necessary. It is unnecessary for us to recite here the testimony upon which we base this statement. The fence was worthless; the one which defendant put in its stead was substantial, and added a permanent value to the property; the bridge was unsafe and not worth repair; the new one was therefore necessary and proper; the old well had become exhausted, and it was cheaper to dig a new one than to attempt to repair the old; the windmill and pipes were such as any good husbandman, with the means at hand would have provided under the circumstances. Defendant also expended money in payment of insurance; for this he should have been allowed. The rule is that trustees may insure, and it has been held that good management would demand it, but they are not bound to do so. 2 Perry, Trusts, § 527. The authorities cited by respondent bearing upon the question as to what expenditures may be made by a mortgagee in possession are not in point. This is a case of trust, and trustees with general powers are not bound to the strict limitations which are placed upon mortgagees in possession. The twelfth finding, to the effect that the defendant has never paid to plaintiff any part of the income of the land, is not supported by the evidence. In her examination in chief the plaintiff testified as follows: "Question. You stated this morning that you received $2,206 from your brother. On what account was that? Answer. It was on account of the property. Rents that came from Fairfax. Q. That is the way it was given to you from him? A. Yes, sir." The attempt subsequently to qualify and explain this statement was ineffective. The money was actually received by her, and any payments made by the defendant to the plaintiff while he was holding the rents, issues, and profits of the property of his cestui que trust, in the absence of an express understanding or agreement to the contrary between the two, will be presumed to have been payments on account of the rents, issues, and profits thus received by him, and not as advances or loans from him to her. The finding of the court, that the plaintiff never agreed with the defendant that any loans or advances made by the defendant should be a lien against the land, is supported by material evidence. The most that can be said in favor of appellant is that there is a conflict in the evidence. The finding, therefore, cannot be disturbed. It is claimed by appellant that the court erred in striking out certain portions of the answer. Those portions are referred to in the transcript as "beginning at the word 'that,' line 16, page 1, and ending at the word 'property,' line 16, page 11," etc. These numbers of the lines and pages refer to the lines and pages of the original answer on file, but furnish us with no information as to what portions of the answer are included therein. Assuming, however, that all of the answer was stricken out except that which is given in the concluding portion of respondent's brief herein, we see no error. All of the matters properly involved in the issues can be determined upon the pleadings as they stand, as well as they could if the portions stricken out had remained in the answer.

Judgment and order reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

I concur: Fox, J.

Works, J., (concurring.) I concur in the judgment of reversal. I do not concur in the statement of Mr. Justice Paterson, that the evidence showed a trust in the defendant. He was a mortgagee in possession, and was not entitled to all the credits given him in the foregoing opinion. But the plaintiff having claimed that the relation of trustee and cestui que trust existed between the parties, and the cause having been tried on that theory in the court below, both parties agreeing that there was a trust, some of the items the court below refused to allow the defendant should have been allowed him. If the action had been brought to redeem, treating the deed held by the defendant as a mortgage, as I think should have been done, the conclusion reached by the court below would have been right.

People v. Lawrence. (No. 20,588.)

Gaming—Police Courts—Jurisdiction.

Const. Cal. art. 6, §§ 1, 5, 13, vest the judicial power in superior courts, "and in such inferior courts as the legislature may establish in any incorporated city or town, or city and county," and give the superior courts jurisdiction of felonies, and of all "misdemeanors not otherwise provided for," and provide that the legislature may fix the jurisdiction of any inferior courts so established. St. 1871-72, p. 84, and other statutes, create the police court of the city and county of San Francisco, and give it jurisdiction of all misdemeanors punishable by fine not exceeding $1,000, and imprisonment for one year, or both. Held, that the effect of these acts was to deprive the superior court of jurisdiction over the offense of gaming, that being among the misdemeanors "otherwise provided for" by the acts. Following Green v. Superior Court, 21 Pac. Rep. 307.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. F. Sullivan, Judge.

The defendant, Lawrence, was convicted in the superior court of San Francisco on an indictment for gaming. From the judgment and the order denying a new trial he appeals. Const. Cal. art. 6, § 5, provides that the superior courts shall have jurisdiction in all criminal cases amounting to felony, and cases of misdemeanor not otherwise provided for. Id. § 13, provides that the legislature shall fix by law the jurisdiction of any inferior courts which may be established in pursuance of section 1, and shall fix by law the powers, duties, and responsiblities of the judges thereof. "Consolidation Act," as amended in 1872, prescribes the jurisdiction of the police court of the city and county of San Francisco, and that said court shall have jurisdiction of misdemeanors punishable by fine not exceeding $1,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both.

J. D. Sullivan and Alfred Clarke, for appellant. Geo. A. Johnson, Atty. Gen., for the People.

Foote, C. The defendant was tried and convicted in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco upon an indictment charging him with the commission of a misdemeanor, viz., gaming, under section 330 of the Penal Code. From the judgment and an order denying a new trial he has appealed. The only point made for the reversal of the judgment and order is that the court which tried him was without jurisdiction so to do. Under the authority of the case of Green v. Superior Court, 21 Pac. Rep. 307, 78 Cal. 556, it is apparent that the point is well taken. We therefore advise that the judgment and order be reversed.

We concur: Belcher, C. C.; Hayne, C.

Willard v. Superior Court. (No. 20,573.)

Criminal Law—Attendance of Witnesses.

1. The provision of Const. Cal. § 13, art. 1, that, "in criminal prosecutions in any court whatever, the party accused shall have the right to a speedy and public trial, to have the process of the court to compel the attendance of witnesses in his behalf, and to appear and defend in person and with counsel," is limited by the concluding sentence, "The legislature shall have power to provide for the taking, in the presence of the party accused and his counsel, of depositions of witnesses in criminal cases other than cases of homicide, when there is reason to believe that the witness, from inability or other cause, will not attend at the trial," and does not secure to a defendant in a criminal action an absolute right to have the process of the court issue to compel the attendance, as a witness, of a convict imprisoned in the state-prison.

2. Under Pen. Code Cal. § 1567, providing that "when it is necessary to have a person imprisoned in the state-prison brought before any court * * * an order for that purpose may be made by the court, and executed by the sheriff of the county where it is made," it is in the discretion of the court to determine whether the attendance of such person is necessary, and mandamus will not lie to compel the making of an order

Works and Thornton, JJ., dissenting.

In bank. On application for writ of mandate to superior court, Santa Barbara county; R. M. DILLARD, Judge.

Beatty & Fowler, for plaintiff. Geo. A. Johnson, Atty. Gen., for respondent.

PATERSON, J. The question involved in this application for a writ of mandate is whether a person held for trial on a charge of felony has the right to have the process of the court to compel the attendance in his behalf of witnesses who are confined as prisoners in the state-prison. Title 13 of the Penal Code, which is entitled, "Proceedings for Bringing Persons Imprisoned in the State-Prison, or the Jail of Another County, before a Court," provides that, "when it is necessary to have a person imprisoned in the state-prison brought before any court, * * * an order for that purpose may be made by the court, and executed by the sheriff of the county where it is made." If this were the only provision of law bearing on the subject, it would be the duty of the court, on a proper showing by the defendant as to the advisability and materiality of the proposed testimony, to make an order requiring the sheriff to bring the witness from the prison to testify at the trial: but other provisions of the constitution and the Codes somewhat becloud the question. Section 1333 of the Penal Code provides that "when the testimony of a material witness for the people is required, in a criminal action before a court of record of this state, and such witness is a prisoner in the state-prison, or in a county jail, an order for his temporary removal from such prison or jail, and for his production before such court, may be made by the court in which the action is pending, or by the judge thereof; but, in case the prison or jail is out of the county in which the application is made, such order shall only be made upon the affidavit of the district attorney, or other person, on behalf of the people, showing that the testimony is material and necessary, and even then the granting of the order shall be in the discretion of the court or judge." Section 1346 provides that "when a material witness for a defendant under a criminal charge is a prisoner in the state-prison, or in the county jail of a county other than that in which the defendant is to be tried, his deposition may be taken, on behalf of the defendant, in the manner provided for in the case of a witness who is sick," etc. If the legislature had intended to authorize the defendant in a criminal action to compel the attendance of such witnesses, it would have done so, doubtless, in the same chapter with section 1333, supra, which chapter is devoted to the subject of "Compelling the Attendance of Witnesses." The facts that in that chapter provision is carefully made for the production of witnesses on behalf of the prosecution, that nothing is said about witnesses on behalf of defendant, and that in the next chapter, which relates to the "Examination of Witnesses Conditionally," provision is made for taking depositions on behalf of the defendant, and nothing is said about depositions on behalf of the prosecution, are significant. Reading the three sections together, it would seem that the legislature intended two things: (1) That the court might in any case, on a proper showing that the testimony of the witness was material and necessary, whether for defendant or for the prosecution, make an order for his attendance. That is the purport of section 1567, and there is nothing in the other sections to overcome it. (2) That the court, when satisfied that the examination of a witness on behalf of a defendant is necessary, may order that he be examined conditionally; but no deposition shall be taken on behalf of the prosecution, the defendant having the right to be confronted at the trial by the witnesses against him. In neither of these cases does an order issue as a matter of right. It issues only when it appears to the satisfaction of the trial court that the witness is necessary. The statute has lodged in that court the right to determine whether the witness is necessary or not, and, being thus clothed with discretion, it is not subject to the mandate of this or any other court. For any abuse of that discretion the aggrieved party has his remedy, which is the same as for all other mere errors of judgment. The legislature, however, recognizing the liability of the criminal classes to abuse the process of the court, if given the privilege, as a matter of right, to command the attendance of persons confined in the state-prison, has wisely left it to the court to say whether the witness called for is necessary, and, in order to cut off as many cases of necessity as possible, has provided for the taking of depositions. There may be cases in which the personal attendance of a witness confined in the state-prison is necessary. for the purpose of identity, or for the exhibition of some physical or mental peculiarity, which could not well be described in depositions; but it never was intended to give to a defendant charged with crime the power to summon convicts to testify to his good behavior while among them, or at any other time; yet, if the position taken by petitioner be correct, this might be done, the county in which a defendant is to be tried put to great and unnecessary expense, and the courts and officers of the state greatly harassed by contumacious and vindictive criminals.

But it is claimed by petitioner that, if this be the proper construction of the acts of the legislature, then those acts are in violation of the provisions of article 1, § 13, of the constitution, and are void. That section provides that, "in criminal prosecutions in any court whatever, the party accused shall have the right to a speedy and public trial; to have the process of the court to compel the attendance of witnesses in his behalf; and to appear and defend in person, and with counsel." It is contended that under this provision the petitioner is entitled, as a matter of right, to an order of the court directing the sheriff to bring from the state-prison, to testify in his behalf, any prisoner or prisoners confined therein, whom he may state in an affidavit to be necessary and material witnesses in his behalf. But the concluding sentence of the section reads as follows: "The legislature shall have power to provide for the taking, in the presence of the party accused and his counsel, of depositions of witnesses, in criminal cases oth than cases of homicide, when there is reason to believe that the witness, from inability or other cause, will not attend at the trial." And it is said that this portion of section 13 does not in any way limit the right guarantied in the first clause, quoted above, and that it was decided in People v. Hurtado, 63 Cal. 293, that the last sentence of the section was intended to grant to the accused further and additional rights for his protection, by extending to him the privilege of taking depositions in cases where, from inability or other cause, the witness could not be brought by the process of the court to testify. We do not so understand the case referred to. The court there said: "The section, with the exception of the last clause, relates to the privileges of persons accused of crime. * * * There can be little doubt that the right to due process of law would include the common-law right to be confronted by his witnesses. To prevent misunderstanding, however, the framers of the constitution added: 'The legislature shall have power to provide for the taking,'" etc. It is sufficient to say, however, that the question before us here was not an issue in that case. We think that the legislature, in the provisions adverted to above, has strictly followed the letter and the spirit of the constitution. There has been no infringement upon the constitutional rights of the petitioner, or any other person charged with felony. It may be said in conclusion that the legislature has the right at any time, directly or indirectly, to provide that no person convicted of felony shall testify in any action, civil or criminal. The petition for a writ of mandate is denied.

We concur: SHARPSTEIN, J.; MCFARLAND, J.; FOX, J.

I dissent: WORKS, J.

BEATTY, C. J. I concur in the judgment. The statute certainly does not give the defendant in a criminal action an absolute right to an order for the attendance as witness of a convict imprisoned in the state-prison. It gives a guarded and limited right to the prosecution, subject to the discretion of the court, to have such an order; but it does not in terms give such a right to the defendant, either absolutely or upon conditions. The general provision of section 1567 of the Penal Code, authorizing an order for the production of a prisoner "when it is necessary," is not confined to cases in which the prisoner may be needed as a witness. It applies equally where he is needed for any other purpose, as, for instance, where it is desired to try him upon some charge other than that upon which he has been imprisoned; and the whole object of the section is to prescribe the manner of procuring his presence when needed. We must look to other portions of the statute to discover the cases in which his presence is necessary. No section of the statute has been cited, and I know of none, which makes his presence necessary as a witness, or provides for an order for his production, except section 1333, Pen. Code, by which the privilege of securing his attendance is confined to the prosecution exclusively, subject to the discretion of the court to deny the order. And there is good reason for making this discrimination in behalf of the state. The defendant may in all cases have the benefit of the prisoner's deposition. In cases of homicide, the state cannot have it. Const. art. 1, § 13. And, besides, the district attorney, acting, as he does, in the interest of the public, and under the obligations of his oath of office, will not abuse the privilege; but there is not only no security that defendants in criminal cases would not abuse it, it is highly probable that they would, and the worse the criminal the more probable the abuse.

It being clear, to my mind, that the right contended for by the petitioner is not secured to him by statute, the only remaining question is whether it is secured by the constitution. By section 13, art. 1, it is provided that in criminal prosecutions the party accused shall have the right to compulsory process to compel the attendance of witnesses in his behalf; and I am willing to concede that the provision is self-executing. But what does it mean? Substantially the same provision is found in the sixth amendment to the constitution of the United States, and in the organic law of several of our sister states. We have not been cited by counsel to these provisions, or the construction they have received; and, without the time to investigate the question more thoroughly, I do not care to express an opinion as to the exact limits of the right conferred by this clause of the constitution. I feel very sure, however, that it does not mean, and that it never was intended, that on the mere demand of a defendant in a criminal action any convict, or any number of convicts, must be transported from the state-prison to the place of trial, as an essential prerequisite to proceeding with the trial. It is not possible that the court or judge to whom application is made has no discretion to examine the sufficiency of the grounds upon which it is based, and to deny it, if, in his opinion, it ought to be denied. If this is so, mandamus will not lie to compel the making of the order. We may by mandamus compel the superior court to act. We cannot prescribe what action it shall take. It has jurisdiction upon the application; and, if it decides erroneously, the only remedy is by appeal from the judgment on bill of exceptions.

THORNTON, J. I dissent. A defendant proceeded against for a felony has a right, under the 13th section, art. 1, of the constitution of this state, "to have the process of the court to compel the attendance of witnesses on his behalf." He has the same right to this process as he has "to appear and defend in person and with counsel." Both are secured by the above section of the constitution. This process cannot be denied to him by any power of the state, whether by legislative, executive, or judicial. The constitution (section above noted) assures this right to a defendant accused of felony. It needs no statute to confer it. The constitution confers it, and it cannot be taken away by statute. Nor has the legislature attempted to deprive such defendant of this right. Section 1333 of the Penal Code, by its very terms, refers only to a witness for the people, not to a witness for the defendant. Section 1346 grants the right to the defendant to have the deposition of his witness taken when the witness is confined in the state-prison, or in the county jail of a county other than that in which the defendant is to be tried, in the manner provided for in the case of a witness who is sick; but he is not bound to have the testimony of the witness so taken. He can waive his constitutional right, and have the deposition taken, should he so elect. But it is entirely at his option to have the witness compelled to attend, or to have his testimony taken by deposition. The defendant may waive his right, and resort to the privilege conferred on him by this section. Further privileges are granted a defendant by sections 1336 and 1337 of the Penal Code. Doubtless the accused would elect to have the deposition taken, if the witness was unable from illness to attend, rather than lose his testimony. The legislature cannot, without a violation of section 13 of article 1 of the constitution, restrict one on trial in a criminal action to having the testimony procured by deposition. The guaranty of the constitution, above pointed out, is for the benefit of the defendant in criminal actions. No such guaranty is given to the people. Therefore section 1333 of the Penal Code was passed, to enable the people to procure the attendance of an imprisoned witness. Without this statute, it may be that the people would have no such right. Section 1346 gives the defendant an additional right, as does the last clause of section 13 of article 1 of the constitution. Both confer the privilege on defendant to take depositions in the categories expressed in them; but neither are limitations on the constitutional guaranty. There is no rule of construction which countenances any such interpretation. They are in perfect harmony. One secures a right, the other grants a privilege. The defendant may waive his right and avail himself of the privilege, or may decline the privilege and cling to his right. When provisions of a constitution or statute are reconcilable, so that both can stand and have their full operation, the one cannot be regarded as a restriction of the other. Limitation is then out of the question. It is illogical to hold it a limitation. It is said that the legislature has the right at any time, directly or indirectly, to provide that no person convicted of a felony shall testify in any action, civil or criminal. Granting that it can, it has not done so; and, until it does so, courts must administer the law as written. Convicted felons are now competent witnesses. Code Civil Proc. §§ 1878–1881. But, as at present advised, we are not prepared to hold that the legislature can, while the section of the constitution above referred to is in force, enact that a witness material for the defense of a person accused and on trial for a felony shall be declared incompetent to testify for the defense. Certain we are that no such legislation will ever be attempted while the above-cited provisions of the constitution remain unchanged. It would be cruel to withhold such testimony from a person tried for an offense which may result in his deprivation of liberty. The guaranty that a defendant shall "have the process of the court to compel the attendance of witnesses in his behalf," as the guaranties of a speedy and public trial, and to appear and defend in person and with counsel, is assured in the same section of the constitution. Other guaranties are also expressed in the same section. The legislature cannot deprive defendant of any of these rights. To their praise, it is said they have nowhere attempted it. The guaranties in section 13 of article 1 of the constitution came down to us, for the most part, from our English ancestors. They are of the great muniments of personal liberty. Some of them are included in the provisions of section 29 of the act of parliament known as "Magna Charta." See Co. Inst. pt. 2, p. 45, and notes following. They are of too much value to be impaired by legislation, or frittered away by construction or interpretation. They should stand and be accorded in their entirety, unabridged and undiminished.

The right of a defendant to have process to compel the attendance of his witnesses in court was substantially decided in People v. Dodge, 28 Cal. 448. It arose on an application for a continuance. The court held that the right of defendant to have the deposition of a witness taken under the statute as it then existed (see Wood, Dig. §§ 562–582, inclusive) was an enlargement of his rights, and was not designed to impair the rule, or abridge his (defendant's) right to have the personal attendance of his witnesses at the trial. The court, per SANDERSON, J., (all concurring,) said on this point: "A defendant in a criminal action is undoubtedly entitled to the personal attendance of his witnesses at the trial, if the same can be obtained without unreasonable delay. Such is the policy of the law, not merely from considerations affecting the defendant only, but also from considerations affecting the ends of public justice, irrespective of individual interests, which is manifest from the fact that the depositions of such witnesses are allowed to be read in evidence only upon further evidence at the trial that their personal attendance cannot be obtained. Section 582. It is to the interest of the people, as well as the defendant, that the witnesses of the latter should be made to give their testimony in the presence of the jury; for we all know, by daily experience, how much weight is added to or taken from testimony by the personal appearance, bearing, and manner of the witness while under examination. If these add to the weight of his testimony, the defendant ought not to be deprived of such effect, except upon the grounds of necessity; and if they detract therefrom, such effect should be secured to the people, in order that the ends of public justice may be subserved. Thus this rule requiring the personal attendance of witnesses, if the same can be had, is founded upon considerations of the wisest policy, and the provisions of the statute whereby the defendant is enabled to examine conditionally, on commission, a witness who is about to leave the state, or is sick or infirm as to afford reasonable grounds for apprehending that he will be unable to attend the trial, were not designed to impair the rule, or abridge the previous rights of the defendant, but, on the contrary, to enlarge those rights, by enabling him to secure testimony of which he would otherwise be deprived, and at the same time preserve the rule in full force, so far as the same could be done, in view of the right conferred by the statute." 28 Cal. 448, 449. See People v. Francis, 38 Cal. 183; People v. Mitchell, 64 Cal. 85. A defendant has the constitutional right to have the witnesses against him examined in open court, and in his presence. By the guaranty of due process of law, he has a right to be confronted with the witnesses for the prosecution. The correlative right is given him to have the witnesses in his behalf testify in open court.

The decision in People v. Dodge is of greater weight here, in favor of the contention of the appellant, for the reason that it was pronounced under the constitution of 1849, in which the guaranty to a defendant that he should have the process of the court to compel the attendance of witnesses in his behalf was not contained, as in the constitution of 1879. The right was then placed in the policy of the law, as shown by the sections of the statute referred to in the opinion. It was not in the constitution of 1849, unless included within "due process of law" which was in that constitution. But was it so included? See definition of "due process of law," in Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 733. The opinion in Dodge's Case makes no reference to any constitutional provision, which would seem to indicate that it was not regarded by the members of the court as given in the organic law. Suppose that this guaranty to a defendant, invoked here, has not been formally enacted into a statute. But it is clear that it is given by the constitution. And why is it not self-enacting? If the right is given by the constitution, courts are provided with ample power to execute and enforce it. Section 187, Code Civil Proc.

But the legislature has provided for the case before us in section 1567 of the Penal Code, which is in these words: "When it is necessary to have a person imprisoned in the state-prison brought before any court, or a person imprisoned in a county jail brought before a court sitting in another county, an order for that purpose may be made by the court, and executed by the sheriff of the county where it is made." The expression "may be made" leaves nothing to the discretion of the court. The word "may" must be held to mean "must," when the rights of the public or of third persons are concerned. Such is the settled law. See Abbott's Dic. word "May." Here the right of the public and of a third person, the applicant for the writ, are both concerned. The public is concerned in assuring to the accused a fair trial; and the accused is concerned in having her witness testify viva voce, in open court. See People v. Dodge, supra. Under section 1567, the lower court is bound to make the order. It has no discretion or option to refuse it. 28 Cal. supra. "When it is necessary" is shown by the affidavit of defendant. The court cannot disregard it. People v. Hurtado, 63 Cal. 294, is in the same line, where this court said, as is said in that case, that the provision in regard to depositions is for the protection of defendants. It certainly cannot mean that it is intended to take away a right assumed by the first part of section 13 of article 1 of the constitution. To so construe it would take away a protection from defendants. It would deprive them of a substantial right guarantied by the first portion of the section. Far from being a protection, it would be a disprotection, of defendants. It would be taking away the more important means of protection. That the order made under section 1567 is process is clear from section 7 of subdivision 15 of the Penal Code. If the word "writ" infers an order in writing, then such order is a writ or process under the sudivision of the section referred to. The court must make the order, and issue the necessary writ or process to execute and carry out the order, which it has power to do under section 128, subd. 8, and section 187, of the Code of Civil Procedure. The constitution and statutes furnish all the required machinery to assure this right to defendants, and the enforcement of it.

One further proposition should be stated. It was said on the argument that the state alone has the right to bring a witness from the state-prison. This was said with reference to section 1333, supra. The reason why this right was not further assured to a defendant by statutory enactment has been stated above. What a strange construction, that a great state, prosecuting one of its citizens,—one of its children,—should retain a right which it would not grant to the humblest of its citizens, when prosecuted for a public offense. Surely the state can have no feeling of revenge against one of its citizens, even though it is an erring one. Its prosecution of guilty persons should not be marked by any manifestation of vindictiveness. Such conduct on the part of the state, in holding for itself a right which it would not allow to one of its citizens, would savor more of the cruelty of a step-mother than of the justice due from a protecting father. The state owes equal and exact justice to those under its authority, in all proceedings against them. It can have no higher justifiable right as to witnesses that the defendant. Nor should nor does it ask any higher right in this regard. If anything, it should be content with an inferior right. It holds the lists, and appoints the president thereof, in which the contest between the people and the defendant on trial is waged. And the defendant might truly say that equal justice has not been done when the state can compel the attendance of a witness to prove his guilt, and the defendant cannot compel the attendance of a witness, in like circumstances, to establish his innocence. Justice, as Lord Coke says, should be free, full, and speedy. Free, because nothing is more unjust than justice which has to be bought; full, because justice ought not to halt or be maimed; and speedy, because delay is to some extent a denial of justice. See Co. Inst. pt. 2, p. 55.

It should be recollected that this witness, brought from the state-prison, might clearly show the defendant's freedom from guilt. The difference between the living, speaking witness, before a jury, and the inanimate lines of a deposition, is recognized by all familiar with courts of justice. As is well said in an old act of parliament of 9 Edw. II. styled "Articuli Cleri," in referring to a trial by jury: "We hold and shall be able to approve it to be a farre better course for matter of fact, upon the testimonie of witnesses, sworne viva voce, then upon the conscience of any one particular man, being guided by paper proofes." See Co. Inst. pt. 2, p. 611. Especially would this be the case with a convict in prison brought from a state-prison. He comes with a stain of conviction on his credit. But his appearance and manner, under the ordeal, in open court, of examination and cross-examination, might assuredly show to court and jury that he is a perfectly reliable witness, and establish beyond question the innocence of the person on trial. Should a defendant, then, be deprived of this right? I say, No. Emphatically, No!

It is hardly necessary to reply to the argument that the petitioner here has a remedy at law, by appeal from a judgment of conviction on a bill of exceptions setting forth the application for process, the refusal of it, and an exception. Such remedy is neither speedy nor adequate. We have a right to assume on this application that the testimony of the witness whose attendance is sought to be had will acquit the petitioner. Courts have no authority to require a defendant to submit to a conviction in order to procure her rights. This weight should not be laid on the defendant by a court. It would be the height of injustice to permit it. The court should be eager to relieve defendant of the burden. Long ago, in 1857, it was held in this court that the remedy at law must be speedy and adequate. Mining Co. v. Fremont, 7 Cal. 132, 133, (Jan. 7, 1857.) So, also, in Fremont v. Crippen, 10 Cal. 211; Clark v. Crane, 57 Cal. 629. In Mining Co. v Fremont, supra, it was said: "The remedy by appeal is too slow, and is not adequate." And the writ was allowed. The same may be said here. The case cited (from 7 Cal.) is undoubtedly law, and has been frequently followed by this court, and will be followed always when the case calls for it. I am of opinion that the judge was bound to make the order asked for to procure the attendance of the witness, and that the writ here sought should issue.

STOHR v. SAN FRANCISCO MUSICAL FUND SOC. (No. 11,737.)

MUTUAL BENEFIT SOCIETIES—CHANGE OF BY-LAWS.

Where both the general laws of the state and the by-laws of an incorporated society give it the right to repeal, alter, or amend its by-laws, it is not a breach of contract for such society to amend a by-law which provides that, in case of sickness, a member shall be entitled to receive $10 per week, by limiting such allowance to a certain number of weeks thereafter, though a member be sick at the time of such amendment.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. F. SULLIVAN, Judge.

W. H. L. Barnes, for appellant. Jos. Rothschild, for respondent.

HAYNE, C. This was an action to recover certain "sick benefits." The complaint alleges that the defendant was a corporation organized "for the purpose, among other things, of assisting members who, by accident or sickness, are incapacitated from pursuing their professional calling;" that the plaintiff has been a member in good standing ever since the organization; that during all of said time the following has been one of the by-laws: "Every person who has been a member of the society for one year, and is not disqualified by any article of these by-laws, shall, in case of sickness or accident, by which he is incapacitated from following his profession, be entitled (on notifying the president or secretary) to receive the sum of $10 per week, to take effect from the day of such notice. No allowance shall be made for such disability when it exists for a less time than one week." The complainant further alleges that the plaintiff has been a member in good standing from the organization of the corporation; that on January 1, 1883, he became sick and incapacitated from following his profession; that he at once notified the president thereof; that thereupon the defendant paid him the $10 per week from January 1, 1883, to December 1, 1883; that although plaintiff's incapacity has continued the defendant refuses to pay him anything further; wherefore he sues for $440. The answer set up two separate defenses. The first defense avers that on April 24, 1883, the following by-law was duly adopted, viz.: "If any member, after the adoption of this section, shall have received benefits continuously for six months, or shall have received benefits to the amount of $260 within a period of time not exceeding twelve consecutive months, the payment of further benefits to such member shall thereafter cease, unless ordered otherwise by the board of directors." This defense further avers that after the adoption of this by-law, and within 12 consecutive months, "the defendant paid to the plaintiff the full sum of $260 and upwards in payment of said weekly benefits, at the rate of $10 per week," and that no further payment has been ordered by the board of directors. The second defense is like the first, except that, in addition to the foregoing, it contains the averment that, from the time of the admission of the plaintiff as a member, there has been a by-law of the defendant "by which it did and does reserve and retain to itself the right to repeal, alter, or amend its by-laws, rules, and regulations." The plaintiff demurred to the answer, on the ground that neither defense stated facts sufficient to constitute a defense to the action. The court sustained the demurrer, and, no amendment to the answer being made, gave final judgment for the plaintiff for the amount claimed. The defendant appeals.

It is contended for the respondent that the by-law giving a right to benefits constituted a contract which could not be changed, and the question presented is whether the defendant had power to change said by-law in the way it did. Undoubtedly, when the plaintiff complied with what was required of him as a member, the by-laws constituted a contract; and, unless the contract itself otherwise provided, it could not be changed without the consent of all the parties. But here the contract itself does provide otherwise. Under the averments of the second defense, there is an express provision that the by-laws may be changed; and we do not consider the second defense to be different from the first in legal effect, for the law provides that the by-laws may be changed. This provision must be held to enter into and form a part of the contract, and in legal effect it is as potent as the express provision of the second defense. The latter is but the expression of what the law provides. In view of this power to alter the contract, it cannot be said that the defendant could not alter its by-laws in any respect. The respondent argues, however, that it had no power to alter them so as to impair a vested right. This must be conceded, but we do not think that the new by-law purported to impair a vested right. The term "vested right" is often loosely used. In one sense every right is vested. If a man has a right at all, it must be vested in him; otherwise how could it be a right? The moment a contract is made a right is vested in each party to have it remain unaltered, and to have it performed. The term, however, is frequently used to designate a right which has become so fixed that it is not subject to be divested without the consent of the owner, as contradistinguished from rights which are subject to be divested without his consent. Now a right, whether it be of such a fixed character or not, must be a right to something; and, when a man talks vaguely of his vested right, it conduces to clearness to ask: "A vested right to what?" In the present case the plaintiff can have no right to have the contract remain unchanged, because, as we have seen, the contract itself provides that it may be changed. Nor has he a right to remain unaffected by any change that may be made; for, if such right be common to all the members, it is merely another way of saying that no change can be made; and, if the right be not common to the other members, it would be to assert a privilege or superiority over them, of which there is no pretense. If the plaintiff has any right which is so fixed that it is not subject to change, we think it can only be to the fruits which ripened before the change was made; in other words, to such sums as became due before the new by-law was adopted. To express it differently, the change could not be retroactive. This is all that we think can be meant by "vested right" in a case like the present.

Now, under the contract, nothing was due before the sickness actually took place. Benefits do not accrue for future sickness. The right of the plaintiff to benefits for future sickness is not different in its nature from the right of the well members to benefits for future sickness. In the one case the members have a right to future payment in case they become sick; in the other, the plaintiff has a right to future payments in case he continues sick. And if there was no power to change the by-law in the one case, there was no power to change it in the other, which is equivalent to saying that there was no power to change it at all. The cases where a specific sum becomes due upon the happening of a certain event, as upon death, are not like the present. In such cases an alteration in the contract cannot be made after the fact; for that would be to make that not due which had already become due. We are inclined to think that the foregoing would apply if the by-law under consideration had specified that the weekly payments were to continue as long as the sickness continued. But it does not so specify. The time during which the payments were to continue is left indefinite. The substance of the contract is, in our opinion, that, in case of sickness, the member is to receive weekly payments for an indefinite period of sickness, subject to the power of the defendant to change the provision authorizing such payments, so far as future payments are concerned. We think that each defense is sufficient, and we therefore advise that the judgment be reversed, with directions to overrule the demurrer.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; FOOTE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is reversed, with directions to overrule the demurrer.

LORD v. GOLDBERG et al. (No. 12,544.)

APPEAL—JURISDICTIONAL AMOUNT—MASTER AND SERVANT—DISCHARGE.

1. In California, in an action for a money demand, the ad damnum clause of the complaint is the test of appellate jurisdiction, whether appeal is taken by the plaintiff or defendant.

2. An agreement to employ a person "permanently" means nothing more than that the employment is to continue indefinitely, and until one or the other of the parties desires, for some good reason, to sever the relation.

3. Plaintiff represented to defendants that he could bring them a certain amount of trade, and was employed by them on a salary, with the understanding that his employment should be permanent, and that his salary should be increased as the business increased. Afterwards, upon plaintiff's failure to bring to defendants such amount of trade as he had represented that he could bring, or such amount as warranted the salary, defendants offered to make other arrangements with him, giving him a commission on the business he should bring them, which offer he refused. Held, that defendants were justified in dismissing plaintiff from their employ

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JOHN HUNT, Judge.

Jarboe, Harrison & Goodfellow, for appellants. Henry Perry, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. C. The plaintiff brought this action to recover damages for his wrongful dismissal from the employment of defendants. It is alleged in the complaint that defendants were carrying on the business of grocers in the city of San Francisco; that they negotiated with plaintiff to enter into their employment as solicitor for customers for their groceries, teas, wines, etc., and that on the 24th day of November, 1886, it was agreed by and between plaintiff and defendants that in consideration of his entering into their employment as such solicitor, and using all his efforts to secure certain named persons as customers, and to extend their business, "they would give him permanent employment so long as he should use his best efforts to extend their business, paying him at the rate of $20 per week, and increase his salary as the business increased;" that plaintiff performed all the conditions of his contract, procured the persons named and others as customers for defendants, and largely increased their profits, but that defendants, on the 2d day of April, 1887, wrongfully, and without just or reasonable cause, dismissed plaintiff from their employment, to his damage in the sum of $6,000, for which he asked judgment. The answer denied the foregoing allegations of the complaint, and alleged that in November, 1886, they employed plaintiff upon his representations that he could bring to them orders for groceries amounting to between $2,000 and $3,000 per month; that it was then agreed that plaintiff should be paid a salary of $20 per week until it could be ascertained what amount of orders he could bring to defendants; that he continued in their employ until about the 9th of April, 1887; that he did not bring to them orders amounting to $2,000 or to any sum exceeding $400 per month; that the wages paid him at all times exceeded the profits derived from the business brought in by him; that on or about the 1st of April, 1887, defendants proposed to pay plaintiff certain sums, in proportion to the business he should bring them, and that he, after taking time to consider the proposition, declined to accept it, and then voluntarily left their employment. Defendants further set up a counter-claim for $251 money lent. The court found the facts as to the employment and dismissal of plaintiff to be as alleged in the complaint, and that he sustained damage by the dismissal in the sum of $190, for which sum judgment was entered in his favor. There was no finding as to the counter claim, or as to any of the affirmative allegations of the answer. The defendants moved for a new trial, which was denied, and have appealed from the judgment and order.

1. The respondent moves to dismiss the appeal "upon the ground that the demand of defendants upon their counter-claim on file herein does not amount to the sum of $300, and that this court has no jurisdiction to hear said appeal." The motion to dismiss the appeal should be denied. The power of this court to hear and determine the matters in controversy here is in no way dependent upon the counter-claim set up by defendants. Under our present constitution and laws, when an action is brought to recover a money demand the ad damnum clause of the complaint is the test of jurisdiction. If the amount sued for is large enough to give the superior court jurisdiction, the supreme court has jurisdiction on appeal; and this is so whether the appeal be taken by the plaintiff or defendant. Dashiell v. Slingerland, 60 Cal. 653; Bailey v. Sloan, 65 Cal. 387, 4 Pac. Rep. 349.

2. It is contended for appellants that the findings were not justified by the evidence, and we think this contention should be sustained. It appears from plaintiff's testimony that he had been in the employment of one Lebenbaum, soliciting orders for groceries, and had been receiving from $40 to $50 per month for his services. About the 20th of November, 1886, he saw defendant Goldberg, and was offered by him $20 per week if he would work for defendants, and get for them certain named customers. He then states the arrangement made as follows: "'Well, now,' says I, 'while it is a very good increase of salary, will it be permanent, Mr. Goldberg?' 'It will,' says he; 'it will last; it will be permanent.'" He further states that he did not go to work for a few days, and that at his request the cashier of defendants drew up and gave to him a written memorandum of the agreement, which reads as follows: "San Francisco, Nov. 24, 1886. To whom it may concern: At the request of Mr. Lord, and to satisfy him, in his own mind, that our intentions are wholly honest as regards his permanency in our employ, we hereby declare that our interests are one, and the greater number of friends and their patronage that he can bring to our store the greater will be his income from us, and his positon is permanent so long as he desires to make it so. [Signed] GOLDBERG, BOWEN & Co." Continuing, plaintiff testified "that he remained in the employment of defendants until the 9th day of April, 1887, and was paid by them $20 per week until said time. That at said time defendants complained that the business introduced by plaintiff was not sufficient to warrant them continuing the existing arrangements with plaintiff, and stated to plaintiff that they would not do so any longer. The defendants at the same time offered to enter into a written contract with plaintiff, to continue until January following, to pay him one-half of the profits which should be derived by them from all hotel, restaurant, and institute business which should be introduced to them by plaintiff, and also 10 per cent. upon the amount of all family trade, exceeding $400 per month, introduced to them by plaintiff. That plaintiff after consultation with his friends, refused said offer, and that the relations between plaintiff and defendants were thereupon severed without further negotiations." He further testified, on cross-examination "that he had not since leaving the employment of defendants made any efforts whatever to obtain any employment, and that he had not earned anything since leaving defendants." For the defendants it was proved that in the negotiations relative to the employment of plaintiff he represented that he could control and introduce to defendants business amounting to between two and three thousand dollars per month, but that the total amount of business introduced to them by him, during the whole time of his employment, was only $1,700, and that the average profits derived from such business did not exceed 10 per cent.; that defendants intended, when they employed plaintiff, to retain him in their employment permanently; and that the only reason which induced them to refuse to do so was that the amount of business introduced by him was insufficient to pay the salary provided for.

The foregoing is all the evidence given at the trial material to the point in hand, and it will be observed that the plaintiff in no way denies that he made the representations at the time of his employment which were alleged and proved by defendants. It will also be observed that when plaintiff's attention was called to the fact that he was receiving more salary than the aggregate profits arising from the business he had brought to defendants, and when, after taking the matter under advisement for a time, he refused to accept defendants' offer to pay him a reasonable proportion of the profits to be derived from the business he might bring to them, "the relations between plaintiff and defendants were thereupon severed without further negotiations." From this it would seem that the plaintiff voluntarily left the employ of defendants, and that he was not, as found by the court, "wrongfully, and without just or reasonable cause, dismissed from their employment." But, however this may be, it is clear that plaintiff's employment was not intended to be for life, or for any fixed or certain period. It was to be "permanent," but that only meant that it was to continue indefinitely, and until one or the other of the parties should wish, for some good reason, to sever the relation. In Perry v. Wheeler, 12 Bush, 541, the plaintiff was elected permanent rector of a church, and was afterwards, as he claimed, wrongfully dismissed. The court said: "Appellant, by his counsel, insists that he was the permanent rector of Grace Church, and had the right to retain his position during life, unless he should become incapacitated for the performance of clerical duties by age or disease, or unless he should disqualify himself by immoral or unchristian conduct, or by the abandonment of the faith and the practices of the Protestant Episcopal Church. He certainly was elected permanent rector; but we do not understand the term 'permanently,' as used in this case, to mean that the parties were to be bound together by ties to be dissolved only by mutual consent or for sufficient legal or ecclesiastical reasons. * * * We understand that Dr. Perry was called as the rector of the church for an indefinite period, and that it was intended he should continue to hold the place until one or the other of the contracting parties should desire to terminate the connection, in which case the dissatisfied party was to have the right to be relieved of further obligations to the other, upon fair and equitable terms, and after reasonable notice." So in Elderton v. Emmens, 4 C. B. 479, it was claimed that the plaintiff was retained and employed as the permanent attorney and solicitor of the defendant company, and had been wrongfully discharged. But it was held that the word "permanent," as used in the resolution of appointment, denoted no more than a general employment, as contradistinguished from an occasional or special employment. See, also, Newton v. Commissioners, 100 U. S. 548, in which it was held that a county-seat was permanently established in a town when it was placed there with the intention that it should remain there. Moreover, plaintiff's salary was not fixed permanently at $20 per week, but was to be increased as the business increased. This is shown by the complaint and the memorandum of agreement put in evidence. It was fixed at $20 at first, in view of the representations of plaintiff as to the business at his command. These representations, however, proved not to be true, and the salary was more than the business warranted. Under these circumstances, and after trying the experiment for about 20 weeks, the defendants were justified, we think, in refusing longer to continue the plaintiff in their employment, unless he would accept for his services a fair and ratable proportion of the profits arising from the business controlled and introduced by him. But this they offered and he refused. We therefore advise that the motion to dismiss the appeal be denied, and that the judgment and order be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; HAYNE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the motion to dismiss the appeal is denied, and the judgment and order are reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

THORNTON, J. I concur in the judgment on the sole ground that the parties severed their agreement by mutual consent.

BOYLE v. TIBBEY et al. (No. 12,455.)

STREET ASSESSMENTS—FRONT-FOOT RULE.

St. Cal. 1871–72, p. 809, § 8, subd. 8, providing for the assessment of Market street and other streets in San Francisco, other than at right angles with crossings, etc., has reference only to work done on street intersections, and does not affect the right to assess irregular lots fronting on the street, for sewer work in the street between the crossings, under section 3, which authorizes the board of supervisors to order the whole or any portion of any public street sewered, and section 8, subd. 3, which provides for the assessment of property fronting on the work.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; WALTER H. LEVY, Judge.

E. J. & J. H. Moore, (J. C. Bates, of counsel,) for appellants. J. M. Wood, for respondent.

WORKS, J. This is an action to foreclose an assessment for the construction of a sewer on Montgomery avenue, in the city of San Francisco. The court below found for the plaintiff, and rendered a decree foreclosing the lien. A motion for a new trial was denied, and the defendants appeal.

The only question in the case is as to the validity of the assessment. The appellants contend that the assessment on its face was void, for the following reasons: "(1) Said assessment is not uniform, because not all the lots in the assessment district are assessed, but many are omitted. (2) A part of block opposite, about one-quarter of the sewer, not assessed at all. (3) There is no law to assess irregular lots fronting on Montgomery avenue. (4) Not all the lots in the assessment district benefited for the opening of the avenue assessed, and for that reason assessment void."

We think the first, second, and fourth objections are not borne out by the facts as they appear in the record. The resolution of intention and order for the work was for a sewer extending the distance of one block from the intersection of Montgomery avenue and Lombard street to the intersection of said avenue with Chestnut street, and did not include any part of the crossings of said streets, and all of the lots fronting on said block and the proposed work were assessed. This, it seems to us, is a complete answer to these objections.

It is contended, in support of the third objection, that the only provision of the law for making assessments is found in section 8, St. 1871–72, p. 809, subds. 1–11, inclusive; that the statute only provides for the assessment of Market street and other streets other than at right angles, according to certain maps with crossings and spaces colored, and that there being no method provided for assessing Montgomery avenue, which is not specifically named or included in the general designation of streets "other than at right angles," according to certain maps, the assessment was without authority of law. This was held to be so as to Montgomery avenue crossings in Kelly v. Luning, 76 Cal. 311, 18 Pac. Rep. 335; but this was based upon the fact that there was no law authorizing assessments for work done on the intersections of streets running diagonally across the blocks, except Market street, which was specifically mentioned and provided for. But, conceding this to have been so as to these street crossings, it is not so, we think, as to the streets. The right to assess for street crossings was provided for by specific reference to certain streets by name or by description, which did not include the crossings of Montgomery avenue with some other streets. St. 1871–72, p. 810, § 8, subd. 8. This is not true of the street itself, which is included, not only in the work that may be ordered by the board of supervisors, but in the provision of the statute authorizing and providing for the mode of assessment. Sections 1 and 2 of the statute provide: "All streets * * * as laid down on the map now in the office of the city and county surveyor of the city and county of San Francisco, * * * and all other streets * * * now dedicated or open to public use, are hereby declared to be open public streets * * * for the purpose of this law, and the said board of supervisors are hereby invested with jurisdiction to order any of the work mentioned in section 3 of this act to be done on any of said streets * * * when the grade and width of said streets * * * have been officially established. Sec. 2. All streets * * * now open, or which may hereafter be open to public use, shall be deemed and held to be open public streets * * * for the purposes of this act, and the board * * * shall have the same jurisdiction to order work to be done thereon," etc. The complaint alleges, and it is not denied, that Montgomery avenue, between the streets mentioned, was dedicated to public use and laid down on the map, and was an open, public street the width and grade of which had been established. Section 3 of the statute authorizes the board of supervisors to order the whole or any portion of said streets sewered, and subdivision 3 of section 8 provides for the assessment of property fronting on the work as was done in this case.

WHITE v. MERRILL et al. (No. 12,224.)

APPEAL—RECORD—OPINION OF TRIAL COURT—EVIDENCE.

1. Though the opinion of the court below, in overruling a motion for new trial, may be cited in argument on appeal, and may be regarded by the appellate court in arriving at a decision, it forms no part of the record, and may be stricken out.

2. In an action for breach of contract, where the defense is the general issue, statute of limitations, and payment of all indebtedness, a charge authorizing the jury to consider whether plaintiff ratified certain acts of defendants, relied on as constituting a breach of the contract, is erroneous, the question of ratification not being in issue.

3. Where the evidence is conflicting, the order of the trial court granting a new trial on the ground that the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict, will not be disturbed.

4. Evidence that, after a former trial of the cause, resulting in a verdict for plaintiff, one of the defendants stated that the verdict was just, is competent against such defendant, as an admission tending to show a consciousness of liability.

Lloyd & Wood, Mesick, Maxwell & Phelan, E. D. Sawyer, and Jarboe, Harrison & Goodfellow, for appellants. T. M. Osment, for respondent.

FOX, J. Action for damages for breach of contract. Defense, general issue, statute of limitations, and payment of all indebtedness. Verdict and judgment for defendants, motion for new trial made and granted, and appeal from the order granting said motion.

It is unnecessary, on this appeal, to make a detailed statement of the case, as shown either by the pleadings or the evidence; the only question being whether the court committed an error in granting the motion for new trial which calls for reversal of its order. The opinion of the court, given upon determining the motion for new trial, was brought up in the transcript. On the hearing respondent moved to strike this opinion out, as it constitutes no part of the record on appeal, and the motion was granted. The court below may give an opinion, oral or in writing, upon any motion or question that arises in the course of proceedings before it, or upon the final determination of a cause, but such opinion constitutes no part of the record on appeal. No matter what reason the court below may assign for its action, this court is not bound by such reason. If this court finds that upon any ground, or for any reason, the action of the court below was correct, such action will be affirmed, regardless of the reason which the court may have given for it. Counsel may cite it in argument, as they may any other opinion given at nisi, and it may sometimes aid the court in a solution of the question upon or to which it is cited; but it is not an act upon which error can be assigned. For this reason—possibly for others, also—the legislature, in adopting the Code, has omitted it from the list of papers required to be brought up on appeal.

It is claimed upon argument that the court granted the motion for new trial because of an error in the charge to the jury, and that it was mistaken in holding that the charge was erroneous, and therefore the motion ought not to have been granted. In its charge to the jury the court referred to certain evidence which had been given on the trial, and which is claimed to have been given without objection, and in very plain terms authorized the jury to consider whether the plaintiff had ratified certain acts of the defendants which were relied upon as acts constituting a breach of the contract. The court held that this was error, because the question of ratification was not within the issues of the cause. We think the court was right in so holding. The only issues were: First, whether or not there was such a contract as alleged; second, payment of all indebtedness under the contract; and, third, whether plaintiff's claim was barred by the statute of limitations. The evidence referred to was admissible as tending to prove whether or not there was such a contract. Being in, it was entitled to be considered for all purposes within the issues of the cause, if admitted without limitation as to purpose; but it was not entitled to be considered in connection with any question not involved in the issues.

But the motion for new trial was made not only on the ground of errors of law, of which a number were assigned, but also on the ground that the evidence was insufficient to justify the verdict, and that the same was against law. The rule adopted in this court, that the verdict of a jury will not be disturbed on the ground of insufficiency of the evidence unless it appears without substantial conflict that there is no evidence to sustain the verdict, has no application to the court below. The judge of that court has the same opportunity to see the witnesses, to judge of their credibility, and of the degree of weight which ought to be given to their evidence, as the jury has, and is often better qualified to determine those questions than the jury itself It has therefore been held by this court, in a long line of decisions, that where the evidence is conflicting this court will not interfere with the exercise of the discretion of the court below in granting a new trial unless there has been abuse. Minturn v. Bliss, 77 Cal. 90, 19 Pac. Rep. 185. An order granting a new trial will be affirmed, if it can be justified on any of the grounds upon which the motion is based, without regard to the reasons for the order expressed in the opinion of the judge; and such order will not be disturbed, unless there has been a clear abuse of discretion, where the motion was made on the ground of insufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict. Nally v. McDonald, 77 Cal. 284, 19 Pac. Rep. 418. This case bristled with conflicts in the evidence; and, under the rule long since established and affirmed in the decisions cited, this court will not reverse the order of the court below in granting a new trial.

We note still one other error of law which it seems to us justified the court in granting the new trial. Plaintiff offered to prove that there had been a former trial of the cause, resulting in a verdict in plaintiff's favor for a large sum of money, and to prove, in that connection, by a witness then on the stand, that on the morning after the verdict one of the defendants admitted to witness, and to others, that the verdict was a just and righteous one. This was excluded, and plaintiff excepted. Simple evidence of the former trial and verdict would not have been competent, but it was offered as merely preliminary to the proof of the admission by the defendant. That admission evinced a consciousness of liability, so far as that defendant was concerned, at least; and, as against him, the evidence was pertinent and competent. Banfield v. Whipple, 10 Allen, 31. Other points made on the motion for new trial need not be now considered. Order appealed from affirmed.

We concur: Beatty, C. J.; Works, J.; Sharpstein, J.

McFarland, J. I concur in the judgment. I have great doubt, however, if it should be assumed here that the lower court granted a new trial for want of sufficient evidence when the order itself, granting the new trial, expressly places it on other grounds. Of course, the opinion or reasoning of the court below is no part of the record; but may not a mere statement in the order, which shows that the new trial was not granted for insufficiency of evidence, be taken as part of the order itself, and therefore a part of the record?

Thornton, J., (concurring.) It is immaterial whether the opinion of the court below is in the record or not. This court can notice such opinion whether in the record or not, as far as all questions of law are concerned. Courts can look to the opinions of other courts to enable them to solve any legal question. Such is the common-law rule and the statute of this state. Section 1899, Code Civil Proc. "The reports of the decisions of the courts," as well as "the treatises of learned men," may be looked to to find the unwritten law. See section cited above. Here the report of Judge Spencer's decision in this case on motion for a new trial is before us, and we can look into it. We can look to it to see how he dealt with the motion before his court, and what rule of law guided his judgment. And from this opinion we find that the court submitted to the jury an issue, as to a ratification of certain of defendant's acts by plaintiff, not joined in the action; one entirely aliunde and obiter in the case, and not embraced by any of the issues joined therein. I can see no reason why this court should not, but the strongest and most convincing reasons why this court should, look to the opinion of the learned judge who presided in the court below for the purpose above pointed out. If the opinion was part of the order denying the motion for a new trial, it would be properly a part of the record; but it would be a construction of the order not justified by anything in it, or any rule of interpretation I am aware of, to hold that the opinion was part of the order referred to. I am of opinion that the court did not err in granting a new trial, and that the order granting it should be affirmed.

WAKEHAM v. BARKER. (No. 12,121.)

SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE—CONTRACT—APPEAL.

1. Specific performance of a contract to sell land, the price of which plaintiff was to pay in work, will not be enforced where the complaint fails to show how much work has been done, how much has been paid in that way, what is the balance due, or that there is any dispute on these points.

2. A contract to pay for a thing in money, and a supplemental contract to pay for the same in work, will not give the alternative right to pay either in work or money.

3. If the action of the court below is well taken on any ground, this court will affirm the ruling, without regard to the reasons which the court may have assigned therefor.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; N. HAMILTON, Judge.

Action by Samuel Wakeham against James L. Barker for specific performance of a contract for the sale of land, and for damages for non-performance. From a judgment in favor of defendant, plaintiff appeals.

Wm. H. Chapman, for appellant. Moore & Reed, for respondent.

FOX, J. This is an action for the specific performance of a contract for the sale of real estate. Plaintiff also prays for damages for non-performance, and, in case specific performance cannot be had, then for judgment for compensation for the payments already made, with damages for non-performance. The complaint shows that the plaintiff and defendant entered into an agreement in writing, for the sale by defendant to plaintiff, who also bound himself to buy a certain tract of land in consideration of $50 paid down, and the further sum of $700, to be thereafter paid in money, in monthly installments of $20 each, with interest on all unpaid balances payable monthly, at the rate of 9 per cent. per annum. If the contract had stopped there, there would have been no difficulty in plaintiff, if not himself in default, enforcing specific performance against the defendant. But, unfortunately for the enforcement of that remedy, afterwards, and on the same day, the parties entered into a supplemental agreement, in writing, whereby they modified and entirely changed the original agreement, as to the mode, manner, and time of payment. By this second agreement the interest was reduced to 6 per cent. per annum, and the defendant agreed to take his pay, and the plaintiff agreed to pay the said $700 and interest, in work and labor, to-wit, in painting and graining, at an agreed price per square yard, the defendant to furnish the plaintiff with painting and graining to do at the price so fixed, and to pay him 50 per cent. of the price so fixed in cash, the remaining 50 per cent. to apply on account of the said $700 and the interest thereon, until the whole amount thereof was paid, "the entire amount to be taken out within one year from September 1 1884."

It is a well-settled rule of law that specific performance will not be enforced against either party if it cannot be so enforced against the other. It is also well settled that specific performance for personal service cannot be enforced. It follows that the moment this supplemental agreement was made specific performance could not be enforced against the plaintiff, and, consequently, so long as the contract was not fully performed on his part, he could not enforce it against the other. Nevertheless, whenever he shows that, without default, he has fully performed on his own part, he may compel the other to convey as he has agreed to, or, if conveyance cannot be had, may recover in damages for the breach. But his present complaint does not make a sufficient showing for this purpose. The complaint is filed December 22, 1885. In it the plaintiff alleges that under this agreement he did perform "certain painting and graining for defendant, all of which was done in accordance with said agreement and prior to the 8th day of April, A. D. 1885." He further alleges that on said 8th day of April, 1885, defendant asserted that plaintiff had not complied with said agreements, and refused to furnish any more painting and graining to be done by plaintiff, and since then had procured his painting and graining to be done by other parties; that up to that time he had done all that was required of him by the defendant, and was, and still is, ready and willing and able to do the balance. But he nowhere tells us how much he had done, how much he had paid on account of the contract in that way, or what balance remained unpaid on account of the purchase price of the land; nor does he allege or show that there is a dispute between himself and the defendant on this point, or that he himself is ignorant on the point, or in any other way lay the foundation for an accounting between the parties. He does allege that on the 18th day of December, 1885, he demanded of defendant a deed of conveyance of said land, and offered to pay him $150 in gold coin, "as the balance in full due him upon said agreements," and that defendant refused to accept said sum and make such conveyance, but gave no reasons for such refusal. In the original agreement, time of payment was made "of the essence of the contract," and provision made for the forfeiture of payments already made, if other payments were in default for the period of 90 days after maturity. In the supplemental agreement this feature was eliminated from the contract, not in express terms, but by necessary implication.

This complaint was demurred to for want of sufficient facts to constitute a cause of action, and also for ambiguity; and the grounds of ambiguity are specifically pointed out. The demurrer was sustained on the ground of want of facts; but, in our judgment, it was well taken on both grounds. If well taken on any ground, this court will affirm the order of the court below, without regard to the reasons which the court may have assigned therefor. Thompson v. Felton, 54 Cal. 547; People v. Crowey, 56 Cal. 39; McCarthy v. Loupe, 62 Cal. 300; White v. Merrill, No. 12,224, ante, 1129, (filed December 10, 1889.) Plaintiff was given 20 days to amend, and it is unfortunate that he did not avail himself of the opportunity; but, instead of doing so, he, upon notice, moved for the default of defendant for not answering, and for judgment thereon, which was denied, when he excepted, and allowed judgment to go against him on the demurrer, from which he appeals.

On the appeal he claims that the two agreements, taken together, gave him the alternative of paying in painting or in money. We do not think the agreements will bear that interpretation, or that his right to relief grows out of the existence of an agreed alternative of which he could avail himself at pleasure. If it did, he would be cut off by the provisions of section 1450, Civil Code, which requires that he should select one or the other of the alternatives in its entirety. The measure of his total liability was fixed by agreement in money value. If he has paid a part in kind, and is now entitled, as he may be, to extinguish his obligation by paying the balance in money, it is not because of any alternative in the agreement, but because of the fact that the other party has put it out of his power to pay the balance in the way in which it was agreed to be paid, and has no right to deprive him of the benefit of that which he has paid by refusing to accept the balance in money. But, for the reasons already stated, he has not made the necessary allegations in his complaint to enable the court to furnish him this relief. Nor has he made his offer good under the statute even if sufficient in amount so as to extinguish his obligation. Id. § 1500. The allegations of this complaint are insufficient to authorize the court to furnish him relief in any of the forms demanded. It follows that the judgment must be affirmed. So ordered.

Bunting v. Salz et al.[1]

Wrongful Attachment—Damages—Evidence—Instructions.

1. In an action for the alleged wrongful attachment and sale of plaintiff's wagon to satisfy another's debt, evidence of its cost price is admissible to aid in determining its value at the time of the alleged conversion.

2. A memorandum given as a bill of sale of a "4-horse Concord" wagon, executed by the debtor to plaintiff, is competent evidence on the question of the sale, by the debtor to plaintiff, of the Concord wagon in dispute.

3. Where there is evidence that the wagon was sold to plaintiff through her agents, it is competent to show that delivery to and possession by one agent, for plaintiff, immediately followed the sale.

4. A question as to whether the debtor, subsequent to the sale and up to the time of the levy of the attachment, exercised any acts of ownership or control over the property, is not objectionable, as calling for opinion evidence.

5. The plaintiff's theory was that no change of possession was necessary if the property, at the time it was sold, was in the possession of a third party, who held it as plaintiff's agent by agreement of both parties. Defendant contended that the debtor, who was the agent's husband, had never transferred his possession as required by Civil Code Cal. § 3440. Held, that instructions on the law applicable, if the jury should find the evidence to sustain the theory of either party, were not contradictory.

6. An appeal from a judgment which is not taken within a year after the entry of the final judgment, as required by Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 939, will be dismissed.

Thomas C. Huxley, for appellants. Moore & Reed and F. B. Ogden, for respondent.

Foote, C. This appeal is taken from the judgment and an order denying a new trial. The appeal from the judgment must be dismissed, as it was taken more than one year after the entry of the judgment. Code Civil Proc. § 939; Coon v. Grand Lodge, 76 Cal. 354, 18 Pac. Rep. 384. The action was to recover $750 damages for the conversion of a wagon by the defendants, which the plaintiff claimed to be her property, and taken without her consent. The defendants Salz and Niehaus, and Trefry, a constable, in their answer denied the allegations of the plaintiff's complaint, and justified the alleged conversion on the ground that the property was that of John A. Bunting, and had been seized by Trefry under an attachment, judgment, and execution, in an action brought against Bunting by defendants Salz and Niehaus. The facts disclosed by the record are: That John A. Bunting was the child of Mrs. E. M. Bunting, who appears to have resided in New York. He owned a ranch in Alameda county, Cal., in the year 1883, and with his wife, Fleda O. Bunting, lived there from about the year 1877 until about December, 1883, when, being heavily in debt and apparently unable to extricate himself, he deeded the ranch to his mother, who, as before stated, was living in New York. He received from her at the time of the transfer $2,000 in cash, as part of the purchase price, and she assumed a mortgage for $4,000 already incumbering the land, and, as it appears, before that time, advanced to or paid for him about $3,000. Mr. Overacker, the father of John A. Bunting's wife, seems to have had chief charge of these negotiations for the absent plaintiff, and to have had the deed recorded as soon as executed, at her request; all the parties to the matter appearing at that time to suppose that the wagon and all other farming utensils were sold to the plaintiff by her son. The money received at that time, in cash, was paid out pro rata by John A. Bunting to his various creditors, among whom were Salz & Co., who appear to have been cognizant of the fact of the transfer of the ranch to Mrs. M. E. Bunting. After the transfer, the wife of John A. Bunting, as the agent for the plaintiff, assisted by Mr. Overacker, managed and carried on the farm. John A. Bunting does not seem, after that time, to have had any control or management of the farm or its concerns, or any personal property remaining thereon. He was employed as a railroad man, and was absent most of his time, and certainly after March, 1884, did not reside on the place, and claims that he voted in Los Angeles. From his evidence it appears that when he transferred the land to his mother he sold and delivered to her agent the wagon in dispute; but the bill of sale he made to the personal property on the land did not include it. The wagon remained on the place in the apparent and open possession of the wife, as agent of the mother, in pursuance of the sale, until April, 1885, when it was attached as the property of John A. Bunting, at the suit of one Dyer, Trefry, the defendant here, being then, as now, the officer levying the attachment. On this occasion the plaintiff was proceeding through Mr. Overacker and Mrs. Fieda O. Bunting, her agents, to recover the wagon as her property, but came to the conclusion that perhaps she could not establish satisfactorily her title to it, and apparently with a view to avoid litigation over the matter and effectually to secure her title to and possession of the property, paid off the debt, for the recovery of which the attachment was issued, and obtained from her son a memorandum in writing, signed by him, as follows:

[1] Reversed in banc. See 24 Pac. 167, 84 Cal. 168.

"San Francisco, 4 | 3, 1885.

"Mrs. E. M. Bunting,

"To John A. Bunting, Dr.

"(1) 4-horse Concord (built) $260 00

"Rec'd payment,

"JOHN A. BUNTING."

It was given as and for a bill of sale. The wagon, during the time it rested under the levy made upon it, remained on the ranch in charge of a keeper. When the levy was released, it was left, as before, in the possession of John A. Bunting's wife, who claimed it then, as she had always since the transfer of the land to the mother of her husband, as plaintiff's property. Mr. Overacker and his daughter, Mrs. F. O. Bunting, declared that the wagon was considered by them, (and so, also, says John A. Bunting,) from the time of the transfer of the ranch, as his mother's, and they all treated the conveyance of the land as good and valid in law, and the wife held actual possession of the land and the wagon, openly, as the property of the plaintiff; and after the transfer, having dealings with Salz, one of the defendants, in selling the products of the farm, he never claimed any right to offset any debt he owed for such produce with the indebtedness of John A. Bunting to Salz and Niehaus. But it appears that the wife had, in the year 1883, filed a declaration of homestead on the land, and this had never been abandoned, and she had not joined in the deed from her husband to his mother, but she never asserted any homestead right, and claimed to hold actual possession of the farm as the plaintiff's property. There were some circumstances developed on the trial which strongly induce the belief that the defendants knew this wagon was intended to be sold to the plaintiff when the transfer of the land was made, but there was no positive proof to that effect. The wagon was sold under execution sale at the suit of Salz and Niehaus, and bought by Salz for $160. No question was raised on the trial but what the plaintiff paid full value for the property she purchased, both real and personal. Nor was any claim made that the sale was fraudulent in fact. The main proposition contended for was that there was no such immediate delivery accompanying the sale and followed by an actual and continued change of possession of the property as is contemplated by section 3440 of the Civil Code.

The jury who tried the case found a verdict for the plaintiff in the sum of $525. The defendants contend that the evidence was insufficient to justify the jury in their action. An examination of the record satisfies us to the contrary.

Again, it is said that the court erred in allowing evidence to be introduced as to the cost price of the wagon. The cost price of the property, while not conclusive as to its value at the time of its conversion, is nevertheless a circumstance which is admissible to aid in arriving at the value at the time in question. Angell v. Hopkins, 79 Cal. 181, 21 Pac. Rep. 729. It is further objected that the alleged bill of sale, heretofore set out, was inadmissible in evidence, it being claimed in this connection that it did not purport to be a bill of sale of the wagon in dispute. The objection was not well taken. The memorandum in writing, signed by the party who is alleged to have made the sale of the Concord wagon in dispute, tended to throw light upon the matter of the sale of the wagon, and in that view, if no other, it was proper to go to the jury.

The appellant complains, also, that the trial court committed error in not striking out, upon his motion, the evidence of Mrs. F. O. Bunting, the wife of John A. Bunting, showing that in 1883, just after the transfer of the ranch, she, as the agent of the plaintiff, took possession of the wagon. There was evidence to the effect that the wagon was, at the time of the sale of the ranch, negotiated for and sold to the plaintiff through her agents, Overacker and Mrs. F. O. Bunting, and that it was bought by them for the plaintiff from John A. Bunting. This being so, it was proper to show that the possession and delivery immediately followed to the agent for the principal. It is also assigned for error that the court allowed, over the defendant's objection, this question to be put to and answered by the witness Mrs. F. O. Bunting: "Did Mr. Bunting, subsequent to the sale in 1883, and up to the time of the levy of the attachment by the defendants here, exercise any acts of ownership or control over that property?" The objection to the question was that it called for an opinion of the witness. As it seems to us, the question, fairly considered, called upon the witness to state facts, and was proper.

Further, the appellants claim that certain instructions given for them, and another by the court of its own motion, being correct expositions of the law applicable to the facts of the case, are contradictory to instructions asked by the plaintiff and granted by the court, by which the jury were misled. The plaintiff's theory of the case seems to be, that no change of possession was necessary, if the property at the time it was sold was in the possession of a third party, which party at the request of the vendor and vendee, agreed to retain its possession for the vendee, while the defendant's contention was that the vendor always had possession, and had not transferred it, as the law requires, to the vendee, under section 3440 of the Civil Code. The view of the law taken by the plaintiff is correct, according to the opinion of the appellate court in Williams v. Lerch, 56 Cal. 330. The instructions are not contradictory; they simply tell the jury what the law is, if they should believe the evidence to sustain either the plaintiff's or defendant's theory of the case. While it may be said that some of the instructions given did not lay down the law as broadly as might have been done, yet, when we come to construe them as a whole, we do not find that the court committed any error likely to mislead the jury.

The defendants further complain that certain instructions asked for by them and refused should have been given. Time and space do not permit of the discussion of them in detail, but from a careful inspection it appears to us that such of the principles of law embodied in them as were applicable to the case had already been given in other instructions; the others were not applicable to the case, and were properly refused.

We think the facts of this case are such that a jury may well have found as they did. Perceiving no prejudicial error, we advise that the appeal from the judgment be dismissed and the order affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; HAYNE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the appeal from the judgment is dismissed and the order affirmed.

UNDUE INFLUENCE—PLEADING—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. In an action to recover money deposited with defendant by plaintiff's intestate, the answer set up, as new matter, that plaintiff's intestate made a contract with defendant to care for, support, and maintain him during the remainder of his natural life, in consideration of $2,000, which he paid defendant, who maintained him under said agreement until his death, which occurred a little more than a year later. Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 462, provides that any new matter of affirmative defense is deemed to be denied. There was evidence that when decedent made the deposit he was old and weak in body and mind. Held, that an instruction as to the unfair advantage and undue influence of defendant over decedent was justified by the pleadings and evidence.

Hassett & Tevlin, for appellant. T. Z. Blakeman, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. C. Action to recover money alleged to have been left with defendant on deposit. Verdict and judgment for plaintiff. Appeal by defendant from the judgment and an order denying a new trial. It is alleged in the complaint that one Timothy Collins died on the 29th day of August, 1883; that plaintiff is the administrator of his estate; that defendant is a corporation, organized under the laws of this state, and that at all the times mentioned in the complaint it maintained and conducted a house, known as St. Mary's Hospital, wherein it received, boarded, lodged, and cared for persons for pay or hire; that on the 10th day of July, 1882, Collins became an inmate of said house, to be boarded, lodged, and cared for by defendant, and on the same day deposited with defendant the sum of $2,000 in gold coin; that the purpose of the deposit so made was to have the money safely kept by defendant, and a reasonable portion thereof applied in payment of the board, lodging, and care furnished him, and the balance thereof returned to him whenever he should depart from or cease to be an inmate of the house; that defendant received the money on the terms and conditions aforesaid, and agreed to observe the same; that Collins remained an inmate of the house and was cared for by defendant until he died; that $10 per week would be a reasonable compensation for the board, lodging, and care furnished him while he was an inmate of the house, and "that the balance of said sum of $2,000, to-wit, the sum of $1,400, is due and payable to the plaintiff by the defendant; and the defendant has neglected and refused to pay the same, or any part thereof, though requested to do so by plaintiff." A general demurrer was interposed to the complaint, and "overruled for want of prosecution." The defendant then answered. The answer denied that at the time named, or at any other time, "Collins deposited with the defendant the sum of $2,000 in United States gold coin, or ever deposited any sum of $2,000 with the defendant, except as hereinafter stated;" denies that said sum of $2,000 was deposited with or received by the defendant for the purposes, or on the terms and conditions, stated in the complaint; denies that $10 per week would be a reasonable compensation for the board, lodging, and care of Collins while an inmate of the house, or that $1,400, or any sum whatever, is due or payable to plaintiff by defendant. "And for a further and separate defense to this action" the answer alleges: "That the said Collins, on or about the date and time stated in the complaint, entered into a contract with the defendant whereby the defendant agreed to admit the said Collins into the said hospital, and take care of, support, and maintain him during the remaining period of his natural life, and provide him with a home in said hospital, and in consideration therefor the said Collins agreed to pay and did pay to the defendant the sum of $2,000, and thereupon entered the said hospital as his home under said agreement, and was cared for, boarded, and lodged therein by defendant until the said time of his death, according to the terms of the aforesaid agreement."

1. In support of the appeal it is claimed that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, because there was no averment of non-payment. The averment was that "defendant has neglected and refused to pay," etc. This we think is sufficient. To neglect to do a thing means to omit to do it,—not to do it,—and the averment was therefore equivalent to a statement that defendant had failed and refused to pay. O'Hanlon v. Denvir, 22 Pac. Rep. 407.

2. It is contended that the verdict was not justified by the evidence, and in support of this position several particulars wherein the evidence was insufficient are specified. Testimony was introduced tending to show that Collins was an unmarried man, about 60 years of age, and that he was diseased in body and somewhat shattered in mind. He had been employed as a laborer at the Mare Island navy-yard for several years, and had accumulated something over $4,000. He left Mare island in March, 1882, and in July following entered the defendant's hospital. A few days afterwards he gave into the hands of the mother superior, who had charge of the hospital, the sum of $2,000, in gold coin, and she gave to him a receipt therefor. She also at some time or times entered in a hospital book memoranda as follows:

Timothy Collins,
Paid $2,000 00
Came July 10, 1882. Died September 1, 1883.

In January, 1883, Collins drew from the Hibernia Bank the balance of his money, a little more than $2,000. Of this money he gave to the mother superior $200, to pay his funeral expenses, and to a Catholic priest, Father Maraschi, $200, to say masses. He also gave into the hands of the priest $700, for which he took the latter's promissory note. Speaking of this note, Father Maraschi testified that in August, 1883, "he [Collins] wanted me to keep the note then myself, and keep the money to say masses. Question. Keep all of it? Answer. And he told me he intended to bring $300 more, to make it a thousand. I told him then to keep the note until he would bring the other $300. Q. And you did not take it; and the whole amount was to go to you to say masses,—the whole amount represented by this note? A. Yes, sir. Q. And there was represented in the note at that time $700? A. Yes, sir. Q. Did he tell you where the $300 was? A. He mentioned he had to get it from the sisters." At that time the mother superior, as she testified, had none of Collins' money, except the $2,000 and the $200, placed in her hands as above stated. After Collins died, the note was found in his pocket, and sent to the maker. Father Maraschi testified: "A few days after he died, I don't know whether the same day, or one or two days after, they sent me a notice he had died, and sent me the note." The mother superior testified: "It remained in my hands for several months, * * * and so I just sent it to him." Witnesses were called by plaintiff to testify in regard to the physical and mental condition of Collins before and after he entered the hospital. David Collins, a nephew, stated, in substance, that decedent was a single man, and had never been married; that he left Mare island in March, 1882, to come to the city; that he was sickly then, and the witness thought a little out of his head; that he appeared to be weak; that before he left he lived alone by himself, in a little house, and did his own cooking; that he kept to the house a great deal, and was solitary in his habits; that he was a close attendant on the church. Witness had heard him say on different occasions that he had seen visions of his deceased sister; that he had seen spirits around him lots of times; that somebody came to his room at night, and blew something through the key-hole at him. Mrs. Rankin, a neice of decedent, stated that he was about 60 years of age at the time he was in the hospital, and was a very weak-minded sort of man; that he had consumption, and was very weak physically. "He said the patients had blown sulphur through the key-hole, and would take any money they could find; that he had seen his sister's vision, and that it was blown east,—went due east. You can never get him to talk on any subject, except about spirits and religion. He talked about spirits, and thought some one was going to try to do him harm. His mind was very weak." The plaintiff, husband of the witness, Mrs. Rankin, stated that he had known decedent for about seven years before his death; that he saw him four or five times while he was in the hospital; that he was suffering from disease; he looked old; "I would think he was suffering from consumption, or from general debility of some sort; his physical condition was very bad; he was very much changed from what he was in Vallejo, five years before; he was very weak; whenever he started to converse about anything it always wound up about hell; heard him speak about the death of his sister in the east; said he had seen her vision, and that just then she disappeared from him, and this vision went due east;" thought he must be weak in his mind, when he was always talking about this fear of death. In support of the affirmative defense set up in the answer, the mother superior was called as a witness, and testified as follows: "Timothy Collins came to the St. Mary's Hospital in July, 1882. I have a memorandum in my books showing his coming there. When he came he presented a letter testifying to his good character, and saying he was no longer able to work, and he would like to make an arrangement to remain for life, and asked what I would charge him. I said it depended on what he had and his own circumstances, and without the least hesitation he said: 'I will give you $2,000 if you will keep me as long as I live;' and I had no hesitation, but concluded with him at once, and in a few days he came. Question. Did he do anything that day further than to say he would give you $2,000? Answer. No; he only said that that day, and brought me a few days after— A day or two after, he brought me the money." It is admitted by the answer, and clearly appears from the evidence, that defendant received from Collins the sum of $2,000 about the time he was taken into the hospital. The plaintiff contended that the money was received under certain conditions, and the defendant that it was received under different conditions. The question for the jury to pass upon was, which contention was best supported by the evidence?

It is urged for appellant that the only testimony as to the terms and conditions under which the money was received was that of the mother superior, and that her testimony was therefore controlling and conclusive. But we think there were other facts and circumstances which were properly submitted to the jury, and which tended to contradict the mother superior in important particulars, and to justify the verdict. For example, the statement of Collins, made just before he died, to Father Maraschi, that he would get from the sisters and give to him, $300, when, according to the statement of the mother superior, he had no money subject to his disposal in her hands, is not in harmony with the theory of the defense. It is objected that this testimony was not admissible, but no objection to it was made during the trial, and the objection now comes too late. So it is objected that all the testimony in regard to the mental condition of Collins was inadmissible, because it did not appear that any one of the witnesses who testified upon that subject was an expert or an intimate acquaintance. But the only objection made to the testimony when it was offered was that it was not in rebuttal, and this objection was properly overruled. Looking at all the testimony, we cannot say that there were not sufficient contradictions to create a substantial conflict, and when such is the case the well-settled rule is that the conclusion of the jury will not be disturbed by the appellate court.

3. It is claimed for the appellant that the court erred in instructing the jury in respect to undue influence and unfair advantage. The claim is not, however, that the instruction was erroneous as an abstract proposition of law, but that there was no issue as to undue influence, and no evidence of undue influence. It is objected for respondent that there was no sufficient exception taken to the instruction complained of, and that the point made thereon cannot now be considered. But, waiving that objection, we think that the issues raised by the pleadings were sufficient to justify the instruction. Under our system of pleading the plaintiff is not required to reply to any new matter or affirmative defense set up in the answer, but it is deemed to be denied, and may be met by any competent proof. Code Civil Proc. § 462; Curtiss v. Sprague, 49 Cal. 301; Water Co. v. Raynor, 57 Cal. 588. And we also think that the evidence was sufficient to warrant the instruction. Collins was a religious devotee. He was sick, and the end of his earthly life was evidently not far distant. His mind was flighty, and he appears to have trusted implicitly in the mother superior. Under these circumstances, $2,000 seems a large sum to demand or take from him.

4. There is nothing to show that the damages were excessive, or that they were given under the influence of prejudice. If the plaintiff was entitled to recover at all, we think the amount found and awarded by the verdict not unreasonable, in view of the testimony. We find nothing in the record calling for a reversal, and we therefore advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNE, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

WRISTEN v BOWLES. (No. 12,134.)

VENDOR AND VENDEE—THE CONTRACT.

1. In an action for breach of contract to sell land, it appeared that the alleged contract consisted of letters written by the parties; that plaintiff offered to purchase, and asked the price; that defendant answered he would sell for $16 an acre, to which plaintiff replied asking easier terms; that defendant then wrote that his agent had an offer of $13 an acre cash, and asked plaintiff if he was willing to make the purchase; that to this plaintiff replied, "I am ready and willing to buy," but he still asked easier terms, and concluded the letter by saying: "The money is ready as soon as I can have it sent." Held, that there was no agreement in writing for the purchase and sale of the land.

2. On the failure to prove a written agreement, evidence tending to show an oral agreement for the purchase of the land was properly excluded, as such agreement, if made, was void under the statute of frauds.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; N. HAMILTON, Judge.

B. McKinne, for appellant. Reinstein & Eisner, for respondent.

FOX, J. This is an action for the recovery of the sum of $10,000 damages for the alleged breach of a contract for the sale of land. The case was tried before the court without a jury, and the defendant had judgment. Plaintiff moved for a new trial, which was denied, and plaintiff appealed. There are no findings in the record, nor does it affirmatively appear that findings were waived; but, as no point is made on the want of findings, we pass to a consideration of the case on its merits, assuming that the facts found support the judgment.

Appellant makes two points, the first of which is not very clearly stated, but which practically amounts to this: That the evidence does not support the judgment, but, on the contrary, was such as would support a judgment in favor of plaintiff. The other is that the court erred in excluding and striking out certain evidence.

The contention of appellant is that certain correspondence between the plaintiff and defendant, taken as a whole, was such as constituted an agreement in writing for the sale by defendant to plaintiff, and the purchase by plaintiff from defendant, of certain lands in Fresno county, at $13 per acre, one-half payable in cash upon the execution of the deed, and the balance in two equal annual installments. It seems from the record that 19 letters passed between the parties, 18 of which are given in full in the transcript, and the contents of the other are testified to by the plaintiff, who also testifies that the letter itself had been lost. We have read this correspondence, and the proof of the contents of the lost letter, entire, and find nothing in the whole which amounts to an agreement in writing binding upon either of these parties. It opens with a letter from plaintiff to defendant, dated December 26, 1883, asking for the price and terms upon which defendant will sell the land. The reply to this offers the property upon the terms above stated. Other letters pass without an acceptance of the offer, but proposing, on the part of plaintiff, different terms of payment until January 22, 1884, when the defendant writes to plaintiff advising him that he has another offer of $13, all cash, and asks the plaintiff if he is ready and willing to make the purchase, but concludes by saying: "In the mean time I will see what I can do, although I won't promise anything, as I am afraid Easton & Eldridge will hold me to the contract." (This referring to a contract with Easton & Eldridge, made before this correspondence was opened, by which the latter was authorized to sell the property, and under which they had procured this new offer of $13 cash.) To this the plaintiff replies, "I am ready and willing to buy," but still asks the modification of terms of payment, to which defendant had never acceded, and concludes his letter by saying: "The money is ready as soon as I can have it sent from Yolo. So, hoping to hear from you soon," etc. The preceding correspondence shows that the plaintiff was relying upon money to be sent from Yolo to make the first payment, and that it was insufficient to meet the terms proposed by defendant, and only sufficient to meet the modified terms proposed by plaintiff, and which were never accepted by defendant. Nothing in any of the subsequent correspondence shows that the minds of the parties ever met, or that any agreement was ever reached between them. The court below was therefore correct in holding, as it must have held, to reach the judgment given, that there was no agreement in writing between the parties for the purchase and sale of this property. It is for the court to determine whether letters which have passed between parties constitute an agreement between them. Luckhart v. Ogden, 30 Cal. 547. These letters certainly did not. To constitute a binding contract, made in this form, there must be a proposal squarely assented to. If the acceptance be not unqualified or go not to the actual thing proposed, then there is no binding contract. 1 Whart. Cont. § 4. A proposal to accept, or an acceptance based upon terms varying from those offered, is a rejection of the offer. Bank v. Hall, 101 U. S. 51. An offer imposes no obligation, unless it is accepted upon the terms upon which it was made. Tilley v. County of Cook, 103 U. S. 161. An acceptance must be absolute and unqualified. A qualified acceptance is a new proposal. Civil Code, § 1585. A proposal may be revoked at any time before its acceptance is communicated to the proposer. Id. § 1586. These principles of law are decisive of this case on the evidence.

There was no error in excluding the oral testimony which was objected to or stricken out. Plaintiff having failed to prove an agreement in writing, and there being no pretense of part or any performance on the part of either party, evidence tending to show an oral agreement, or an admission that there had been such an agreement, was incompetent and inadmissible. Such an agreement, if made, was void under the statute of frauds, and furnished no ground of recovery. Judgment and order affirmed.

KRANER v. HALSEY. (No. 12,485.)

ASSUMPSIT—PLEADING—LIMITATION OF ACTIONS.

1. A complaint which alleges that plaintiff advanced money for defendant at his special request, and that defendant refuses to pay the same, sufficiently states a cause of action without averring a promise by defendant to pay.

2. A demurrer on the ground that the cause of action is barred by limitation cannot be sustained when it does not appear from the complaint when the cause of action arose.

3. In California, a demurrer on the ground that the complaint is ambiguous, uncertain, and unintelligible, cannot be sustained unless all of these imperfections exist.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; T. H. REARDEN, Judge.

Action by P. H. Kraner against Abraham Halsey to recover money advanced by plaintiff for defendant in the purchase of certain shares of the capital stock of the Great Western Quicksilver Mining Company. Judgment upon demurrer for defendant, from which plaintiff appeals.

T. M. Osment, for appellant. Garber, Thornton & Bishop, for respondent.

THORNTON, J. Judgment passed for defendant herein, and plaintiff appealed therefrom. The questions to be considered arise on a demurrer to the complaint. The first ground of the demurrer, that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, is manifestly untenable. The complaint states the payment of a sum of money by plaintiff at the special instance and request of defendant, for which money so paid defendant is indebted to him, and that he (defendant) has failed and refused to pay this money, or any part of it. The law on the facts stated implies a promise by defendant to pay the money to the person paying it at defendant's request, and in such case it is unnecessary to aver the promise. That which is implied by law need not be averred. Steph. Pl. pp. 353, 354; Gould, Pl. c. 3, § 6. The preceding statements are matters of inducement only.

The second ground of demurrer is that the cause of action set forth in the complaint is barred by the provisions of section 337, and by subdivision 1 of section 339, and by section 343 of the Code of Civil Procedure of this state. These sections are a part of the statute law of this state, limiting the period within which actions may be commenced. It does not appear on the face of the complaint when the money was paid by plaintiff at the request of defendant. To hold that the cause of action sued on is barred on a demurrer to the complaint, it must so appear from the allegations of the complaint. Here it does not so appear. The date of the payment is not stated in the pleading. How, then, can any court say that the payment made at request of defendant was not made within 60 days, or 1 day, before the commencement of the action, or that the request of defendant, by reason of which the payment was made, was not made within 10 days before action brought. The demurrer must be determined on the allegations of the pleading before the court. A court is not allowed to speculate on what might have happened, or what might not have occurred, in view of the averments of the complaint. It must decide on the complaint and its averments. See Ord v. De La Guerra, 18 Cal. 75, where it was held that when a complaint shows prima facie, upon the facts stated, that the claim is barred by the statute of limitations, the defendant may take advantage of the defect by demurrer; yet it must clearly so appear. It is far from clearly appearing here. In fact, it does not appear at all. The second ground of demurrer is untenable.

A further and third ground of demurrer is "that the complaint is ambiguous, uncertain, and unintelligible," etc., in several particulars, which are specified. The specifications of uncertainty, ambiguity, and unintelligibility are in the demurrer designated by the letters from a to h, inclusive. As to specification a, it clearly appears that the action here is on the implied promise. What precedes this portion of the complaint is mere inducement, which might have been left out of the pleading without impairing its sufficiency. Specifications c, d, and h relate to inducement, and therefore to immaterial averments. The rule is never applied in the English practice to matters of inducement, (Steph. Pl. 292,) and should not be applied with any strictness here. Specification g relates to immaterial matter. Specifications e and f relate to times or dates, and in this regard the complaint may be considered uncertain. We are of opinion that the complaint is neither ambiguous nor unintelligible. It is uncertain in not stating the date or time of several issuable facts averred, and perhaps on other matters. If the defendant had demurred on the ground of uncertainty alone, and this is allowed by the statute, (Code Civil Proc. § 430, subd. 7,) we should hold that the demurrer for uncertainty was well taken. But the defendant has stated his grounds of demurrer conjunctively, "that the complaint is ambiguous, uncertain, and unintelligible." And when, upon a demurrer so framed, this court can see that the pleading is neither ambiguous nor unintelligible, we cannot hold the demurrer properly sustained, though it may in some particulars be so uncertain that a demurrer on such ground would lie. The defects and imperfections must be especially set down, as under the statute of 27 Eliz. c. 5, § 1, and 4 & 5 Anne, c. 16. See Gould, Pl. c. 9, pt. 1, § 9, et seq. The plaintiff is not called on, when the demurrer is taken, as in this case, to defend his complaint from each ground, when one of the grounds does not exist. All the defects pointed out and conjoined by the copulative particle "and" must exist, or the demurrer must be overruled. As to the alleged ambiguity of the complaint, we will further observe that "ambiguity" signifies "the quality or state of being ambiguous; doubtfulness or uncertainty, particularly of signification." Webster so defines it. He defines "ambiguous" in these words: "Doubtful or uncertain, particularly in respect to signification; equivocal; as an ambiguous course; an ambiguous expression." As illustrative of his definitions, he quotes the following couplet from Milton:

> Ambiguous, and with double sense deluding."

He gives as synonyms, "indeterminate; indefinite; doubtful; uncertain; unsettled; indistinct; equivocal." On reading the complaint with ordinary care, we cannot perceive that it can be pronounced either doubtful, uncertain, or equivocal in its meaning. The word "uncertainty" in the statute refers to the uncertainty defined by the authorities in pleading, and such authority does not include "ambiguity." As to what is uncertainty, see Gould, Pl. c. 3, §§ 51-101, and c. 4, §§ 23-37. Also, Steph. Pl. p. 279, § 4. In Salmon v. Wilson, 41 Cal. 595, it was held that a demurrer on the ground of ambiguity should be overruled, if enough appear to render the pleading demurred to easy of comprehension, and free from reasonable doubt. The allegations of the complaint are easy of comprehension, and free from reasonable doubt as to their meaning. We think they are clearly intelligible. The court below erred in sustaining the demurrer to the complaint. The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded. The court a quo is directed to overrule the demurrer to the complaint, with leave to defendant to answer, allowing the plaintiff, should he be so advised, to amend his complaint so as to make it more certain. Ordered accordingly.

Counter-Claim—Evidence—Book-Entries.

In an action to foreclose a mortgage given to secure a note, where defendant pleads a counterclaim for goods, etc., furnished to plaintiff, defendant's shop-book is admissible in evidence where he testifies that it is his only book of original entries; that he kept it himself; that all the items were correct, and were entered at the time they were severally transacted, except some outside accounts put in at the close of the shop account; and there is no objection to the manner in which the book was kept.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Mendocino county; R. McGarvey, Judge.

J. M. Mannon, T. L. Carothers, and Henley, Swift & Rigby, for appellant. C. C. Hamilton and J. A. Cooper, for appellee.

GIBSON, C. This was an action to foreclose a mortgage given to secure payment of a one-year note, dated November 3, 1880, for $450, with interest at the rate of 1½ per cent. per month of 30 days, payable at maturity of note, and, if not so paid, to become part of the principal and draw like interest. The defendant in his answer, in addition to a general denial, set up that he executed the note and mortgage solely in consideration of the promise of plaintiff to pay him the amount of the note; that plaintiff only paid him $250 of the amount, and refused to pay the remainder; and as a counter-claim he averred that plaintiff was indebted to him in the sum of $1,831.69 as a balance due on an account for goods, etc., money paid out to plaintiff's use, and for labor, all furnished, done, and performed at the request of plaintiff. The case was tried by the court, without a jury, upon all the issues except one, which was submitted to a jury in the following stipulated form: "Is the plaintiff indebted to the defendant upon the counter-claim set up in defendant's answer, and, if so, how much?" to which the jury responded, "Yes; $1,000." This special verdict was approved and adopted by the court as a finding upon the issue so found; and upon the other issues it found that the defendant was indebted to the plaintiff, upon the note in suit, in the sum of $909.90, and the sum of $50 for counsel fees for foreclosing the mortgage, and that there was a balance due from plaintiff to defendant of $40.10. Judgment was entered accordingly, from which, and from an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. The following are the only errors assigned in the statement: First, that the verdict is not sustained by the evidence; second, that the admission in evidence of the shop-book of defendant in his own behalf was erroneous.

The evidence is brief. At the time the note and mortgage were executed the defendant testified that he received $250, and made the note for $450, because the plaintiff gave him a letter of credit to a firm at San Francisco for whatever amount of goods he (the defendant) might purchase. How much he purchased on this letter of credit does not appear. He also testified that subsequently "we had a settlement on the 5th of March, 1882, in which the note and mortgage were not considered, whereby a balance was found and agreed upon between myself and Mr. White, amounting to $1,004.57, in his favor up to that date." This account stated was, by the tacit understanding of the parties, not brought into the case for adjustment,—was, in fact, studiously avoided by both of them. The defendant also testified that the total amount of items shown by his shop account, for which plaintiff became indebted after the statement of account between them March 5, 1882, amounted to $1,303.09; that the other items for goods furnished, services rendered, and money expended, to and for plaintiff, aggregated $218.75; that he kept the debits of the plaintiff, but gave him no credit for anything received from him from the time of their former settlement; and that the amount found due to plaintiff in that settlement was not credited to plaintiff on his shop-books, nor deducted from the said sum of $1,303.09. The testimony of one Davis shows that from March 27, 1882, to June 5, 1886, the plaintiff paid to him the sum of $854.88, for and on account of goods sold to the defendant, which plaintiff agreed with Davis to pay for, in the event of defendant's default. The plaintiff testified that defendant became indebted to him on account of other matters after March 6, 1882, viz.: A check for $320; a bundle of whips, $50; freight on leather, $3.35; twine, $1; rent of shop from March 5, 1882, for two years, at $10 per month, $240; 8½ yards of carpet, $6.37; and check on Hecht Bros. for $100; amounting in all to $720.72. On cross-examination he testified that the $320 check was given to defendant for the purpose of paying plaintiff's indebtedness to one Norton, for which amount he gave defendant credit on his books. Deducting this $320 from $720.72 leaves $400.72, and adding to this remainder $46.77, for items as testified to by plaintiff's witness, Rohrbough, makes $447.49. Deducting this total from the indebtedness of plaintiff to defendant as above shown, and it still leaves $1,074.35 due to defendant. This result is reached by assuming that the testimony of several witnesses is entitled to equal weight, and is sufficient to show that there was ample evidence to justify the special verdict which was adopted by the court. Moreover, as there is a decided conflict between the plaintiff and defendant as to several items in their respective accounts, an additional reason is presented to prevent us from disturbing the verdict.

The second question raised by the appellant must also be resolved against him. "In the United States a tradesman's book of original entries is in most jurisdictions received in evidence as prima facie proof, when supported by the trademan's oath." 1 Whart. Ev. § 678; 1 Greenl. Ev. §§ 117, 118. This rule, although not expressly declared, has been sanctioned in the following cases in this state: Lubert v. Chauviteau, 3 Cal. 458; Le Franc v. Hewitt, 7 Cal. 186; Caldwell v. McDermit, 17 Cal. 464; Caulfield v. Sanders, Id. 570; Carroll v. Storck, 57 Cal. 366. See, also, Roche v. Ware, 71 Cal. 375, 12 Pac. Rep. 284, and section 1947, Code Civil Proc.,—while in other cases such books have been regarded as secondary evidence. In Landis v. Turner, 14 Cal. 573, they were held to be competent evidence of services rendered, and of their value, and of specific material furnished and the price thereof, and in Severance v. Lombardo, 17 Cal. 57, to prove the delivery of goods, no higher evidence in either case having been attainable. Regarding his shop-book, the defendant testified that it was his only book of original entries, and was kept by himself; that all the items were correct, and all constituting the shop account were entered at the time they were severally transacted, but some other outside accounts—what they were does not clearly appear—were put in at the close of the shop account. There was no objection to the manner in which the book was kept. It was therefore properly admitted in evidence to prove the shop account. We therefore advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

Mott v. Mott. (No. 13,128.)

Divorce—Cross-Complaint—Dismissal.

1. An action for divorce is within Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 442, providing that "whenever the defendant seeks affirmative relief against any party, relating to or depending upon the contract or transaction upon which the action is brought, or affecting the property to which the action relates, he may, in addition to his answer, file * * * a cross-complaint."

2. Where plaintiff, after answering defendant's cross-complaint, files an amended complaint, to which a demurrer is sustained, with leave to file a second amended complaint, which plaintiff refuses to do, the order sustaining the demurrer does not operate as a dismissal of the cross-complaint, but leaves the issues joined by it and the answer still pending.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; W. P. Wade, Judge.

Wells, Guthrie & Lee and Houghton, Silent & Campbell, for appellant. Glassell, Smith & Patton, Smith, Howard & Smith, Anderson, Fitzgerald & Anderson, F. H. Howard, and Smith, Winder & Smith, for respondent.

Fox, J. Plaintiff filed his complaint against the defendant for divorce, on the ground of extreme cruelty and desertion. In due time defendant answered, denying all the allegations of cruelty and of desertion, and at the same time filed a cross-complaint, full in all its forms, and containing allegations showing a good ground for divorce[1] against the plaintiff, and also showing that the plaintiff had come into the possession of a considerable sum of money, the separate property of defendant, which he had never repaid to her, and asking, by way of affirmative relief, that plaintiff be required to pay her permanent alimony and support, and to provide funds for her counsel fees and costs of suit, but does not pray in direct terms for divorce, although she does ask for "such other and further relief as to the court may seem proper and just in this behalf." In due time plaintiff answered to this cross-complaint, putting in issue all the allegations thereof as made against himself, and subsequently, by leave of the court, filed an amended complaint on his own behalf against the defendant. To this amended complaint the defendant demurred. When the demurrer came on for hearing the plaintiff confessed the demurrer, and on his confession the same was sustained, with leave to plaintiff to file a second amended complaint within 10 days. This the plaintiff failed, and subsequently formally declined, to do. Afterwards the defendant filed and served a petition for an increase of alimony pendente lite, an order having been made, at an earlier stage in the proceedings, allowing her $35 per month, when plaintiff objected in writing to the hearing thereof, claiming to appear specially for that purpose, setting up as the ground of his objection that, by reason of the order sustaining the demurrer to his amended complaint, and of his refusal to file a second amended complaint, "the said action has been and is, by reason of the premises, dismissed, and is not, and has not been since the expiration of said ten days, a pending action, and said defendant is not in court for any purposes of said action." Upon the hearing and consideration of this petition, and the objection so made thereto, the court held that "the cause is not now pending, and the court has no jurisdiction of the plaintiff," to which ruling the defendant excepted. Six months afterwards the plaintiff, upon notice to the defendant's counsel, applied to the court "to enter up the proper judgment in said action, dismissing the same, consequent upon the refusal of the plaintiff to amend his complaint," and the court three months later denied said motion. Seven months later the cause came up regularly on the calendar for trial, when the plaintiff moved that it be stricken from the calendar, on the ground that there was no such cause pending in the court; that it had been thereto fore adjudicated "that the cause is not pending in this court;" and that "if this suit is still pending there is no issue joined." This motion was granted by the court, and thereupon plaintiff's counsel moved the court to dismiss the action, upon which motion it was by the court "ordered, adjudged, and decreed that plaintiff's action herein be dismissed, and the same be hereby finally dismissed, and that the defendant have her execution for her costs in this behalf expended." To which ruling and decision the defendant, by her counsel, excepted. Upon this order judgment of dismissal was duly entered, and the defendant appeals; the whole case coming up on a bill of exceptions.

The real question on this appeal is whether the court had the right or power, on the motion of plaintiff, to dismiss the action. The statute upon the subject is found in section 581, Code Civil Proc. That section, so far as it has any bearing upon this case, reads: "An action may be dismissed, or a judgment of nonsuit entered, in the following cases: (1) By the plaintiff himself, at any time before trial, upon payment of costs, provided a counter-claim has not been made, or affirmative relief sought, by the cross-complaint or answer of defendant." Under this section, if affirmative relief is sought by the defendant, the plaintiff cannot dismiss. Robinson v. Railroad Co., 65 Cal. 266, 3 Pac. Rep. 878; Clark v. Hundley, 65 Cal. 96, 3 Pac. Rep. 131. But, to prevent such dismissal, the counter-claim or cross-complaint must be one upon which the defendant would be entitled to affirmative relief. Belleau v. Thompson, 33 Cal. 496.

This leads directly to a consideration of the main point of discussion in this case, whether a defendant in an action for divorce can file a cross-complaint, and upon such cross-complaint secure affirmative relief. Section 442, Code Civil Proc., provides: "Whenever the defendant seeks affirmative relief against any party, relating to or depending upon the contract or transaction upon which the action is brought, or affecting the property to which the action relates, he may, in addition to his answer, file at the same time, or, by permission of the court, subsequently, a cross-complaint." Counsel for respondent insists, and this seems to be the view adopted by the court below that an action for divorce does not come within the purview of this section; that it is not an action upon a contract; that the transaction relied upon in the cross-complaint is not the transaction upon which the action is brought; and that it is not an action which relates to property. In all three of these propositions, so far, at least, as relates to this case, we think the counsel is mistaken. The action was brought by plaintiff to dissolve the marriage relation. That relation is one arising out of civil contract. Civil Code, § 55. That contract is one "by which a man and woman reciprocally engage to live with each other during their joint lives, and to discharge towards each other the duties imposed by law on the relation of husband and wife." Bouv. Law Dict. tit. "Marriage." It is a contract of so solemn and binding a nature, and which so affects the public weal, that the consent of the parties alone, even though they are capable of consent, will not constitute marriage, or create the relation of marriage, (Civil Code, § 55,) but one to which the consent of the state is also required, (Dyer v. Brannock, 2 Mo. App. 432.) That consent is granted by statute upon the condition of solemnization, (Id.,) or of the mutual assumption of marital rights, duties, and obligations, (Civil Code, § 55.) By the contract the husband and wife bind themselves to "obligations of mutual respect, fidelity, and support." Id. § 155. The object and legal effect of a decree of divorce from the bonds of matrimony, which was the relief sought by the plaintiff in this case, is to annul such a contract, and absolve the parties from the duties and obligations which it imposes. How, then, can it be said that it is not an action upon contract? If there is no contract, there can be no marriage. If there is no marriage, there can be no divorce. In support of the theory of respondent, we are cited to De Haley v. Haley, 74 Cal. 491, 16 Pac. Rep. 248, a case in which there was no cross-complaint, and the question of the right to file a cross-complaint was not involved, but in which Mr. Justice McKINSTRY suggests that "it is at least doubtful whether the Codes provide for a cross-complaint in actions for divorce," and gives as a reason for the doubt that the action is not brought on the "contract" of marriage, but upon certain violations of duties or obligations annexed to the status of matrimony. All that was said in that case on that subject was pure dicta, for in the case there was no cross-complaint, and the question was not at all involved. Nothing on the subject was necessary to the decision of the case. And, even as argument in support of the doubt expressed, it was speculative and unsatisfactory. Suppose the action is brought "upon certain violations of duties or obligations annexed to the status of matrimony." The status itself depended upon the contract, and without the contract there would have been no such duties or obligations. As in the case of any other kind of contract, the cause of action, if there be one, is not the contract itself, but the violation of some duty or obligation imposed by the contract, which violation constitutes in law a breach of the contract. It is that breach which gives the cause of action. So here the contract of marriage creates a status (as does also a contract of partnership, although a different one) by reason of which the law imposes upon each party to the contract certain duties and obligations, the violation of which constitutes a breach of the contract, and gives a cause of action. In Coulthurst v. Coulthurst, 58 Cal. 239, this court distinctly recognized the right to file a cross-complaint in an action for divorce, although in that case it reversed a judgment rendered on the cross-complaint on the ground, not that such relief could not be granted, but that the cross-complaint did not state the necessary facts to give the court jurisdiction. Again, in Lowell v. Lowell, 55 Cal. 316, the right was recognized, and a judgment affirmed which had been rendered on the cross-complaint; and incidentally the court has recognized this right in several other cases. Recently, in the case of Wadsworth v. Wadsworth, 22 Pac. Rep. 648, the point was directly involved, and, under the constitution, had to be passed upon, for the guidance of the court below. It was then very carefully considered, and a large number of authorities cited from English and American courts in support of the decision made, that a cross-complaint may be filed in an action for divorce. We see no reason for doubting the correctness of that decision; and, if it was a matter open to doubt, the doubt ought now to be resolved in favor of the rule, for it has been a rule of action in this state so long that not only property rights, but personal relations of husbands, wives, parents, and children, are in so many instances dependent upon it that the consequences of a reversal would be too serious for contemplation. In view of what has already been said, it is perhaps unnecessary to consider what the respondent says in reference to the fact that the cross-complaint is not upon the transaction upon which the complaint is brought, or that the defendant's cause of action is not one which affects the property to which the action relates; but we may say briefly, as to the transaction, that one of the grounds upon which the plaintiff brought the action was desertion, and that the cross-complaint refers to and builds upon the same transaction, but sets up facts tending to show that the desertion was on the part of the plaintiff, and not of the defendant. The settlement of property rights between the parties is an incident of every decree for divorce, where there is any property involved. In his complaint the plaintiff prays for such settlement, and in her cross-complaint the defendant also asks the same, and both refer to the same property. Hence it seems to us that in every view of this case the cross-complaint is one authorized by the section of the Code quoted.

But it is also claimed that the defendant cannot complain of the dismissal in this case, for that it was entered at her own instance. The record does not so show. It is true that she demurred to plaintiff's amended complaint, and her demurrer was sustained. Since plaintiff refused to amend, that left him with nothing to try as against the defendant; but his answer to her cross-complaint stood, and there was a distinct issue between the parties upon her cross-complaint, and the answer thereto, upon which she was entitled to be heard, and to have such relief as the law and the facts would warrant. There is nothing in the proposition of respondent that the amended complaint superseded all other pleadings in the case, and the case cited in support of the proposition (Thompson v. Johnson, 60 Cal. 295) does not support that position, though the language quoted, when taken from its context, might seem to do so. In that case there was no cross-complaint, and all the issues were framed upon the complaint itself. In this case there was a cross-complaint, distinct and complete in all its parts, and an answer thereto; and these did not fall with the fall of plaintiff's complaint. The order of dismissal was made on plaintiff's motion. The order does not follow the precise language of the motion, but on it a judgment of dismissal of the action was entered. The judgment so entered is against law; and it is ordered that the same be reversed, and the case remanded, to be placed on the calendar of the court below for trial on the issues framed by the cross-complaint of defendant, and the answer thereto.

People v. Blake. (No. 13,370.)

School Lands—Vacation of Judgments.

1. A deed of school land, made before a certificate of purchase was issued to the grantor, passes no interest under the statute (in force in 1869) providing that a subsequently-acquired legal estate shall pass to the grantee, where it does not appear that the grantor had made an application to purchase the land, or had paid anything on it.

2. Where the record is silent as to whether a deed conveying the interest of one who holds a certificate of purchase of school lands was ever recorded as required by Laws Cal. 1867-68, p. 507, the presumption is that it was never recorded.

3. A judgment foreclosing the grantor's interest in the lands conveyed will not be set aside on motion, 16 years after its rendition.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; J. B. Campbell, Judge.

Frederick S. Stratton, for appellant. R. B. Terry, W. D. Tupper, and Sayle & Coldwell, for respondent.

Belcher, C. C. This action was commenced on the 27th day of July, 1872, to foreclose the interest of the defendant, Blake, in a certain half section of school land situate in the county of Fresno, and to annul the certificate of purchase therefor, issued to him on the 12th day of February, 1869. Summons was issued and placed in the hands of the sheriff of the county, and on the 1st day of August following was returned by him, with his certificate "that after due diligence the therein named defendant cannot be found within the county." An affidavit was then made by the district attorney, setting forth "that the name or residence of the holder of the certificate of purchase described in the above-entitled action is unknown to him; wherefore deponent asks that service of the summons in this action be had by publication," etc. Upon this affidavit an order was made by the county judge that the summons be served on the defendant by publication in a weekly newspaper published in the county, and "that such publication be made at least once a week for four successive weeks." The summons was published in the paper designated, as shown by the affidavit of one of its publishers, "four times, beginning with the 7th day of August, 1872, and ending with the 28th day of August, A. D. 1872." The defendant made no appearance, and on the 16th day of October, 1872, judgment, reciting that the defendant had been duly served with process according to law, was entered by default, as prayed for. The appellant, McDonald, on the 20th day of July, 1888, made a motion to have this judgment vacated and set aside, on the ground that it was invalid and void, because when it was entered the court had not acquired jurisdiction of the person of the defendant. At the hearing of the motion, as stated in the bill of exceptions, "counsel for said McDonald produced a conveyance from defendant, Blake, to said McDonald, dated September 24, 1868, for the certificate of purchase and lands described in the complaint, and showed thereby that the said McDonald became, on said date, by grant, the successor in interest of defendant in and to said land and certificate."

1. The first question to be considered relates to the right of the appellant to contest the validity of the judgment. It will be observed that the deed under which he asserts the right was executed nearly five months before the certificate of purchase was issued, and that there is nothing in the record tending to show that when it was executed Blake had made any application to purchase the land, or had made any payment therefor. It is argued for appellant that a fee-simple title is presumed to pass by a grant of real property, and that the deed in question was a grant, and by operation of law any subsequently acquired title inured to the grantee; citing sections 1105, 1106, Civil Code. And it is claimed that by virtue of the deed appellant became the assignee of the subsequently issued certificate of purchase, and the owner of Blake's subsequently acquired equitable interest in the land. When the deed was made the Codes had not been adopted. The statute then in force relating to conveyances (section 33) provided as follows: "If any person shall convey any real estate, by conveyance purporting to convey the same in fee-simple absolute, and shall not, at the time of such conveyance, have the legal estate in such real estate, but shall afterwards acquire the same, the legal estate subsequently acquired shall immediately pass to the grantee, and such conveyance shall be valid, as if such legal estate had been in the grantor at the time of the conveyance." In Cadierque v. Duran, 49 Cal. 356, it was held that a party, who has only filed an application with the surveyor general to purchase state land, has acquired no right in the land which he can transfer to another. In Stanway v. Rubio, 51 Cal. 41, a claim similar to that presented here was made under the above-cited section of the statute. But in that case it appeared that the application to purchase the land had been made and approved, and 20 per cent. of the purchase money and the first and second year's interest on the balance had been paid before the deed was executed. It was held that the deed vested in the grantee the after-acquired title of the grantor, but the conclusion of the court seems to have depended upon and to have been controlled by the facts above stated. In view of these authorities, we do not think appellant's claim can be upheld.

2. But, however this may be, the case shows that the appellant took no steps to question the validity of the judgment for about 16 years after it was rendered; and the record is silent as to whether or not his deed was ever recorded by the county recorder, or reported to the register to be entered in the books of his office, as required by the sixty-ninth section of the "Act to provide for the management and sale of the lands belonging to the state," passed in 1868, (St. 1867-68, p. 507.) The presumption, therefore, is that the deed never was recorded or reported. This being so, it is apparent that the land in question may have been sold to other parties, who may have purchased it in good faith, and may have improved and occupied it for many years. In People v. Goodhue, 80 Cal. 199, ante, 66, a motion was made on the 31st of December, 1888, to vacate a judgment rendered on the 30th of October, 1865, of the same character as that involved here. This court affirmed the order of the court below, denying the motion, and said: "A judgment cannot be attacked in this informal way years after its rendition." We think that decision should be followed in this case, and therefore advise that the order appealed from be affirmed.

VACATION OF JUDGMENTS.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Tulare county; W. C. VAN FLEET, Judge.

W. B. Wallace, for appellant. Freeman & Bates, for respondents.

HAYNE, C. This is an appeal from an order vacating a judgment upon the ground that the court had not acquired jurisdiction of the parties. The judgment vacated was for the foreclosure of the interest of the respondents here in a certificate of purchase in certain state lands. It was entered in 1873, and was not void on its face. The motion to vacate it was made in 1889. We understand that the case of People v. Goodhue, 80 Cal. 199, ante, 66, decides that in such a case relief cannot be had upon motion. If prior cases are inconsistent with this, they must be considered as overruled. The Goodhue Case was approved and followed by department 2 in People v. Blake, ante, 1142, filed January 11, 1890. Probably it lays down a more wholesome rule, because, if the party be compelled to resort to a court of equity, conditions may be imposed in a proper case. At any rate it is desirable that the point should be settled. We therefore advise that the order appealed from be reversed.

WILLS—OMITTED CHILDREN—POWER OF SALE.

Under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1561, providing that "when property is directed by the will to be sold, or authority is given in the will to sell property, the executor may sell any property of the estate without order of the court," and section 1307, providing that children of a testator omitted from a will must inherit from the testator "as if he had died intestate," a power of sale in a will does not authorize the sale of the interests of children not mentioned in the will, without the previous sanction of the probate court required in ordinary cases, and a subsequent confirmation of the sale by the court does not validate it.

Chapman & Hendricks, for appellants. C. Edgar Galbraith and Anderson, Fitzgerald & Anderson, for respondents.

Hayne, C. Suit to quiet title. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendants appeal. In 1880 the owner of the property died leaving a will by which the whole property was devised to the widow, who was made sole executrix without bonds, and it was provided that "she have absolute power to sell any or all of said real and personal property at public or private sale, with or without advertisement, and without application to any court, and without approval or authority of any court whatever." The will was admitted to probate, and letters testamentary were issued to the widow. Acting under the power contained in the will, she sold the property to the defendant Eliza J. Olmstead without obtaining an order of sale from the probate court. She reported her proceedings to the court, however, and an order confirming the sale was made, and a conveyance executed. The plaintiffs are the four minor children of the testator. They were not mentioned or in any way referred to in the will, and claim as pretermitted heirs. The main question argued is whether the power of sale given by the will authorized a sale of the children's interests without the previous sanction of the probate court required by the Code of Civil Procedure in ordinary cases. This seems to us to be a question of construction. The provision of the Civil Code in relation to a child of whom no mention is made in a will is that he "must have the same share in the estate of the testator as if he had died intestate, and succeeds thereto as provided in the preceding section." Civil Code, §1307. The "preceding section" is in relation to children born after the making of the will, either during the life-time of the testator or after his death, and provides that such a child "succeeds to the same portion of the testator's real and personal property that he would have succeeded to if the testator had died intestate." So far as the question in hand is concerned these provisions are in substance the same as those of the statute of wills previously in force. The provision of the Code of Civil Procedure in relation to powers of sale is substantially the same as section 178 of the old probate act, as amended in 1861, and is as follows: "Sec. 1561. When property is directed by the will to be sold, or authority is given in the will to sell property, the executor may sell any property of the estate without order of the court, and at either public or private sale, and with or without notice, as the executor may determine, but the executor must make return of such sales as in other cases; and if directions are given in the will as to the mode of selling, or the particular property to be sold, such directions must be observed. In either case, no title passes unless the sale be confirmed by the court." We do not find that the cases in this state cited by counsel determine the question presented. In Estate of Delaney, 49 Cal. 76, it was held that where the legal title is devised to the executor the provisions requiring order of sale, confirmation, etc., do not apply. In Estate of Durham, Id. 495, it was held that where the legal title is not devised to the executor, and he has a naked power of sale, the provision requiring a confirmation applies, and that such confirmation must be according to prescribed formalities. The latter decision is not in point, because here there was a confirmation, to which no objection is taken. And the former decision is not in point, because it is settled that the legal title descends to and vests in the pretermitted heir, who becomes a tenant in common with the devisees, if there are any valid devises. Pearson v. Pearson, 46 Cal. 627. This latter case, however, while it shows that the rule laid down in Delany's Estate has no application, does not determine the question involved here, which is whether the omitted child takes the title subject to the power of sale or not. In Oregon it has been held that a power of sale in a will does not cover the interest of a posthumous child not mentioned in the will. Northrop v. Marquam, 18 Pac. Rep. 457. In that state, however, the statute provided that so far as such child was concerned the testator "shall be deemed to die intestate," which is somewhat broader language than that of our statute. In New York the statute is substantially the same as ours. And in that state it is held that the share of a child born between the making of the will and the death of the testator, and not mentioned in the will, is not affected by a power of sale contained in the will. Smith v. Robertson, 89 N. Y. 558. The argument in favor of the omitted child seems to be that if the testator had died intestate the interest of such child could only be sold in certain cases, and after certain formalities, and that the statute provides, in substance, that the omitted child shall inherit from the testator "as if he had died intestate." The argument, on the other side, is that the statute only provides that the omitted child shall inherit "the same share" as if the testator had died intestate, and that while such share goes to the child it is subject to the other provisions of the will. Each of these arguments seems to us to assume the real question in dispute. And the case is such that no satisfactory conclusion can be reached from a consideration of the mere language of the statute. But we think that a due regard for the interests of pretermitted heirs requires that the safeguards provided by law against improper sales of their property should only be dispensed within a clear case; that this cannot be said to be a clear case, because the law presumes that the omission of all mention of a child was from accident, misapprehension, or forgetfulness, and it cannot be concluded with any degree of certainty that the testator would have given a power of sale of the child's interest if the fact that it would have an interest had been present to his mind. If, for example, a testator supposes that his child is dead, and under that belief devises his whole property to one not of his blood, it is very natural that he should make such devisee sole executor, and give him unrestricted power of sale. But would he have given such power to the devisee if he had known that his child was alive, and would inherit the whole estate? Upon the whole, though the matter is not free from doubt, we think it better that the rule laid down by the New York case should be followed, viz., that, inasmuch as the devise of the child's interest is inoperative, the power of sale of his interest should be construed not to apply to it. The order of confirmation was not conclusive of the legality of the sale. We therefore advise that the judgment appealed from be affirmed.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

LUBBOCK v. McMANN et al. (No. 12,053.)

HOMESTEAD—IMPROVEMENTS.

Const. Cal. art. 17, § 1, provides that "the legislature shall protect by law from forced sale a certain portion of the homestead and other property of all heads of families." Civil Code Cal. § 1237, provides that "the homestead consists of the dwelling-house in which the claimant resides, and the land on which the same is situated," selected according to law. Held, that where a lot and house are legally selected, and held as a homestead, a second house, subsequently erected on the lot, which does not increase the value of the entire property beyond the amount exempted as a homestead, is, with the land on which it stands, within the homestead exemption, and not liable to sale on execution, though it is used for renting. PATERSON, J., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. V. COFFEY, Judge.

Action by Mrs. Lubbock against McMann and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appealed. On September 9, 1889, department 1 of the supreme court rendered judgment of affirmance, and the following opinions were filed:

"FOX, J. In 1872, plaintiff and her husband were residing upon a certain lot of land in the city and county of San Francisco, having twenty-five feet front, and extending back eighty feet to an alley. The lot, with the small dwelling-house on the front thereof, was the community property of plaintiff and her said husband. On the 2d of December of that year she recorded the same as a homestead. The regularity of this dedication and recording of the homestead is conceded. At some period after the property had been so dedicated and recorded as a homestead, the Lubbocks built another small house, on the rear of the lot, wholly disconnected from the one in which they lived, and fronting on the alley, which they rented out. Afterwards, one Sobey recovered a judgment in a justice's court against the husband of plaintiff, upon which he took out execution, and placed it in the hands of defendant McMann, then sheriff, who, under the direction of the judgment creditor, levied upon the whole of the lot so recorded as a homestead, and advertised the same for sale. Plaintiff, after notifying the sheriff of the homestead character of the property, and demanding a release from said levy, filed her complaint in this action, setting up the material facts hereinbefore recited, showing the homestead character of the property, alleging that at the time of recording the said homestead claim the property was not, and is not now, of a greater value than $5,000, and praying for an injunction to restrain the defendant from making such sale. An order was issued to show cause why an injunction should not be granted as prayed, and restraining the sale in the mean time. Upon the return-day of the order to show cause, the case was heard upon the complaint of plaintiff, the answer of defendants admitting all the material allegations of the complaint, and setting up in addition the fact of the erection of the second tenement above referred to, after the recording of the homestead, and the fact that the same was not occupied by the homestead claimants as a place of residence, but was rented out, they residing in the original dwelling-house on the lot, and, on demurrer to said answer, that the same did not state facts sufficient to constitute a ground of defense to said action. While the record does not disclose the fact, it is conceded by counsel here that at the hearing it was understood that judgment final should follow the result of the submission of the case on those pleadings and demurrer. The court sustained the demurrer, and judgment went for plaintiff, perpetually enjoining the sale. From this judgment the appeal is taken.

"Appellants criticise the action of the court below in issuing the restraining order, pending the hearing of the order to show cause, without requiring plaintiff to file a bond thereon, but expressly admit that, in view of the final result, no injury resulted to them, and seem to waive any adjudication here as to the regularity of that proceeding. We perceive no error in the order of the court sustaining the demurrer to the answer; and, defendants declining to amend, the judgment followed as a necessary sequence. No question being raised as to the remedy, the plaintiff was thereupon entitled to her perpetual injunction. No bond is required upon granting such relief. It is admitted that the homestead was regularly created. There is no pretense that it had ever been abandoned, or even that it had been enhanced in value beyond the homestead exemption. The claim is simply that it became 'vitiated' quoad the rear of the lot upon which the new tenement had been erected. But there is no provision of the statute defining by what means, or under what circumstances, a homestead may become 'vitiated;' nor is any particular part of the homestead tract levied upon as being the part relieved from the homestead lien by this new process of vitiation. The levy is upon the whole tract, an unknown part of which, it is admitted, is still subject to a valid homestead claim. Judgment and order appealed from affirmed.

"I concur: WORKS, J.

"PATERSON, J. I concur in the judgment. The execution was levied upon the whole of the property, including the homestead, which is exempt from execution or forced sale. The remedy of the execution creditor is against that portion of the premises included within the homestead declaration, which has ceased to be part of the homestead. It may be a difficult question to determine how the property which does not belong to the homestead should be described, but the fact that such a difficulty exists does not excuse a levy upon the homestead itself. If there are any natural or artificial boundaries between the dwelling-house of the homestead claimant and that of his tenants, it will be easy to make a proper description of the property subject to sale, or it might be described as that portion of the premises described in the declaration not actually used by the family as a homestead. It is claimed by respondent that, inasmuch as the dwelling-house now occupied by the tenant was placed upon the land subsequent to the filing of the declaration of the homestead, and because the entire property is now under the value of $5,000, no portion of the premises described in the declaration of homestead is subject to execution or forced sale. There is no merit in this contention. The constitution provides that 'the legislature shall protect by law from forced sale a certain portion of the homestead and other property of all heads of families.' Article 17, § 1. Acting upon this provision, the legislature has provided that 'the homestead consists of the dwelling-house in which the claimant resides, and the land on which the same is situated.' Section 1237, Civil Code. 'The homestead is exempt from execution or forced sale, except as in this title provided.' Section 1240. The question before us is not one of abandonment or vitiation of the homestead in its entirety, but a question of exemption. What property is exempt from execution or forced sale? 'It [the homestead] represents the dwelling-house in which the family resides, with the usual and customary appurtenances, including outbuildings, of every kind, necessary or convenient for family use, and lands used for the purposes thereof. * * * The only tests are use and value. The former is both abstract and statutory; the latter statutory alone.' Gregg v. Bostwick, 33 Cal. 228. 'The mere filing of a declaration of homestead does not of itself constitute the premises embraced within it the homestead of the declarant. The use of the property is an important element to be considered.' Laughlin v. Wright, 63 Cal. 116. Referring to Gregg v. Bostwick, Mr. Thompson, in his work on Homesteads and Exemptions, says: 'This last case very clearly conducts us to the rule that houses built for the purpose of being rented to tenants, thus yielding the debtor a revenue separate from any use immediately connected with his dwelling, form no part of his homestead.' Section 130. In Ashton v. Ingle it was held that, in order to be exempt, the property claimed as a homestead must be 'occupied as a residence by the family of the owner. * * * Any portion of his real estate not so used and so occupied will not be exempt, whatever may be the extent or value of such real estate, great or small. * * * Where houses and lots are rented for a money rent to tenants, who are not servants or employes of the owner, with the intention that such houses and lots shall become the homes and residences of such tenants and their families, and they actually do become the homes and residences of such tenants and their families, the owner, certainly, cannot then claim that such houses and lots are a part of his own home and residence, although they may adjoin the same.' 20 Kan. 670. See, also, Austin v. Stanley, 46 N. H. 51, Kurz v. Brusch, 13 Iowa, 371; Casselman v. Packard, 16 Wis. 114."

On September 27, 1889, the following order was filed by the court in bank:

"PER CURIAM. The parties to this cause having filed their stipulation in writing, by which the respondent waives the point upon which the judgment was affirmed, and the appellants waive all errors by them assigned which are not involved in the single question whether or not the second house mentioned in the record is exempt from execution, and having jointly petitioned for a reconsideration of the cause upon that point alone, it is ordered that the judgment of affirmance heretofore rendered be, and the same is, hereby vacated and set aside, and the cause ordered resubmitted in bank as of this date, upon briefs on file. BEATTY, C. J.; WORKS, J.; PATERSON, J.; FOX, J."

Frank M. Stone, for appellants. Geo. D. Collins, (Sawyer & Burnett, of counsel,) for respondent.

FOX, J. Judgment was rendered in this case, in department 1 of this court, September 9, 1889, affirming the orders appealed from. Reference is made to the opinion filed at that time for a statement of the case, and for the rulings then made upon the points considered, which rulings are still adhered to. The parties have since, by stipulation, waived all controversy upon the points then discussed; but an orderly and intelligible disposition of the case requires that rulings should be had upon those points, and, after a careful reconsideration of the case in bank, we see no reason to change the decision then made, so far as it goes. Upon the express stipulation, and at the request of counsel on both sides, the case was resubmitted in bank, for the purpose of having a direct opinion of the court upon the single question of whether or not the second house mentioned in the former opinion—the house built on the rear of the lot since the filing of the homestead declaration—was and is exempt from execution; whether it was and is impressed with the character of homestead to the extent of being exempt from execution on that account. And, to avoid future litigation between the parties, it is stipulated that the orders of the court below, from which the appeal was taken, shall be affirmed or reversed according as we shall now decide this question in the affirmative or negative.

There can be and is no question but that this entire lot was fully impressed with the character of homestead before and at the time this second house was built upon it. The building of the second house did not increase the value of the entire property, including both houses, to an amount which is in excess of that which is by law, and as incident to homestead, made exempt from execution as such No part of the tract has ever been abandoned, or the homestead claim thereon released, in the manner provided by law. How, then, if at all, is it made subject to sale on execution? The strict language of the question submitted confines it to the house. Is the house exempt? It certainly is, if the land upon which it stands is exempt; for it has become a part of the realty, and can only be separated from the land with the consent of the owner. But we do not understand the intent to be to limit the question to the house alone, as distinguished from the land upon which it stands.

The constitutional provision is that "the legislature shall protect by law, from forced sale, a certain portion of the homestead and other property of all heads of families." Article 17, § 1. Here there is no limit to the value of the property thus to be protected. It is left to the legislature to determine what portion, to what limit, and by what means, it shall be protected. Exemption is a constitutional right incident to homestead, (Ham v. Bank, 62 Cal. 138;) but the extent of such exemption, and the means by which it shall be secured, are made by the constitution the subject of legislative enactment. Legislating for the purpose of giving effect to this constitutional provision, it has been in the Codes provided that "the homestead consists of the dwelling-house in which the claimant resides, and the land on which the same is situated, selected as in this title provided." Civil Code, § 1237. Following this, and in the same title, which extends to and includes section 1269, will be found the provisions as to the mode and manner of selection in order to avail of the exemption; the limitation of such exemption; the mode and manner of abandonment or release; the exceptions to the rule of exemption; and the course to be pursued when the homestead exceeds in value the limit of the exemption. Actual occupation, as a place of residence, at the time of filing the declaration, is necessary in order to impress upon the premises the character of homestead. Section 1263; Prescott v. Prescott, 45 Cal. 58; Babcock v. Gibbs, 52 Cal. 629; Dorn v. Howe, Id. 630; Aucker v. McCoy, 56 Cal. 524. Use at the time of selection, and selection by the making and recording of the proper declaration, are both essential elements in the creation of the homestead character. Neither is sufficient for that purpose without the other. Laughlin v. Wright, 63 Cal. 113; Maloney v. Hefer, 75 Cal. 424, 17 Pac. Rep. 539; In re Allen, 78 Cal. 294, 20 Pac. Rep. 679. If at the time of filing the declaration for record, the two houses now standing upon this lot had been standing as they now do, and occupied as they now are, only the one occupied as the dwelling of the plaintiff, with that portion of the lot used in connection therewith, would have been impressed with the homestead character. As to the other house, and the land used in connection with it, the attempt to dedicate it as a homestead would have been inoperative. Tiernan v. His Creditors, 62 Cal. 286; Maloney v. Hefer, supra; In re Allen, supra. But it has never been held, under our statute, that the subsequent erection of a second house, for whatever purpose such second house was used, operated to relieve the property pro tanto, or any separate part of it, of the homestead character which had already attached, so as to make it liable to seizure and sale under execution. On the contrary, the statute expressly provides that the homestead can only be conveyed or incumbered as provided in section 1242, and only be abandoned as provided in section 1243, Civil Code; also, that it is subject to execution only in the cases provided in section 1241, of which this is not one. Even a removal from the homestead, followed by long-continued residence and the acquirement of citizenship in another state, has been held not to operate as an abandonment of a homestead. Porter v. Chapman, 65 Cal. 367, 4 Pac. Rep. 237. See, also, Tipton v. Martin, 71 Cal. 325, 12 Pac. Rep. 244. The whole lot being adapted to use as a homestead, and actually used as such at the time of dedication, it then became, as an entirety, affected with the homestead character. And this is so without regard to the value of the lot, either at the time of its dedication or at any subsequent period. There is no statutory limit as to the value of the property which may be selected, and upon which the character may be impressed. When the attributes of residence and selection according to law exist so as to express its essence, the homestead becomes an estate in the premises selected, exempted by law from forced sale. They may be of greater or less value than the interest in them exempted by law. The excess, if there be one, in value, though it may be homestead in fact, is subject to the jus disponendi of the owner and the claims of his creditors. Ham v. Bank, 62 Cal. 139. But it does not follow that the excess in value is subject to seizure and sale at the instance of an execution creditor. If the property so impressed with the character of homestead is worth more than the homestead exemption, and the creditor desires to avail himself of that excess, the proceedings provided by the Code (sections 1245-1259, Civil Code,) must be taken for the admeasurement and application of such excess. Waggle v. Worthy, 74 Cal. 268, 15 Pac. Rep. 831. A judgment creates no lien upon property thus affected; and a levy gives no right, except to inaugurate the proceedings for the admeasurement of such excess. Barrett v. Sims, 59 Cal. 615. It follows that a sale, unless made under order of court, and for purposes of segregation of the excess as provided in the sections referred to, would convey no title. But though the sale of a homestead under execution conveys no title, it may create a cloud, and involve the homestead claimant in litigation, and will therefore be enjoined. Culver v. Rogers, 28 Cal. 520; Eby v. Foster, 61 Cal. 287.

So far as we have been able to discover, no case has before arisen under our statutes where the precise question now submitted has been presented. In every case where it has been held that a second tenement, used for purposes other than the residence of the family, has operated to prevent the homestead character from attaching to such second tenement, and the land used in connection therewith, such second tenement existed at the time of the attempted homestead selection, and was not one constructed after the homestead character had attached to the land. Here the homestead character had attached before the second building was constructed; and, reasoning from the analogy of the statutes and of the cases cited, the construction of such building was not an act which relieved it of such homestead character, and rendered the land subject to direct seizure and sale under execution. If the construction of this second building had increased the value of the tract claimed as a homestead to an amount in excess of the homestead exemption, or if, for any other cause, it had become or was of greater value than the amount of such exemption, the plaintiff would have been entitled to make the levy, as he has done in this case, not for the purpose of proceeding to sale under the execution, but as a basis of application to the proper court for proceedings under the statute for the admeasurement of such excess in value, and then for partition or sale under the order of the court, as in the statute provided. But no provision for such a proceeding has been made, unless there is such an excess in value. And while it is true that, under the rule of law heretofore established, this second house, with the land upon which it stands, would not have taken on the homestead character if it had been there at the time of homestead selection, but that the homestead would then, by reason thereof, have been so limited in extent as to exclude this house and its grounds, it may very well be that the legislature did not intend that the homestead should thereafter be limited in extent by reason of future improvements, even if such improvements were used for purposes of revenue rather than residence, so long as they did not increase the value beyond the limit of exemption. Whether this be so or not, we are compelled to hold that, under the facts of this case, the statute, and the authorities cited, this whole lot is so affected with the homestead character as to be exempt from sale under execution, and there is no authority in this proceeding, or in the case in which the execution was issued, to segregate any part of the lot, and relieve it from such exemption. Whether there is such authority anywhere, we are not now called upon to decide; but, without further legislative action, it would seem to be exceedingly doubtful. The judgment and order appealed from must be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

We concur: BEATTY, C. J.; WORKS, J.; SHARPSTEIN, J.; THORNTON, J.; MCFARLAND, J.

PATERSON, J., (dissenting.) I am unable to concur in the prevailing opinion, or in the judgment. It is immaterial, in my opinion, whether the second house was placed on the land before or after the filing of the declaration of homestead. The stipulation of counsel reduces the question before us to the simple inquiry whether or not the house built on the rear of the lot is exempt from execution. The question is purely one of exemption. The question is not whether the whole property, including both houses, is so impressed with the homestead character that it would go to the survivor on the death of one of the spouses. Property selected and improved as a homestead may retain its homestead character for certain purposes, and yet a portion of it be not exempt from execution. This is plain from the provisions of the constitution and the statute bearing upon the subject. The constitution provides that "the legislature shall protect by law, from forced sale, a certain portion of the homestead and other property of all heads of families." Article 17, § 1. Acting upon this provision, the legislature has provided that "the homestead consists of the dwelling-house in which the claimant resides, and the land on which the same is situated." Section 1237, Civil Code. Section 1240, Civil Code, provides that "the homestead is exempt from execution or forced sale, except as in this title provided." This court has decided that the homestead "represents the dwelling-house in which the family resides, with the usual and customary appurtenances, including outbuildings of every kind necessary or convenient for family use; * * * the only tests are use and value," (Gregg v. Bostwick, 33 Cal. 228;) that the use of the property is an important element to be considered, (McLaughlin v. Wright, 63 Cal. 116.) Referring to Gregg v. Bostwick, supra, Thomp. Homest. & Ex. says: "This last case very clearly conducts us to the rule that houses built for the purpose of being rented to tenants, thus yielding the debtor a revenue separate from any use immediately connected with his dwelling, form no part of his homestead." Section 130. It has been held uniformly that, in order to be exempt from execution, the property claimed as a homestead must be actually occupied as a residence by the family of the owner,—temporary absences excepted, of course; and that any portion of his real estate not so used is not exempt from execution, whatever may be its extent or value; and that, where houses and lots are rented for money rent to tenants who are not servants or employes of the owner, the latter cannot claim them as a part of his own home and residence, although they may adjoin the same. Ashton v. Ingle, 20 Kan. 670; Austin v. Stanley, 46 N. H. 51; Kurz v. Brusch, 13 Iowa, 371; Casselman v. Packard, 16 Wis. 114. As all other questions are waived by the stipulation of counsel, I think that the rear house, and the land upon which it stands, should be subjected to the satisfaction of the judgment.

LEEK v. MCCLURE et al. (No. 12,487.)

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JOHN F. FINN, Judge.

C. H. Parker and Nagle & Nagle, for appellant. M. S. Eisner and Spencer & McInerney, for respondents.

WORKS, J. This is an action to recover certain moneys alleged to have been collected by the respondents as attorneys, and not paid over on demand. The court below found that the respondents had never collected or received the money. The sole question presented on this appeal is whether this finding is supported by the evidence or not. We think the evidence is such that we cannot disturb the judgment of the court below. Judgment and order affirmed.

We concur: FOX, J.; PATERSON, J.

BERNIAUD v. BEECHER. (No. 12,943.)

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Joaquin county; J. G. SWINNERTON, Judge.

Action by Rosina Berniaud, by her guardian ad litem, J. M. Hogan, against J. L. Beecher, to quiet plaintiff's title to certain land. On allegations and proofs the court found that plaintiff is alive and insane, and J. M. Hogan her duly appointed guardian ad litem; that plaintiff is the owner in fee of the land described in complaint, except the west 19½ feet of lot 1, block 229, of which said defendant is the owner, under a sheriff's sale. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Jas. A. Louttit, (Louttit, Woods & Levinsky, of counsel,) for appellant. John C. Byers and L. W. Elliott, for respondents.

WORKS, J. This is the third appeal in this case. Substantially all of the questions now presented were determined against the appellant on the two former appeals. 71 Cal. 38, 11 Pac. Rep. 802; 76 Cal. 394, 18 Pac. Rep. 598.

Counsel for appellant contend that the decision in the last appeal was upon the judgment roll, and therefore did not determine the question presented here, whether the findings of the court were sustained by the evidence. But on the first appeal the decision was that the evidence, which was documentary, and was the same as is in the record on this appeal, proved the plaintiff's title to the property; and it was further decided that the defendant not having been in the possession of the property, the defense of the statute of limitations was not made out. We do not base this decision on those cases entirely, however. We think the evidence was sufficient to sustain the findings, and that the judgment of the court below was right. Judgment and order affirmed.

We concur: BEATTY, C. J.; SHARPSTEIN, J.; McFARLAND, J.; FOX, J.; THORNTON, J.

SETTLERS' DITCH CO. v. HAYES et al. (No. 12,297.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 31, 1889.)

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Tulare county; W. W. CROSS, Judge.

Brown & Dagget and M. Mullany, for appellants. Atwell & Bradley, M. S. Babcock, and Jarboe, Harrison & Goodfellow, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J This case is very similar to the case of Lakeside Ditch Co. v. Crane, (No. 12,296,) ante, 76. The issues in both cases were nearly the same, and so was the evidence; and the opinion delivered in the Lakeside Case is applicable to the case at bar, except in one or two respects, and, so far as applicable, is adopted as the opinion in this case. The findings in the case at bar are not so much exposed to the criticism of uncertainty as were the findings in the other case; and, if they were all supported by the evidence, they would probably support the judgment. But, as in the Lakeside Case, we are constrained to say that the evidence does not support the finding that the Hyde ditch of defendants, constructed in 1876, "carried away no appreciable quantity of water," and that neither the defendants nor their grantors "claimed or asserted any right to the waters of Cross creek adversely to the plaintiff," prior to the month of May, 1884. For this failure of evidence, and for the reasons given on this point in the opinion in the Lakeside Case, the judgment must be reversed. There was sufficient proof of the incorporation of plaintiff, the opinion in the Lakeside Case on that subject being applicable here. What was said in that case as to the bearing of the statute creating water commissioners for Tulare county upon the rights of the parties is also applicable to the case at bar; and also what was said there on title by prescription, on rulings about the admissibility of certain evidence, and on the subject of what the findings should be on another trial. Judgment and order reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

We concur: PATERSON, J.; SHARPSTEIN, J.

WORKS, J. I concur in the judgment.

BEATTY, C. J. I concur in the judgment upon the grounds stated in my concurring opinion in case No. 12,296.
